

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

An instruction that, in order for probable cause for an arrest to exist, the facts must be such as would justify an ordinarily prudent person in entertaining a belief in another's guilt, and that whether such facts had come to the knowledge of the defendant at the time he caused the arrest of the plaintiff is a question for the jury to determine, is likely to be understood by the jury to mean that they are to decide not only what information the defendant had, but whether it was enough to justify a reasonable belief in the plaintiff's guilt. Such an instruction, unless accompanied by a clear and accurate statement of what specific facts under the circumstances of the particular case would, if found to exist, be sufficient under the law for that purpose, is materially erroneous.

Malicious prosecution — probable cause — question of law.

2. What constitutes probable cause for an arrest is a question of law, and, if a complaining witness believed upon reasonable grounds that the accused was guilty, it is not material, in an action against him for malicious prosecution, whether he believed that probable cause existed in a legal sense, unless as bearing upon the question of malice.

As to the discharge of accused by examining magistrate as evidence of want of probable cause, see note in 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 929.

As to the conclusiveness of verdict of guilty set aside or reversed and followed by acquittal or nolle prosequi as evidence of probable cause, see note to MacDonald v. Schroeder, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 701.

See also note in 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 958, as to conviction by magistrate or justice of peace which has been reversed or set aside as probable cause.

See "Malicious Prosecution," Index to L.R.A. Notes, pp. 880-882, for other notes on that subject.

"Malicious prosecution, regarded as a remedy, is a distinctive action ex delicto for the recovery of damages to person, property, or reputation, shown to have proximately resulted from a previous civil or criminal proceeding, which was commenced or continued without probable cause, but with malice, and which has terminated unsuccessfully. Regarded as a specific tort, it is the wrong so committed. The term is also sometimes used as the name of the original judicial proceeding." 26 Cyc. 6.

I. Scope.

The purpose of this note, as the subject would indicate, is a consideration of the cases involving the question whether the element of probable cause in actions for malicious prosecution raises a question of law for the determination of the court, or a question of fact for the jury. There are a number of actions, such as "malicious arrest," "false imprisonment," etc., in which this same question is presented, but they are entirely different and separate remedies (Britton v. Granger, 13 Ohio C. C. 281, 7 Ohio C. D. 182, cited in note in 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49) and have been generally excluded. Nor are actions for malicious abuse of legal process within the scope of this note. They involve the employment of a legal process by a party for some unlawful object, and not to effect the purpose for which it was intended by law; while a malicious prosecution is an action or proceeding instituted by one person against another from wrongful or improper motives, and without probable cause to sustain it (Kline v. Hibbard, 80 Hun, 50, 29 N. Y. Supp. 807, affirmed without opinion in 155 N. Y. 679, 49 N. E. 1099, cited in note in 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49). In the former the process is maliciously perverted and abused; in the latter it is maliciously used. Cases involving an alleged malicious use of process for which redress was sought in an action for malicious prosecution are within the limits of the present inquiry, so far as they deal with the question considered, whether the process maliciously used was a criminal warrant, order of arrest, writ of replevin, warrant of attachment, injunction, or other provisional remedy.

Witnesses — communication to prosecuting attorney — privilege.

4. Communications made by a complaining witness to the prosecuting attorney concerning his knowledge of matters relating to the probable guilt or innocence of the defendant are privileged, and cannot be given in evidence over his objection in an action against him for malicious prosecution.

Unless the contrary is stated or appears by plain implication, the words "plaintiff" and "defendant" are, as a rule, used throughout this note with reference to the parties to the action for malicious prosecution, and not to indicate the relation of the parties to the suit or prosecution out of which the action arose.

II. Introduction.

a. Nature of probable cause.

That a proper and intelligent understanding of the subject under consideration, which is by no means an unimportant one, necessitates a clear idea of the meaning of the term "probable cause," is obvious. Tending to this end, probable cause has been more or less frequently defined as:

"A suspicion founded on circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the charge is true." Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 217.

"A reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the person accused is guilty of the offense with which he is charged." Munns v. Dupont, 3 Wash. C. C. 31, Fed. Cas. No. 9,926; Sanders v. Palmer, 5 C. C. A. 77, 14 U. S. App. 297, 55 Fed. 217.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Harvey County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. L. Martin for appellant.

Messrs. S. B. Amidon, D. M. Dale, and Jean Madalene, for appellee:

If the facts are not in dispute, the question is for the court; if they are disputed, the jury must be left to pass upon the existence or want of probable cause.

Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Watson, 37 Kan. 782, 15 Pac. 877; Drumm v. Cessnum, 58 Kan. 334, 49 Pac. 78; Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 196, 25 L. ed. 120;

"Such facts and circumstances as would induce an ingenuous and unprejudiced man, of common capacity, in the defendant's situation, to believe the plaintiff to be guilty, would justify a criminal prosecution against him." Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 81.

"That apparent state of facts, found to exist upon reasonable inquiry,—that is, such inquiry as the given case rendered convenient and proper,—which would induce a reasonably intelligent and prudent man to believe the accused person had committed, in a criminal case, the crime charged; and, in a civil case, that a cause of action existed." Lacy v. Mitchell, 23 Ind. 67; Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Henby, 178 Ind. 239, 97 N. E. 313, is to the same effect.

"Such conduct on the part of the accused as to induce the court to infer that the prosecution was undertaken from public motives." Lavender v. Hudgens, 32 Ark. 763.

The second definition is the one most frequently given, perhaps, in actions for criminal prosecutions, but, as has been said: "A definition of probable cause sufficiently exact to meet satisfactorily every possible test would be difficult, if not impossible, to furnish. The complete legal idea expressed by that term is not to be gathered from a mere definition. But, perhaps, with reference to many practical cases, it may be nearly accurate to say that probable cause consists of a belief in the charge or facts alleged, based on sufficient circumstances to reasonably induce such belief in a person of ordinary prudence in the same situation." Boeger v. Langenberg, 97 Mo. 390, 10 Am. St. Rep. 322, 11 S. W. 223.

However, notwithstanding the many verbal differences apparent in the various definitions of the courts, there seems to be substantial agreement among the authorities to warrant the statement that the standard of conduct for beginning or continuing any proceeding, whether civil or criminal, since, mutatis mutandis, the same principles determine probable cause in both instances, is that of a reasonable or ordinarily prudent man placed in the same situation as the defendant. That is, if a reasonable man would have believed and acted under the circumstances as the defendant did, there would be probable cause; otherwise not.

As has been said: "Probable cause in the nature of things is sometimes a state of facts; uncontroverted testimony or unimpeached records may show such guilt or conduct on the part of plaintiff as to make it out without any reference to, or despite, the mental attitude of defendant. It sometimes involves a state of mind; when honesty of knowledge, good faith of belief, fairness of statement to counsel, or the like is in question, the mens rea may be the only matter in issue. Between these self-explanatory extremes, however, there is a middle zone of cases in which the authorities are in conflict as to whether probable cause has reference to facts known or to facts in existence at the time of the commencement of the proceedings. Probable cause is a state of mind, in this, that the facts are regarded from the point of view of the prosecutor. The question is not what the actual facts were, but what he had reason to believe they were." 26 Cyc. 23.

With these few observations in mind, it can be plainly seen that no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to what facts and circumstances in any given case amount to probable cause; but that every case must be determined upon its facts, in the light of its surrounding circumstances, in accordance with the definition of probable cause prevailing in the particular jurisdiction.

Probable cause being thus so essentially a question of fact, and such questions being, under our system of jurisprudence, so properly for the determination of the jury, rather than the judge, who, as a rule, is to determine only questions of law, it would seem, therefore, that the question of probable cause is naturally and logically a question for the determination of the jury. If it is not so determined, its position in our system of laws is plainly anomalous,—a thing which should not be without good and substantial reason. It is the theory of our law, and the practice generally, that twelve jurymen, themselves presumed to be reasonable men, are better fitted to decide what was the proper conduct for a reasonable man in a particular case than the judge, as the question is: what would a reasonable or ordinarily prudent man have done under the circumstances; and not what one learned in the law, as the judge is supposed to be, would have done. And as has already been noticed, it is just this question of the proper conduct of a reasonable man that is involved in the determination of the question of probable cause.

b. Conspectus.

However, notwithstanding the foregoing considerations as to the nature of probable cause, there is some conflict and considerable uncertainty among the authorities on this subject. Much of the latter element in particular, it seems, is but the natural result of a loose choice, or niggardly use of language on the part of some of the courts, so that the holdings in such cases are generally difficult to understand, and frequently amount to little more than the mere interpretation of the individual reader. As was said in Coleman v. Heurich, 2 Mackey, 189: "The question seems to be by no means free from difficulty, on the words of the authorities, though that difficulty appears to have arisen largely from the want of exactness in the expressions employed in stating the rule." Again, much confusion is caused by courts who claim to be in accord with the weight of authority, yet, failing, it seems, to fully appreciate such general rule, establish another and entirely different rule, as will be hereafter noticed. Doubtless, however, the primary reason for all the confusion and uncertainty in this branch of the law is to be found in the anomalous view of the question taken by the great weight of authority, and the desire of the courts to escape the inherent difficulties encountered in its practical application in nine out of ten, if not ninety-nine out of a hundred, cases, without expressly abrogating for all time and purposes the practice of centuries.

For, strange though it may seem in the

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

O. E. Matson, while mayor of Burrton, verified a complaint charging M. M. Michael and Grace Michael, his wife, with violating the prohibitory law, and caused their arrest. The county attorney refused to prosecute, and the case was dismissed. Grace Michael brought action against Matson for malicious prosecution and recovered a judgment for $600, from which he appeals.

We think the verdict must be set aside for the reason that the instructions were so worded as naturally to lead the jury to understand that they were the judges of what constituted probable cause, and their find-light of what has already been said concerning the nature of the question of probable cause, the overwhelming weight of authority, both in England and America, sustains the view that what facts, and whether particular facts, constitute probable cause, is purely a question of law in any case, irrespective of the condition of the evidence; that when the facts and circumstances relied upon to show probable cause, or want of it, are in dispute, or susceptible of conflicting inferences of fact or the credibility of witnesses is involved, the truth and existence of the facts and circumstances is a question of fact exclusively for the jury; but whether the facts so found to exist constitute probable cause is still a question of law exclusively for the court; and that when there is no dispute in the evidence, and the facts and circumstances are admitted or clearly established by uncontroverted evidence, there is nothing to submit to the jury, and the court has only to say at once, as a matter of law, whether or not such facts and circumstances constitute probable cause.

Considerable confusion exists in this subject as the natural result of the failure of some of the authorities to properly observe any differentiation between the apparently conflicting statements, "probable cause is a question of law," and "probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact." These two statements harmonize perfectly when the former is understood to mean "what facts and whether particular facts amount to probable cause is a question of law;" and the latter that "what facts and whether particular facts exist is a question of fact for the jury; but whether such facts amount to probable cause is a question of law for the court." And it seems quite clear that these are the respective senses in which these statements are generally used.

The opinion of the jury as to the existence of the facts may be obtained, it seems, in either of two ways. The prevailing practice appears to be by means of hypothetical instructions in which the jury are told that if they find certain enumerated facts to exist, there was probable cause, and they must find for the defendant; but if certain other enumerated facts are found ings show that they probably acted upon that understanding. There is some conflict on the subject; but the great preponderance of authority favors the view that the question of what facts are sufficient to constitute probable cause is one of unmixed law. 26 Cyc. 107; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 669. Courts which acquiesce in the general statement of the rule sometimes refuse an unqualified application of it. For illustration, it is approved in Fagnan v. Knox, 89 N. Y. 525; Erb v. German American Ins. Co. 112 Iowa, 357, 83 N. W. 1053; and Hamilton v. Smith, 39 Mich. 222, 227; but denied application in Heyne v. Blair, 62 N. Y. 19; Donnelly v. Burkett, 75 Iowa, 613, 34 N. W. 330, and Davis v. McMillan, 142 Mich. 391, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 928, 113 Am. St. Rep. 585, 105 N. W. 862, 7 Ann. Cas. 854. This court, however, has consistently adhered to it and given it practical effect. Drumm v. Cessnum, 58 Kan. 331, 49 Pac. 78; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Allen, 70 Kan. 743, 79 Pac. 648. In the Drumm-Cessnum Case it was said: "Where the facts are disputed, it must be left to the jury to determine what the facts are; but the court should instruct what facts amount to probable cause for an arrest and what do not. The court should summarize the claims of the parties, and state to the jury what basis of fact must exist to show probable to exist, there was a want of probable cause, and their verdict must be for the plaintiff.

And where such is the practice, it is equally the duty of the court to so collate the evidence and instruct the jury when the facts are numerous and complicated, as when the same are few and simple. And in no case can the court, simply by defining probable cause to the jury, leave it to them to find whether the facts established in the case are within or without the definition, as such practice surrenders to the jury the court's duty of saying, as a matter of law, what is the legal effect of the facts found to exist, and leaves both the questions of law and fact to the arbitrament of the jury.

The other, and apparently less frequent, practice for obtaining the opinion of the jury on its particular phase of the question of probable cause, seems to be the use of the special verdict. In this way the court gets the opinion of the jury as to what facts exist without giving any intimation as to what facts must exist to entitle either party to win, and upon the facts so ascertained, he determines the existence or nonexistence of probable cause as a matter of law. The special verdict seems, in many respects, the better practice.

A few cases sanction the practice when the evidence is conflicting, of defining probable cause to the jury, and leaving them to decide, in the light of such definition, whether probable cause for the prosecution existed or not.

III. General rule.

a. Generally.

The general rule of the common law, sustained by the overwhelming weight of authority, both in England and America, is that what facts, and whether particular facts, constitute probable cause, is always a question of law, which the judge must decide upon the facts found to exist in the particular case, and which it is error for him to submit to the decision of the jury.

cause, and what will sustain the claim of a want of probable cause." Page 333.

In the present case the court gave this instruction: "You are instructed that, to constitute probable cause for criminal prosecution, there must be such reasonable grounds of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant an ordinarily cautious man in the belief that the person arrested is guilty of the offense charged, and, in this connection, you are further instructed that a mere belief that an innocent person is guilty of a crime is not alone sufficient to justify causing his or her arrest. The facts must be such as would justify an ordinarily intelligent and reasonably prudent person in entertaining such belief. Whether, in this case, such facts had come to the knowledge of the defendant at the time he entered the complaint against the plaintiff is a question of fact for the jury to determine from a preponderance of the evidence." This definition of what constitutes probable cause is doubtless sufficiently accurate, although the use of "cautious" in place of "prudent" has been criticized. McClafferty v. Philp, 151 Pa. 86, 24 Atl. 1042. As it is not the province of the jury to determine what circumstances would induce a reasonably prudent man to believe another guilty of a crime, there seems to be no purpose in the giving of an abstract instruction on the subject. "Inasmuch as the question of probable cause is always to be determined by the court from the facts in each particular case, it would seem unnecessary to give to the jury any definition of the term, or any instruction upon abstract propositions relating to this subject. These abstract rules will guide the court in determining the question, but are apt to lead the jury away from their function of passing upon the effect of the evidence in support of the probative facts which the court may direct them to find in order to determine in which way their general verdict shall be rendered." Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 233, 234, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937. Nevertheless such an instruction is ordinarily not prejudicial, where the charge includes a statement of what facts would amount to probable cause in the case on trial. Jonasen v. Kennedy, 39 Neb. 313, 319, 320, 58 N. W. 122. The difficulty here is that the last sentence of the instruction quoted, although open to a different construction, naturally tended to lead the jury to understand that they were to decide for themselves whether the facts known to the defendant when he caused the plaintiff's arrest were such as would justify an ordinarily prudent person in believing her guilty. This misleading tendency, if not corrected by a clear and accurate statement of what concrete facts would justify a reasonable belief of guilt, is a ground for reversal unless it can be said from the record that the jury were not in fact misled.

The inference from the findings, however, is to the contrary.

Two of the special questions and answers read as follows:

Q. At the time defendant filed complaint, did he believe that plaintiff's and her husband's house was a place where persons were permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors as a beverage?

A. Yes, to some extent.

Q. At the time the defendant filed complaint, had he been informed, and did he honestly believe, that the house of the plaintiff and her husband was a place where persons were permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors?

A. No, he had some information, but not enough to base an honest belief on.

These findings are either in conflict, or they mean that Matson did believe Mrs. Michael guilty, but had formed that opinion upon insufficient information. The natural conclusion is that the jury were guided by their own judgment as to what information would be enough to serve as the basis for such an opinion. It is true the court elsewhere enumerated the grounds relied upon by the defendant as justifying the arrest, and instructed the jury that, if the facts were as he claimed, they constituted probable cause, and he was entitled to a verdict; but the qualifying words were added, "unless you should further find that the defendant himself, after consulting with an attorney, believed there was no probable cause for the prosecution." The addition limited the effect of the rest of this instruction, and thus

Am. St. Rep. 1063, 111 N. W. 668, 11 Ann. Cas. 951.

That is, in any given case, notwithstanding the condition of the evidence, which, as is hereafter pointed out, may, in the majority of cases, have to be submitted to the jury to ascertain what facts really exist,—it is the duty of the court to say whether or not, in point of law, the facts and circumstances found to exist amount to probable cause. And it is precisely in this sense, it seems, that the statement that probable cause is a question of law for the court is used.

Thus, in Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937, a leading case in this country on this subject, the court said: "Whether the defendant had or had not probable cause for instituting the prosecution is always a matter of law to be determined by the court. If the facts upon which the defendant acted are undisputed, the court, according as it shall be of the opinion that they constituted probable cause or not, either will order a nonsuit (or direct a verdict for the defendant), or it will submit the other issues to the jury; but whether admitted or disputed, the question is still one of law to be determined by the court from the facts established in the case. If the facts are controverted, they must be passed upon by the jury before the court can determine the issue of probable cause; but the question of probable cause can never be left to the determination of the jury. 'What facts and circumstances amount to probable cause is a pure question of law. Whether they exist or not in any particular case is a pure question of fact. The former is exclusively for the court, the latter for the jury.' (Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 84.) 'When there is no dispute about the facts, the question of the want of probable cause is for the determination of the court; where the facts are controverted or doubtful, whether they are proved or not, belongs to the jury to decide; or in other words, whether the circumstances alleged are true is a question of fact; but if true, whether they amount to probable cause is for the prevented a correction of the misleading tendency of the other. It necessarily introduced a new, irrelevant, and confusing element into the problem,—the defendant's understanding as to what constitutes probable cause in law. Belief that probable cause exists for the arrest of a person is obviously a different thing from a belief that he is guilty. The latter is often said to be an essential ingredient of probable cause, although many of the definitions omit it. 26 Cyc. 29; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 663; 6 Words & Phrases, 5620 et seq; note, in 26 Am. St. Rep. 140. The former has no materiality in this kind of an action unless as bearing upon the question of malice. A man may cause an arrest under a reasonable belief, founded on abundant evidence, that the accused person is guilty. Yet he may suppose, through ignorance of the law, that "probable cause" does not exist, and that if he fails to procure a conviction he is answerable in damages. Plainly he would not be liable under such circumstances. Probable cause would exist in fact and would afford him a perfect defense, whatever might be the result of the prosecution. The instruction given in this respect was clearly erroneous, and under all the circumstances of the case, must be deemed to have been prejudicial.

The probability that the jury misconceived the issues to be determined by them is increased by the fact that, in the next instruction, they were directed to consider, as bearing upon the matter of probable cause, court.' (Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 387.) Probable cause is in the nature of a judgment to be rendered by the court upon a special verdict of the jury, and is not to be rendered until after the jury has given its verdict upon the facts by which it is to be determined. It is not, however, necessary that the facts be found by the jury in the form of a special verdict. The court may instruct them to render their verdict for or against the defendant according as they shall find the facts designated to it which the court may deem sufficient to constitute probable cause. But it is necessary for the court, in each instance, to determine whether the facts that they may find from the evidence will or will not establish that issue. Neither is it competent for the court to give to the jury a definition of probable cause, and instruct them to find for or against the defendant according as they may determine that the facts are with-in or without that definition. Such an instruction is only to leave to them in another form the function of determining whether there was probable cause. The court cannot divest itself of its duty to determine this question, however complicated or numerous may be the facts. It must instruct the jury upon this subject in the concrete, and not in the abstract, and must not leave to that body the office of determining the question, but must itself determine it, and direct the jury to find its verdict in accordance with such determination. The court should group in its instructions the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and then instruct the jury that if they find such facts to be established, there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be, and that their verdict must be accordingly.

And in Beale v. Roberson, 29 N. C. (7 Ired. L.) 280, the court had this question under consideration, and reviewing the earlier cases, said: "This case brings up again the question whether probable cause is matter of law, so as to make it the duty of the court to direct the jury that, if they find certain facts upon the evidence, or draw from them certain other inferences of fact, there is or is not probable cause; thus leaving the questions of fact to the jury, and keeping their effect, in point of reason, for the decision of the court, as a matter of law. Upon that question, the opinion of the court is in the affirmative; and therefore this judgment must be reversed. The point is concluded in the state by repeated adjudications. It was first presented in the case of Legget v. Blount, 4 N. C. (Term Rep. 123) 7 Am. Dec. 702, in which the judge told the jury, after the examination of many witnesses on both sides touching the alleged probable cause, that there was probable cause; and the judgment was reversed, because the judge had assumed the decision of the whole case, including the facts, as well as the law. But it was distinctly admitted, or rather affirmed, there, that probable cause, as an abstract question, is one of law, and to be decided by the judge according to the doctrine in Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 510, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Revised Rep. 269, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 765, and the authorities therein cited; which established that upon a special plea and demurrer, or a special verdict, the court determines that question, and that, even when there is a general verdict for the plaintiff, it is the province of the court to say whether certain facts, appearing on the declaration, do not amount to probable cause. In the subsequent case of Plummer v. Gheen, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 66, 14 Am. Dec. 572, Chief Justice Taylor (who had tried the case of Legget v. Blount), delivered the opinion of this court, and admitted that the superior court had explained to the jury correctly what probable cause was, but yet held that it was a question of law whether the circumstances, being true, amounted to probable cause, and that the parties had a right to the opinion of the court distinctly on it; and the judgment was reversed, because upon very complicated and contradictory evidence, the presiding judge had left that question to the jury. In Cabiness v. Martin, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 454, the presiding judge decided the question of probable cause, and this court reversed the judgment, not be-the question whether the defendant believed he had sufficient evidence to convict the plaintiff of the offense charged against her. The chances of conviction depend upon too many conditions to make the prosecutor's opinion of the prospects in that respect a factor in determining the existence of probable cause. An adverse public sentiment might make the conviction of a notoriously guilty person almost hopeless, and yet the institution of a prosecution might be not only justifiable, but praiseworthy, and, in the case of a public officer, obligatory. As was said in State ex rel. Johnston v. Foster, 32 Kan. 14, 3 Pac. 534: "If a county attorney vigilantly and earnestly discharges his duty by frequent prosecutions in a community seemingly indifferent to the enforcement of law, his action will of necessity call the attention of the public to the disregard of law and the dangerous consequences following therefrom. His action will oftentimes awaken a community to a just realization of its duty, and arouse its members from indifference to a willing obedience to all that the law demands. His action will oftentimes result in enlightening public sentiment and in crystallizing public opinion in favor of the enforcement of all the laws." Page 42.

The only other question which is thought to require discussion relates to the admission of evidence. The county attorney was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and was permitted to relate a conversation between Matson and himself relating to the liquor cause he assumed what was not within his province, but because he had decided wrong, as we thought, by holding a certain fact, if found by the jury, to be probable cause, which we deemed not to be so. And, in the two cases of Swaim v. Stafford, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 392 and 393, the question was again decided as matter of law,—it being held, in the one case, that there was, and in the other, that there was not, probable cause. Such a series of decisions, in our own courts, the same way, would protect the doctrine laid down in them from being drawn into debate now, even if we entertained doubts of its correctness originally. But, independent of authority, our reflections satisfy us that the principle is perfectly sound. It is a question of reason whether certain ascertained facts and circumstances constitute a probable and rational ground for charging a particular person with crime. If, indeed, the question was what was the actual belief of the prosecutor, respecting the other's guilt, it would be purely one of fact, and proper for the jury exclusively, as that of malice is. But that is not the question in such cases. It is true, indeed, as his Honor told the jury in this case, if a prosecutor knows the person whom he accuses, to be innocent, or does not believe the apparent circumstances of suspicion against him, that then he has no probable cause for prosecuting, however other persons, not knowing or believing as he did respecting the evidence, might justly entertain suspicions of the party's guilt. But while a prosecutor's belief of the innocence of the person charged may deprive the former of the pretense of probable cause, it does not follow, e converso, that the prosecutor's belief of the other's guilt shall excuse him; for he must take care that he acts only on a reasonable belief, a just suspicion; in other words, that he had, under the circumstances in which he was placed, as found in fact by the jury, a probable cause to think the party guilty, so that he might fairly and honestly call him to answer the charge. It is not, therefore, what a prosecutor believed, but what he ought to have believed, that justifies. If L.R.A.1915D.

he has not the capacity to weigh the circumstances justly, or finds his dispositions towards a suspected person interfering with the coolness of his deliberations and the impartiality of his conclusions, it is his plain duty to consult those whose passions are not heated, and whose knowledge will enable them to judge more correctly, and not at once rashly to accuse an innocent person upon insufficient grounds. Now, our inquiry is whether, for the determination of the question as to the sufficiency or the insufficiency of the grounds of suspicion, supposing them to exist in fact, the court or the jury be the more competent; and we think, very clearly, that the court is, because it is a question of general and legal reasoning, and can best be performed by those whose professional province and habit it is to discuss, weigh, and decide on legal presumptions. The only argument against that is the difficulty in cases of many and complicated facts and contradictory evidence, as in Plummer v. Gheen, of properly separating to the comprehension of the jury, and to the satisfaction of the judge, the matters of law and fact. But that only proves the difficulty of deciding such cases, whether by the court or jury, and does not at all help us in saying, whether this or that point should be decided by the one or the other. But, as was said by counsel in the case of Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545, however great that difficulty may be, it is one which a judge can deal with better than a jury; as he does with reasonable time, due diligence, and legal provocation and the like; and in the case just referred to, which was cited by the plaintiff's counsel, the point now under consideration was, after elaborate discussion, decided in the exchequer chamber, upon a writ of error to the Queen's bench. The court held, unanimously, that in an action of this sort, if the defendant sets up facts as showing probable cause, the judge must determine whether the facts, if proved, or any of them, constitute such cause—leaving it to the jury to decide only whether the facts, or those inferred from them, exist; and as prosecution, before it was dismissed. The defendant objected to this on the ground that his statements to the county attorney, under the circumstances, were privileged. We think the objection should have been sustained, not on the theory that the relation of attorney and client existed, thus rendering the communication incompetent under the statute (Civ. Code, § 323; Gen. Stat. 1901, § 4771, subdiv. 4), but for the reason that the evidence was inadmissible on the grounds of public policy. The rule forbidding an attorney to disclose his client's secrets exists independent of the statute. Its basis is not the mere fact that the communication was confidentially made. Barnes v. Harris, 7 Cush. 576, 578, 54 Am. Dec. 734. The reason for its existence is that "the law has considered it the wisest policy to encourage and sanction this confidence, by requiring that on such facts the mouth of the attorney shall be forever sealed." Hatton v. Robinson, 14 Pick. 416, 25 Am. Dec. 415. In Jones on Evidence, 2d ed. § 749, it is said: "Communications made to the district attorney or other public prosecutor are governed by the same rule, and, if there is any difference, the confidence reposed in the attorney in such cases is even more sacred than that reposed in others." The interest of the public in protecting the privacy of a communication seems, indeed, greater when it is made to a prosecuting officer in that capacity than when it is made by a client to his attorney. Persons having knowledge regarding the

that is so when the facts are few and the case simple, it cannot be otherwise when the facts are numerous and complicated. It would seem, then, that making a question on this subject must be regarded as an attempt to move fixed things, and cannot be successful either in England or here. As the case goes back to another trial, on which the facts may appear differently, we think it unnecessary to consider those that came out on the former trial, in reference to the question of probable cause, further than to remark that few cases, perhaps, could better illustrate the danger of leaving that question to the discretion of a jury, whose decision of it is not susceptible of review in another court."

1. Reason of rule.

While naturally and logically, as previously stated, probable cause would seem to present a question of fact for the determination of the jury, the rule requiring the court to say what facts and whether particular facts amount to the probable cause is not without good reason, for it appears to be founded upon grounds of public policy. Thus, in Bail v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 228, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937, the court said: "Actions for malicious prosecution have never been favored in law, although they have always been readily upheld when the proper elements therefor have been presented. They are sustained, however, only when it is shown that the prosecution was in fact actuated by malice, and that the party instigating it had no reasonable ground for causing the prosecution. It is for the best interests of society that those who offend against the laws shall be promptly punished, and that any citizen who has good reason to believe that the law has been violated shall have the right to cause the arrest of the offender. For the purpose of protecting him in so doing, it is the established rule that if he have reasonable grounds for his belief, and act thereon in good faith in causing the arrest, he shall not be subjected to damages merely because the accused is not convicted. L.R.A.1915D.

This rule is founded upon grounds of public policy, in order to encourage the exposure of crime, and when the acts of the citizen in making such exposure are challenged as not being within the reason of the rule, the court, as in every other case involving considerations of public policy, must itself determine the question as a matter of law, and not leave it to the arbitrament of a jury." The concluding sentence of this quotation is quoted in Rogers v. Olds, 117 Mich. 368, 75 N. W. 933.

And again in Hess v. Oregon German Baking Co. 31 Or. 503, 49 Pac. 803, the court said: "This rule is peculiar to this class of actions, but is one of long standing, and founded upon sound reason, good authority, and public policy. Actions to recover damages for malicious prosecution have never been favored in law, although they have been readily upheld when it is shown that the prosecution was instituted through actual malice, and without probable cause. Malice in such cases is always a question for the jury; but as the authority to institute a criminal prosecution, and the extent of such authority, are derived from the law, the law must judge as to what will constitute probable cause therefor. The welfare of society imperatively demands that those who violate the law shall be promptly and speedily punished; and, to accomplish that purpose, the rule has been firmly established that any citizen who has good reason to believe that the law has been violated may cause the arrest of the supposed offender; and if, in doing so, he acts in good faith, the law will protect him against an action for damages, although the accusation may in fact be unfounded. This rule is founded on grounds of public policy to encourage the exposure of crime and the punishment of criminals, and when, therefore, the act of a citizen in thus enforcing the law is challenged, the court must determine the question, when the facts are admitted or established, as to whether he had probable cause for so doing, and not leave it to the arbitrament of a jury."

Travis v. Smith, 1 Pa. St. 234, 44 Am. Dec. 125, likewise states that, "as the au-commission of a crime ought to be encouraged to reveal to the prosecuting attorney fully, freely, and unreservedly the source and extent of their information. The possibility that what they say, under such circumstances, will be used against them, tends to impose a natural restraint upon their conduct and to deprive the officer of the benefit of their services. It is said that the privilege based upon this principle applies only to the identity of the informant (4 Wigmore, Ev. § 2374, p. 3333), and such appears to be the English rule; but in this country it has been treated as covering the communication itself.

authority to institute a criminal prosecution, and the extent of that authority, are derived from the law, the law must judge of its exercise; it is therefore the duty of the court to determine whether the proof of certain facts constitutes probable cause, and it is error to submit that question to the jury." This case is quoted in Turner v. O'Brien, 5 Neb. 542, and see subsequent appeal, 11 Neb. 108, 7 N. W. 850.

And Lord Colonsay in Lister v. Perryman, L. R. 4 H. L. 521, explaining the settled law in England that want of probable cause is matter for the court, says: "Probably it became so from anxiety to protect parties from being oppressed or harassed in consequence of having caused arrests or prosecutions in the fair pursuit of their legitimate interests, or as a matter of duty, in a country where parties injured have not the aid of a public prosecutor to do these things for them."

To the same effect, see: Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 189, 22 N. W. 300; Meyer v. Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. 98 Ky. 367, 33 S. W. 98; Sandoz v. Veazie, 106 La. 202, 30 So. 767. And see also, infra, III. b, 1, quotation from Coleman v. Heurich, 2 Mackey, 189.

2. Effect of change in pleading.

Originally an action for malicious prosecution was an action on the case in the nature of a writ of conspiracy, in which the plaintiff in the declaration charged the defendant with having falsely and maliciously caused his arrest. The defendant, in his pleas, set forth the grounds of his suspicion under which he caused the arrest, the sufficiency of which was determined by the court upon a demurrer to the plea. Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 229, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937, citing Chambers v. Taylor, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 900; Coxe v. Wirrall, Cro. Jac. 193; Weale v. Wells, 3 Bulst. 284; Comyns's Dig. title, Pleader, 2 k. In the process of time a change was effected in the manner of pleading the cause of action, by which the plaintiff anticipated this plea by averring in the declaration a want of probable cause, and the facts were presented under the general issue. Ball v. Rawles, supra, citing Savil v. Roberts, 1 Salk. 13, L.R.A.1915D.

The full report of State v. Phelps, Kirby, 282, decided in 1787, reads: "On a criminal prosecution it was moved that the state's attorney might testify what the prisoner had disclosed to him, upon an application to be admitted a witness for the state; which the court refused, and said:—Disclosures, under such circumstances, to the attorney, ought to be considered as confidential, and it would tend to defeat the benefits the public may derive from them, should they be made use of to the prejudice of those from whom they come." In Oliver v. Pate, 43 Ind. 132, it was held that the attorney and client rule applied, but for a 1 Ld. Raym. 374. However, this change in pleading by transferring to the declaration the averment of a want of probable cause, although it imposed upon the plaintiff the necessity of making proof of this negative averment as a part of his cause of action, did not change the issue from one of law to one of fact; for unless such want of probable cause was proved by him, it became the duty of the court to determine as a matter of law that he had no cause of action against the defendant; and since such probable cause is a legal conclusion to be drawn from the facts, and its absence is an essential element to the plaintiff's right of action, it is at all times to be determined by the court whether the facts proved constituted such probable cause, just as, under the original system, the court determined upon the demurrer to the facts set up in the defendant's plea whether there were sufficient grounds for his suspicion. Ball v. Rawles, supra.

And in Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 193, relied on in the Ball Case, supra, the court, speaking in the same connection and citing Pain v. Rochester, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 871, and other cases in which the facts alleged to constitute probable cause were set forth in the plea, the sufficiency of which was decided upon demurrer, said: "And although the practice which then obtained has been altered for a great length of time, by introducing into the declaration not only the statement that the charge was false and malicious, but also that it was made without reasonable or probable cause, and thereby compelling the plaintiff to give some evidence thereof, and enabling the defendant to prove his case under the plea of not guilty, yet the rule of law that this question belongs to the judge only, and not to the jury, is not by such alteration in pleading in any way impaired."

b. When facts are disputed.

1. Generally.

As already intimated, the condition of the evidence in the great majority of cases may require the assistance of the jury in determining the question of probable cause. In this connection the court in Young v.

reason thus stated: "Public policy requires that a person in making communications to a prosecuting attorney, relative to criminals or persons suspected of being guilty of crime, should be at liberty to make a full statement to him without fear of disclosure." Page 141. The case of Vogel v. Gruaz, 110 U. S. 311, 28 L. ed. 158, 160, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12, 14, is one of the same character, citing the Indiana case with approval, and adding: "The free and unembarrassed administration of justice in respect to the criminal law, in which the public is concerned, is involved in a case like the present, in addition to the considerations which ordinarily apply in communications from client to counsel in matters of purely private concern. . . . But there is another view of the subject. The matter concerned the administration of penal justice, and the principle of public safety justifies and demands the rule of exclusion." Page 316. In State v. Houseworth, 91 Iowa, 740, 60 N. W. 221, it was decided that a statute forbidding the disclosure of any confidential communication intrusted to an attorney in his professional capacity protected communications made to a prosecuting officer by a complaining witness. In Gabriel v. McMullin, 127 Iowa, 426, 430, 103 N. W. 355, Nichol, 9 Ont. Rep. 347, remarked: "Whether or not there is reasonable or probable cause is a question for the court. But each case must depend upon its own special circumstances as to what will or will not constitute reasonable and probable cause, and in nine cases out of ten, if not ninety-nine out of a hundred, the question of reasonable and probable cause depends so much upon facts in dispute that the court can only rarely decide without the aid of the jury."

So, in strict accord with the general rule previously stated, the law is well settled that when the question of probable cause depends upon substantially disputed facts, and upon inferences of fact to be drawn therefrom, it is for the jury to weigh the conflicting testimony, estimate the credibility of the witnesses, find the inferences warranted by such facts, and determine what the truth is, and whether the facts and circumstances relied on to show the existence or absence of probable cause are sufficiently established, and for the court to decide whether or not they amount to probable cause. Or, as the rule is sometimes stated, the truth and existence of the facts and circumstances is a question of fact exclusively for the jury; but whether they amount to probable cause is a question of law exclusively for the court.

In the Lavender case the court, sustaining an instruction that, "if the jury believe from the evidence that under all the facts and circumstances as proven by the evidence, the defendants had no reasonable or probable cause to believe that the plaintiff had committed a felony, and still they procured his arrest, they are guilty," said: "The question of probable cause is composed of law and fact, it being the province of the jury to determine whether the circumstances alleged are true or not, and of the court to determine whether they amount to probable cause. Regularly, the facts material to this question are first to be found by the jury, and the judge is then to decide, as a point of 356, that decision was approved; but the court added: "But, aside from the statute, we think the rule of exclusion should be applied to all matters concerning the administration of justice, on the ground of public policy. A county attorney is an officer whose duty it is to investigate crime and to prosecute therefor, not in the interest of the individual who may have suffered, but for the good of the state; and it is very clear to us that it is not only the privilege, but the duty, of every citizen who knows of facts tending to show the commission of a crime, to communicate such information to the public officer whose duty it is to investigate the matter and to commence a criminal prosecution if a crime has been committed. Any other rule would hamper the administration of justice. A party having knowledge of facts tending to show that a crime has been committed will hesitate to lay such facts before the proper officer if the information thus given may be made the basis of an action for damages against him." The cases of Granger v. Warrington, 8 Ill. 299, and Cole v. Andrews, 74 Minn. 93, 76 N. W. 962, are directly to the contrary; but in each case the question chiefly discussed was whether the relation of attorney law, whether the facts, as found, establish probable cause or not. But if the matter of fact and matter of law, of which the probable cause consists, are intimately blended together, the judge will be warranted in leaving the question to the jury."

The jury may find from the evidence want of probable cause, and yet find that there was no malice in prosecuting the legal proceedings complained of, and in such case their verdict should be for the defendant," and Keesling v. Doyle, 8 Ind. App. 43, 35 N. E. 126, where the appellate court, answering the objection that an instruction given by the trial court of its own motion directed the jury that if they found certain facts to be true, they would be justified in finding that the appellants began the prosecution maliciously and without probable cause, said: "We cannot give such a construction to the instruction. The court, by this instruction, simply told the jury that, in determining the question of malice and the want of probable cause, they might take into consideration certain things, but the court does not say that the finding of any given state of and client existed, and in the latter it was held that, if the privilege could otherwise have been claimed, it had been lost by waiver. In People v. Davis, 52 Mich. 569, 18 N. W. 362, 363, it was held that on the trial of a criminal case it was proper to allow the defendant to show, for the purpose of impeachment, that the complaining witness had made statements to the prosecuting attorney inconsistent with his testimony. The reason given was that public policy required an acquittal unless the accused was in fact guilty. The court said: "We are not called upon in this case to consider whether there may not be cases in which the prosecuting attorney would be excused, in the interest of the state, from disclosing what had been told to him with a view to the commencement of criminal proceedings. There would be strong reasons in many cases why the counsel of the state should be inviolably kept; and nothing we shall say in this case will be intended to lay down a rule except for the very case at bar and others standing upon the same facts." Page 573. A similar rule was applied in Marks v. Beyfus, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 494, where it was said: "If upon the trial of a prisoner the judge should be of opinion that the disclosure of the name of the informant is necessary or right in order to show the prisoner's innocence, then one public policy is in conflict with another public policy, and that which says that an innocent man is not to be condemned when his innocence can be proved is the policy that must prevail."

facts as true would constitute malice or want of probable cause. All of the issuable facts stated in the instruction were proper to be considered by the jury in determining whether or not such prosecution was malicious and without probable cause."

Adams*, 159 Mich. 560, 124 N. W. 540, where the court said: "We are also of the opinion that the question whether defendant had probable cause for making the complaint was a question of fact for the jury. While the conduct of the plaintiff was not commendable, we do not think it alone justified the defendant, as a matter of law, in causing his arrest without further inquiry. The plaintiff's statement of what occurred differs in some respects from the defendant's statement, and if the jury believed his statement and found that those grubs in the middle of the road had twice before been cut down by the public authorities, and that defendant must have known of such cutting, and that Gouzewaard informed him that the overseer of highways had endeavored to induce his father to cut out these same grubs, and that, for the most part, the grubs were third growth from the original stumps, and constituted a nuisance in the highway, these facts, with the other circumstances disclosed by the record, would require the submission of the question of probable cause to the jury." L.R.A.1915D.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

JAMES SIMMONS, Resp.,
v.

G. R. GARDNER et al., Appt.

(46 Wash. 282, 89 Pac. 887.)

Malicious prosecution—probable cause—question of law.

1. The question of the existence of probable cause for a prosecution is one of law where the prosecutor made a full, truthful, and complete statement of facts to a reputable attorney and acted upon his advice.

Possibly these cases are not in conflict with the earlier decisions in this jurisdiction as they may mean to submit only the existence of the facts to the jury with proper instructions from the court as to the law applicable thereto. But it seems quite clear that such a construction cannot be given to the decision in Davis v. McMillan, 142 Mich. 391, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 928, 113 Am. St. Rep. 585, 105 N. W. 862, 7 Ann. Cas. 854, to the effect that the question of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution is for the jury, where, upon the facts disclosed, there is room for two opinions, for the court said: "We feel warranted in saying that the discharge of the defendant in this case has not in itself any tendency to show a want of probable cause, but we are also of the opinion that it was proper to submit to the jury the question of probable cause. The only proof that the plaintiff offered to show want of probable cause was the fact of the arrest and discharge, the failure to accurately state the pretense, and the relations theretofore sustained by the parties. If from these the jury might conclude that an ordinarily fair and careful business man would be likely to believe in plaintiff's guilt, they should find probable cause and acquit the defendants. But that is essentially a question for the jury where there is room for two opinions; and there may be here. Therefore the court could not properly take the cause from the jury upon the ground that want of probable cause had not been shown." And see also Bartlett v. Jenkins, 150 Mich. 682, 114 N. W. 679.

Same — larceny — possession of loot.

2. Probable cause for a prosecution for larceny exists as matter of law against an employee of a storage company, where he is frequently with another employee who has a key to a room containing slot machines, and both of them play into machines about town slugs of a peculiar pattern identical with those taken from machines in the room which have been forced open, where the facts were stated to a reputable attorney who advised a prosecution.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County

119 N. W. 215, citing Chapman v. Dodd, 10 Minn. 350, Gil. 277, and Fiola v. McDonald, 85 Minn. 147, 88 N. W. 431, and holding that where the evidence was conflicting, the question of probable cause was properly submitted to the jury, as it was a question of fact. A holding of this kind, however, does not seem necessarily in conflict with the rule sustained in the majority of cases in this jurisdiction, for the reason just stated in connection with the Michigan cases.

facts, that the defendant had probable cause for instituting the prosecution against the plaintiff, was proper. Whether he had such cause or not depended partly upon the undisputed facts in the case, partly upon facts which were in dispute, and which were required to be determined by the judge from the evidence, exercising in that regard the function of a jury, and partly upon facts and inferences to be deduced by the judge, in the exercise of the same function, from circumstances connected with the conduct of the parties. The real question which the case presented at the time when this request was submitted was whether, from all the facts in the case, both those which were not in dispute and those which were settled by the court, probable cause for instituting the prosecution against the plaintiff appeared; and this question was the question which the trial judge decided." But see Tyler v. Mahoney, 166 N. C. 509, 82 S. E. 870, where this curious statement is made by the court: "The question of probable cause in cases like this is a mixed one of law and fact, leaving for the jury to determine from the evidence as a matter of fact whether the circumstances of the case show the cause to be probable or not probable; but whether, supposing them to be true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law for the judge." The Wilkinson Case, supra, was cited as authority for this statement, but the opinion in that case, reviewing and approving many of the court's earlier decisions, seems so clear on this question that it is indeed difficult to understand how it could ever rightfully be made the parent of any such abnormality. Such expressions as this tend only to confuse and might be easily avoided. If the court desired to change the rule to which it committed itself in such strong terms in Beale v. Roberson, 29 N. C. (7 Ired. L.) 280, and to hold that the jury is to determine the entire question of probable cause when the facts are in dispute, but that the court is to perform this function when there is no dispute as to the facts, it might, it seems, have chosen more appropriate language. As it is, however, the decision is practically meaningless.

MATSON v. MICHAEL is in accord with this rule.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Watson, 37 Kan. 773, 15 Pac. 877, the court said: "The rule is that in a case where there is a substantial dispute about facts constituting the existence or want of probable cause, it is for the jury to determine what facts L.R.A.1915D.

are proved, and for the court to say whether or not they amount to probable cause. It is therefore generally the duty of the court in such a case, when evidence is given tending to prove or disprove the existence of probable cause, to submit to the jury its credibility, and what facts it proves, with instructions that the facts found amount to proof of probable cause, or that they do not. The court should group the facts in the instructions, which the evidence tends to prove, and then instruct the jury that if they find such facts have been established, they must find that there was or was not probable cause. . . . This rule must not be made a pretext by which a question primarily for the court is transferred to the jury. There must be a substantial dispute about the existence of probable cause before it can properly go to the jury, and if about the facts that are claimed to prove or disprove probable cause, there can fairly be said to be a dispute, a conflict of testimony, irreconcilable statements of witnesses, a strong flavor of improbability, then the jury are the sole judges of these, as of every other material fact in the case; but if the evidence on this question, fairly considered and impartially weighed, produces in the mind of the court a reasonable conviction of the existence or want of probable cause, then it is the clear duty of the court to instruct the jury accordingly. The dispute must be of such character as to compel the court to weigh evidence and determine the credibility of witnesses, before it ceases to be a question of law for the court, and becomes an issue of fact for the jury. Whenever the evidence of the existence or want of probable cause produces in the mind of the court a reasonable doubt as to its proper determination, then it should be submitted to the jury."

This statement of the law is found in Pennsylvania Co. v. Weddle, 100 Ind. 138: "The instructions given by the court upon the subject of probable cause left to the jury the question of whether the facts constituted probable cause. This was error. It was for the jury to find the facts, and for the court to decide whether or not the facts constituted probable cause for the

N. W. 522; Cohn v. Saidel, 71 N. H. 558, 53 Atl. 800.

Crow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for malicious prosecution by James Simmons, plaintiff, against G. R. Gardner and the Seattle Transfer Company, a corporation, defendants. A jury trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered. The defendants have appealed.

The Seattle Transfer Company for some years past has been engaged in the transfer and storage business in the city of Seattle, having numerous employees, of whom the respondent, James Simmons, was one, and the appellant, G. R. Gardner, an-prosecution. The authorities are well agreed that whether the facts proved or assumed do or do not constitute probable cause is a question of law to be decided by the court, and not by the jury. In Brown v. Connelly, 5 Blackf. 390, it was said: 'Whether any given facts amount to a probable cause for the prosecution is a question of law. Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 T. R. 545, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Revised Rep. 263, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 766; Blachford v. Dod, 2 Barn. & Ad. 179, 9 L. J. K. B. 196.' The court in Panton v. Williams, 1 Gale & D. 504, said: 'It is the duty of the judge to inform the jury, if they find the facts to be proved, and the inferences to be warranted by such facts, the same do or do not amount to reasonable or probable cause, so as thereby to leave the question of fact to the jury, and the abstract question of law to the judge.' The same doctrine is thus expressed by another court: 'Whether the circumstances alleged to show it probable are true and existed is a matter of fact for the jury. But whether, supposing them true, they amount to probable cause, is a question of law for the court.' By the same court it was said: 'Either party, upon request, would have been entitled to a direct and specific instruction from the presiding judge, as to whether the alleged facts set up in defense, if proved, did or did not show want of probable cause.' Humphries v. Parker, 52 Me. 502; Pullen v. Glidden, 68 Me. 559. In a note to the text the American editor of Addison on Torts says: 'What facts and circumstances amount to probable cause is wholly a question for the court.' 2 Addison, Torts, Wood's ed. § 853, n. Another author says: 'The existence of reasonable and probable cause is a question of law for the judge.' Moak's Underhill, Torts, 166. By another author it is said of the question of probable cause, that 'it is now conclusively settled that it is one of law.' Proffatt, Jury Trials, § 271. On the same subject still another author says in speaking of the question of probable cause, that 'it is to be determined by the court as a question of law.' Wells, Questions of Law & Fact, § 291. The rule upon the subject L.R.A.1915D.

is, for practical purposes, rather better stated by Hilliard than by the other authors. This author says: 'If there are contested facts, he' (the judge) 'should charge the jury hypothetically upon the state of facts claimed by each party.' At another place it is said: 'A party has a right to the opinion of the court distinctly on the law, on the supposition that he has established, to the satisfaction of the jury, certain facts.' 1 Hilliard, Torts, 460, § 23. It would not be profitable to cite the cases upon this subject, and we refer only to a few of the many which we have examined. Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1; Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 116; Cole v. Curtis, 16 Minn. 182, Gil. 161; Driggs v. Burton, 44 Vt. 124; Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644. . . . It is clear from the authorities that where the facts are not disputed, the court must decide, as matter of law, whether they do or do not constitute probable cause; but where they are disputed, then the court must hypothetically state the material facts which there is evidence fairly tending to prove, and positively direct as to the law upon the assumed state of facts. Where the evidence is conflicting, the court must charge the law upon the conflicting theories, and in no event leave the question of law to be decided by the jury, since that would be a surrender of the functions of the judge, which the law will not allow him to make. A judge can neither evade nor escape the duty of declaring the law to the jury. The two provinces of court and jury are essentially distinct, and the court, while not allowed to decide questions of fact, cannot abdicate its own functions by leaving to the jury the decision of questions of law. The confusion into which a few of the courts have fallen is attributable to the fact that they have lost sight of the distinction between the two provinces, and have forgotten that there are in almost every case two elements, one of law and one of fact, of which one is wholly within the province of the court, and the other within the province of the jury. The question of probable cause is often a composite one, since the dispute may be other; the former being a packer of merchandise, and the latter a special detective. Early in January, 1906, the company learned that certain slot machines which it held in storage had been forced open, and that about 2,000 slugs, of the value of $10, had been taken therefrom. Shortly thereafter, the appellant company, claiming it had information indicating that the slugs had been stolen by the respondent, Simmons, and another employee named Tracy, caused the appellant Gardner to make a complaint charging them with petit larceny. A warrant was issued, and they were arrested. The respondent, Simmons, was thrown into jail, where he remained for two or three days, until released on bond. About ten days later, after learning that

Tracy had six small children dependent on him, with no other person to care for them, appellants called upon the prosecuting attorney and asked his consent to dismiss the criminal prosecution against Tracy. They were accompanied by Tracy himself, and claim that he admitted his guilt, and implicated Simmons. The appellants further stated to the prosecuting attorney that, if Tracy was released, they did not think it would be just to prosecute Simmons, and asked for his discharge also. Both defendants were then discharged, with the consent of the prosecuting attorney, upon payment of costs by the appellants. The respondent, Simmons, thereupon instituted this action for malicious prosecution.

both as to the law and as to the facts, but this does not change the respective duties of court and jury, for the dispute as to the law is to be settled by the court, while the dispute as to the facts is to be settled by the jury. In the case at bar the theory of the trial court was radically wrong. The facts hypothetically assumed in the instructions were not only such as tended to establish probable cause, but were, if true, such as in law did constitute probable cause. It was therefore the duty of the court to instruct the jury, not that the facts assumed might be considered as tending to establish probable cause, but that they did in law constitute probable cause. Instead of leaving the question to the jury, as to whether the facts did or did not constitute probable cause, the court should have pronounced the law upon the facts, leaving to the jury only the settlement of the dispute as to the existence or nonexistence of the facts."

In Boyer v. Bugher, 19 Wyo. 463, 120 Pac. 171, the court said: "The existence of probable cause involves the consideration of what the facts are, and what may reasonably be deduced from the facts. Hence it is a mixed question of law and fact. If the facts are not in dispute, the question is for the court, but upon disputed facts the jury must be left to pass under proper instructions. Cooley, Torts, 181. In Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 194, 25 L. ed. 116, 119, Mr. Justice Strong, delivering the opinion of the court, quoted approvingly the following statement of the doctrine found in Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 493, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 765: 'The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and of fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show it probable are true and existed is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them to be true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law.' And the learned justice continued the discussion of the question by saying: 'It is therefore generally the duty of the court, when evidence has been given to prove or disprove the existence of probable cause, to submit to the jury its credibility and what fact it proves, with instructions that the facts found amount to proof of probable cause, or that they do not. Taylor v. Willans, 2 Barn. & Ad. 845, 1 L. J. K. B. N. S. 17. There may be, and there doubtless are, some seeming exceptions to this rule, growing out of the nature of the evidence, as when the question of the defendants' belief of the facts relied upon to prove want of probable cause is involved. What their belief was is always a question for the jury.' With reference to the province of the court and jury, respectively, in determining the existence or want of probable cause, the result of the authorities in this country is stated in 26 Cyc. 108-109, as follows: 'Primarily what constitutes probable cause is a question of judicial opinion. What facts, and whether all or sufficient undisputed facts, constitute probable cause, is therefore determined exclusively by the court. The general rule is that, where there is a substantial dispute as to what the facts are, it is for the jury to determine what the truth is, and whether the circumstances relied on as a charge or justification are sufficiently established, and for the court to decide whether they amount to probable cause. According to the general, but not the universal, opinion, it is error to leave it to the jury, not only to determine the facts, but also whether they constitute probable cause; the court, not the jury, should draw that inference. The court may take a special verdict and determine the question of probable cause thereon as a matter of law, or it may instruct the jury hypothetically within the range of facts which the evidence tends to establish, as to what constitutes probable cause, and thus leave it to the jury to determine only the facts.'"

In Coleman v. Heurich, 2 Mackey, 189, where the trial judge left the question of probable cause and of malice entirely open for the decision of the jury upon the circumstances of the case, the court on appeal said: "The plaintiff contends that it was the duty of the judge, of his own motion, in the absence of special request to do so, to point out the facts testified to bearing

The appellants contend that the trial court erred in denying their motion for a directed verdict, made at the close of the evidence, and in support of such contention insist that the prosecution of Simmons was upon probable cause; that it was instituted after they had fully and truthfully stated all facts and circumstances known to them, to their own attorney, and also to the prosecuting attorney of King county, both of whom advised criminal prosecution; and that the prosecuting attorney drew the complaint upon which it was based. While they admit the criminal prosecution and its dismissal, they deny that it was without probable cause, or that it was malicious.

The respondent, after showing his arrest, upon the question of probable cause, and to instruct the jury that those facts, if found by them, did or did not constitute probable cause. The authorities relied on in support of this contention place the reason for the rule upon the anomalous nature of the inquiry, which in form is a negative averment made in the declaration and requiring some proof to be adduced in its support by the plaintiff; and also upon the intrinsic perplexity and difficulty of the question, which for that reason may always more properly be dealt with by the court. On the other hand, it is insisted that there should be nothing special in the treatment of this class of cases by the court; and that, particularly where there is a decided conflict in the testimony, the whole inquiry should be left to the jury for their determination. The question seems to be by no means free from difficulty, on the words of the authorities, though that difficulty appears to have arisen largely from the want of exactness in the expressions employed in stating the rule. Thus, in 2 Greenl. Ev. § 454, the author, after stating that the facts material to this question are first to be found by the jury, and the judge is then to decide, as a point of law, whether the facts so found establish probable cause or not, says: 'But if the matter of fact and matter of law, of which the probable cause consists, are intimately blended together, the judge will be warranted in leaving the question to the jury.' This last sentence would appear at first to justify the ruling of the judge below in the case at bar, but in my opinion such is not the meaning intended to be conveyed by the author. We understand the law in actions for malicious prosecutions to be well settled, that where the defense of probable cause involves undisputed facts,—as where the defendant in his plea justifies his action as having been taken in performance of duty, as by an officer under command or by a sheriff executing the mandate of a competent court, and it is not disputed that the proof establishes the truth of the facts so pleaded,—the judge, without leaving the examination of the facts to the jury, imprisonment, and discharge, testified that he was innocent of the charge made, and denied that he had taken any slugs or knew of Tracy taking any. Tracy, who testified on behalf of respondent, denied that he knew of respondent taking or having any slugs. Respondent offered evidence to show that the appellant Gardner, accompanied by other parties, called upon him and Tracy at the jail, and questioned them separately as to a certain surveyor's instrument of considerable value which was missing from the warehouse, then stating that he cared nothing about the stolen slugs, but wanted to find the missing instrument. This evidence was denied by Gardner and the parties who were with him, although they admit that he did ask about the lost instrushould, as a matter of course, declare his opinion whether the facts referred to constitute probable cause in law, or do not. Such action of the judge would be in accordance with the universal practice of the courts where numbers of questions compounded of law and facts are presented in the course of a trial, which must be wholly decided by the judge; as, for instance, the proper construction or proper execution of writings, the competency of witnesses; whether a confession offered in evidence should be excluded because of previous threats or promises; whether there has been sufficient proof of loss of an original paper, and of search for it, to justify the introduction of secondary evidence of its contents; whether a communication is to be protected as confidential, etc. In each of these cases there may be serious questions of disputed fact to be determined upon examination of witnesses, but such evidence, however extended and conflicting, is solely for the courts, and is never submitted to the jury; and the decision of the judge is based upon the credibility of the facts as well as the law. But the inquiry arose whether the same rule should prevail where the facts were numerous and the evidence greatly conflicting, and closely blended with the principles of law governing the question of probable cause; and the language is intended as a negative reply to this inquiry, and a declaration cited from Greenleaf assumes that in such cases the court would depart from this strict practice, and would leave to the jury to decide upon the facts, advising them that as they should find the facts one way or the other, so the legal question of the existence of probable cause would stand. But we find no warrant in reason or authority for the position that the judge is authorized to submit the whole matter to the jury to determine for themselves the questions of law as well as of fact. And when it is remembered that the defendant in this form of action is held to be fully justified if it appears he made the arrest upon the advice of counsel learned in the law that there existed probable cause for his action, while the amplest ment. It does not appear that the appellants ever claimed that either Tracy or Simmons had taken or stolen the instrument. The appellants introduced evidence showing that, for some time prior to the arrest, continued pilfering had been in progress at the warehouse; that, in addition to other losses, several slot machines had been opened and slugs taken therefrom; that Mr. Simmons, when intoxicated, had said to one Arnold, the company's foreman, "Well, Arnold, old boy, you want to watch that man Tracy;" that, being asked why, he said, "Well, old Jim ain't going to get in trouble, but I will tell you now that there is things going on that ain't right, and you had better watch that fellow Tracy;" that Simmons refused to make any further statement; that thereafter Tracy and Simmons were frequently seen together; that they visited different saloons, where Tracy played the missing slugs into the slot machines; that they drank on his winnings; that the slugs played by Tracy were of a peculiar design, identical with those missed from the warehouse, but not like any others known in the city; that they were afterwards taken from the machines where Tracy played them; that Tracy had been seen giving some of the slugs to Simmons, who played them in other machines; that Tracy had a key which admitted him to the warehouse where the machines were stored; that appellants had told all these facts and circumstances to their attorney and to the prosecuting at-proof that he acted upon the advice of laymen, however intelligent, is held to be entirely immaterial, it would seem to be a strange inconsistency to leave the determination of the same question at the trial to a jury of laymen, instead of again leaving its decision to one learned in the law,—the judge on the bench. Again: If there is any point that may be raised in such a trial, that each party might reasonably wish to submit to an appellate court, it would be the question whether the act complained of was one of wrong and oppression, or was one of duty justified by the surrounding facts. And yet, if the jury is authorized to decide this complicated and difficult inquiry, its decision upon the legal questions involved would be final and beyond re-examination. The correct position, as I conceive it to be, is sustained by the best-considered authorities. Thus, in 1 Taylor on Evidence, § 26, the author, who has been discussing the duty of the judge to instruct the jury upon certain subjects, proceeds as follows: First. It is now clearly established—albeit the wisdom of the rule has recently been stoutly disputed—that the question of probable cause must be decided exclusively by the judge, and that the jury can only be permitted to find whether the facts alleged in support of the presence or absence of probability, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, really exist. For instance, in an action for malicious prosecution, the jury, provided the evidence on the subject be conflicting, may be asked whether or not the defendant, at the time when he prosecuted, knew of the existence of those circumstances which tend to show probable cause, or believed that they amounted to the offense which he charged; and if they negative either of these facts, the judge will decide, as a point of law, that the defendant had no probable cause for instituting the prosecution; and this rule—which is based on the assumption that judges are far more competent than juries to determine the question how far it may have been proper for a person to have instituted a prosecution—is equally binding however numerous and complicated the facts and inferences may be. In a note to this section, the author quotes the decision of Tindal, Ch. J., in the case of Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 192, as follows: 'Upon the bill of exceptions we take the broad question between the parties to be this, whether in a case in which the question of reasonable or probable cause depends, not upon a few simple facts, but upon facts which are numerous and complicated, and upon inferences to be drawn therefrom, it is the duty of the judge to inform the jury that if they find the facts proved and the inferences to be warranted by such facts, the same do or do not amount to reasonable or probable cause; so as thereby to leave the question of fact to the jury, and the abstract question of law to the judge, and we are all of opinion that it is the duty of the judge so to do.' This doctrine, so firmly established in England, is equally well settled here in jurisdictions entitled to our entire respect. In Maryland it has never been the practice to charge the jury in civil cases, except in response to specific prayers for instructions. But this established practice is departed from by the courts there in actions for malicious prosecution. A reference to some of the later decisions of the appellate court of that state will fully sustain this assertion. Thus, in the case of Boyd v. Cross, 35 Md. 197, the court says: 'The want of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. As to the existence of the facts relied on to constitute the want of probable cause, that is a question for the jury; but what will amount to the want of probable cause in any case is a question of law for the court. The jury in our practice are always instructed hypothetically as to what constitutes probable cause, or the want of it, leaving to them to find the facts embraced in the hypothesis.' This language is quoted totidem verbis in Cooper v. Utterbach, 37 Md. 317, and in the same volume, at page 386, in the case of Stansbury v. Fogle, the court says: 'It is now the established doctrine, both in this country and in England, that what facts and circumstances amount torney fully and truthfully; and that the prosecuting attorney thereupon drew the complaint and advised the prosecution. The prosecuting attorney himself, as a witness for the appellants, confirmed these statements, detailing at length all of the information communicated to him. Witnesses were also introduced by appellants who testified that Tracy and Simmons had been seen frequently in saloons where Tracy played the slugs; that they were then drinking together; that the slugs were afterwards taken from the machines; that Tracy gave some of them to Simmons, who played them himself; that they had communicated all of this information to the appellants prior to the arrest; that Simmons and Tracy had access to the room where the machines were stored, Tracy having a key in his possession.

Upon this showing, the appellants contend they were entitled to a directed verdict, and insist, not only that these facts and circumstances of themselves were probable cause, but further contend that when they had fully and truthfully detailed to the prosecuting attorney all these facts and circumstances as known to them, and were advised by him to proceed, such showing constituted probable cause preventing recovery by the respondent. It is not the policy of the law that any citizen shall be wrongfully subjected to a criminal prosecution instituted with malice and without probable cause. It is, however, the policy of the law that, when probable cause does to probable cause is a question of law, but whether these facts and circumstances exist in the particular case is for the jury. In this state the jury are instructed hypothetically as to what constitutes probable cause, leaving it to them to find the facts embraced in the hypothesis.' In Metcalf v. Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. 45 Md. 205, the court quotes the same sentence, and says: 'This course was not adopted in the present case. The appellant prayed the court to instruct the jury that the question whether the defendant had probable cause for instituting the criminal proceedings against him was one to be decided by the jury upon all the evidence in the case. . . . The appellant's prayer submitted to the jury a question of law, and was therefore improper.' And in the recent case of Johns v. Marsh, 52 Md. 333, the court says: 'Now, while it is perfectly well settled that if there be reasonable or probable cause to the knowledge and honest belief of the defendant, no malice, however flagrant or distinctly proved, will make the defendant liable, yet the question as to what does or does not amount to probable cause is not one to be submitted to the findings and conclusions of a jury. That question is one compounded of law and facts; and while the jury are required to find whether the facts alleged in support of the presence or absence of probable cause, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, really exist, it is for the court to determine whether upon the facts so found there be probable cause or the want of it. In view of this well-established principle, the prayer was properly rejected, even if it had been free from all other objection.' Such a course would be especially proper in this jurisdiction, where the judges always charge the jury irrespective of the instructions asked. For these reasons we think there was error in this part of the judge's charge."

In Ash v. Marlow, 20 Ohio, 119, the judge gave sundry definitions of the term "probable cause," and after directing the jury to ascertain how far the facts were proved, said: "Apply to them the test, the rule of law which I have laid down to you. Ask yourselves conscientiously, 'Are the facts and circumstances that we have found so strong in themselves as to warrant an impartial, ingenuous, and reasonable man, of common capacity, with the caution usually exercised by such a man in the defendant's situation, but not under the influence of any improper motive, to believe the plaintiff guilty of the crime charged against him?' If they are sufficient to warrant that belief, in such a mind, that conclusion, when deliberately arrived at by you, will terminate your labors; and you will return to this court your verdict of not guilty. If your conclusion on the facts relied on to show the existence of reasonable or probable cause shall be adverse to the defendants, your deliberations will proceed." The appellate court, answering that there was no force in the objection that the judge did not instruct the jury that the facts relied upon by the defendants did or did not amount to probable cause, said that "probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact; and if the facts are contested the court must leave them to the jury with instructions as to what is 'probable cause.'" It seems, in view of the instruction of the trial court, that the decision in this case plainly submits to the jury the determination of the question whether the facts found are within the definition of probable cause, that is whether they amount to probable cause, which question, according to the general rule, is for the determination of the court.

But in Doll v. Schoenberg, 2 Disney (Ohio) 54, the court said: "When it is said that what is probable cause is for the decision of the court, and the truth of the facts upon which it is predicated, for the jury, no new doctrine is asserted. It is but the utterance of what we read in every carefully digested and well-reasoned legal adjudication upon the subject. There is no doubt of what the rule is in England. Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 191, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545, which but affirms the law as laid down in Coxe v. Wirral, Cro. Jac. 193, and Pain v. Rochester, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 871. Indeed, the doctrine has become so undisputed there exist, a criminal prosecution shall be instituted. In Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 228, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937, 938, the court said: "Actions for malicious prosecution have never been favored in law, although they have always been readily upheld when the proper elements therefor have been presented. They are sustained, however, only when it is shown that the prosecution was in fact actuated by malice, and that the party instigating it had no reasonable ground for causing the prosecution. It is for the best interests of society that those who offend against the laws shall be promptly punished, and that any citizen who has good reason to believe that the law has been violated shall have the right to cause the arrest of the offender.

For the purpose of protecting him in so doing, it is the established rule that if he have reasonable grounds for his belief, and act thereon in good faith in causing the arrest, he shall not be subjected to damages merely because the accused is not convicted. This rule is founded upon grounds of public policy, in order to encourage the exposure of crime, and, when the acts of the citizen in making such exposure are challenged as not being within the reason of the rule, the court, as in every other case involving considerations of public policy, must itself determine the question as a matter of law, and not leave it to the arbitrament of a jury." Although it is conceded that the respondent was arrested at the instance of the appellants, and that he that he must be a bold man to question it. In the United States we find a series of decisions asserting the same principle. Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 85; Masten v. Deyo, 2 Wend. 424; Muns v. Dupont, 2 Wash. C. C. 463, Fed. Cas. No. 9,931; Ulmer v. Leland, 1 Me. 135; Ash v. Marlow, supra. But it is said the last case is not decisive of the question; that there are portions of the opinion of the court susceptible of different constructions, and very well sustain the ground assumed by counsel in claiming for the jury the prerogative of the judge. We have often examined this reported case, and do not think, when the opinion is regarded as a whole, and its several parts carefully collated, there is any ground for what we may term the introduction of the new doctrine now asked to be recognized. The decision upon the main point is very clear, for the court say: "Probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact; and if the facts are contested, the court must leave them to the jury, with instructions as to what is probable cause." This quotation certainly is in harmony with the rule as we everywhere find it, and although there are other passages of the decision that do not in so direct terms affirm it, they are explicable upon the idea that they were intended to meet different phases of the argument made by counsel. There may have been a want of directness in stating the precise rule; and when it was stated too much verbiage used to explain it, perhaps thereby obscuring, rather than more clearly illustrating, the point to be determined. But a passing cloud ought not to hide the sun, when by rejecting the shadow we learn at last what is the substance. We cannot appreciate the difficulty that counsel frequently seem to have met in reconciling the doctrine to the spirit of the law which secures a trial by jury. It interferes with no such privilege, but, on the contrary, protects, regulates, and gives it all its true value. It but affirms the legal axiom that the jury have the exclusive judgment of the facts proved, and the verity of the proofs themselves; but they are to receive from the court an exposition L.R.A.1915D.

of the principle by which their determinations are to be made. Thus is secured, and only thus can be secured, the independence and the usefulness of courts and juries. And it is no novel doctrine; it applies to every case where the rule for damages in torts is necessary to be stated; it measures the degree of care and diligence in all fiduciary relations, and decides what is and what is not negligence in the agent. It decides under the law merchant what is due diligence, and what is not, to hold a collateral party to a contract or to discharge him. It determines what is and what is not a reasonable time within which agreements should be fulfilled, when the parties have fixed none themselves. It controls the duties of carriers, underwriters, and every class of professional men, holding them liable or not for the performance of their agreement, whether involving science or skill. When we find the principle thus pervading every department of the law where the action of the court is required in the trial of cases, we should not expect that a suit for a malicious prosecution should be an exception to the established rule. There certainly is no reason why it should be so regarded, and we find no respectable authority that will authorize us to make it. Whenever personal rights are involved, the remedies for their vindication, and what is necessary to constitute a legal claim to a recovery, are within the exclusive control of the judge. He decides what is an assault, what is slander, and so of libel; and in all criminal prosecutions he alone defines what are the necessary elements to make the offense, from simple larceny to homicide. And yet we are asked to exclude the present case from the application of the admitted maxim: Ad questiones juris, iudex dicit. Ad questiones facti, juratores dicunt."

In Finigan v. Sullivan, 65 Wash. 625, 118 Pac. 888, where the main reliance of the appellant was that no want of probable cause was shown, and that notwithstanding the trial court submitted the issue of probable cause to the jury to be determined as a fact, instead of deciding the question as a was afterwards finally discharged, the burden is on him to further show that the criminal prosecution was instituted (1) without probable cause, and (2) with malice. Both of these elements must exist as a condition precedent to a recovery by him. Want of probable cause, without malice, is of no avail; nor will malice of itself be sufficient, if probable cause be shown. It therefore follows that, if probable cause did exist in this case, the respondent can in no event recover.

The appellants insist that there can be no question but that they actually made full and truthful statements to the attorneys who advised the prosecution; that probable cause therefore existed as a matter of law; that, when the facts are not in dispute, the existence or nonexistence of probable cause is a question of law for the court, which should not be submitted to the jury. It is undoubtedly the law that, if any issue of fact exists under all the evidence, as to whether the appellants did fully and truthfully communicate to the attorneys consulted all the facts and circumstances within their knowledge, then such issue of fact must be submitted to the jury, with proper instructions from the court as to what will constitute probable cause, and the existence or nonexistence of probable cause must then be determined by the jury. Voss v. Bender, 32 Wash. 566, 73 Pac. 697. On the other hand, if it appears that the statements to the attorneys were truthful, full, and complete, giv-matter of law, the court said: "No very definite rule can be laid down in this class of cases, for the issue of probable cause is sometimes to be decided as a matter of law, at other times, to be decided as a question of fact, as stated in some of the cases. The last hypothesis is not strictly accurate. When not determined as a matter of law, it is considered rather as a mixed question of law and fact; that is to say, the facts being disputed, the court should declare the law as applied to the facts of the particular case, and leave it to the jury to say whether the facts as found by them bring the party accused within the rule of probable cause. The best statement of the law that we have been able to find is in 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 321. The author says: 'If the facts are not in dispute, the question is for the court. Upon disputed facts, the jury must be left to pass; but the court must determine on the facts found whether or not probable cause existed. As to what facts are sufficient to show probable cause is a question of law for the court, and whether such facts are proved by the evidence is a question for the jury. "The court should group in its instructions the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and then instruct the jury that, if they find such facts to be established, there was or was not probable cause, and that their verdict must be accordingly." It is not competent for the court to give to the jury a definition of probable cause, and instruct them to find for or against the defendant according as they may determine that the facts are within or without the definition.' See also 29 Cyc. 105-107; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 660-673; Newell, Malicious Prosecution, pp. 276, 277. In the case at bar the facts were disputed, and there is much room for difference of opinion. The instructions of the court were within the rule laid down by Judge Cooley. They are singularly explicit, and, after defining probable cause, the court, by hypothetical reference to the facts disclosed by the evidence, left it open to the jury to say whether there was a want of probable cause or not. None of our own L.R.A.1915D.

cases bear directly upon the point at issue, but our present holding is within the logic of Noblett v. Bartsch, 31 Wash. 24, 96 Am. St. Rep. 886, 71 Pac. 551, where, upon a disputed state of facts, this court sustained a ruling that the question of probable cause should be left to the jury; and Simmons v. Gardner, 46 Wash. 282, 89 Pac. 887, where, upon a holding that the facts were undisputed, the court held that probable cause had been shown as a matter of law."

In Cohn v. Saidel, 71 N. H. 558, 53 Atl. 800, the court said: "The refusal to direct a verdict for the defendants was proper. No question of the sufficiency of the plaintiff's declaration being raised, it was only essential to the maintenance of his action that he should satisfy the jury that the proceedings against him instituted by the defendants were malicious and without probable cause. The existence of malice is always exclusively a question for the jury, and so is the question of probable cause so far as it is dependent upon the credibility of the evidence which has been given to prove or disprove its existence. Hence, although in an action for malicious prosecution it is a complete defense that the defendant acted in good faith and upon the advice of counsel learned in the law, after fully and fairly laying the case before him, the court has no right, and will not undertake, to pass upon the credibility of the evidence, with all the inference which the jury could justifiably draw from it in respect of these requirements."

Answering the contention that there was a great difference between the law as held in England on this question, and the law as held in Tennessee, by virtue of the provisions of the state Constitution on the subject, the court in Williams v. Norwood, 2 Yerg. 329, said: "A difference is supposed by the argument to exist as to the mode of trial of 'probable cause' in the action of malicious prosecution, between the law in England and the law in this state. The difference is predicated upon the 5th section of the 5th article of our Constitution, which says: 'Courts shall not charge juries with respect to matters ing all material facts and circumstances within the knowledge or information of appellants, then the existence or nonexistence of probable cause becomes a question of law for the court, which should not be submitted to the jury. Newell, Malicious Prosecution, pp. 14, 278; Levy v. Fleischner, 12 Wash. 15, 40 Pac. 384; McNulty v. Walker, 64 Miss. 198, 1 So. 55; Krause v. Bishop, 18 S. D. 298, 100 N. W. 434; Anderson v. Friend, 85 Ill. 135; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smith, 60 Kan. 4, 55 Pac. 272; Maynard v. Sigman, 65 Neb. 590, 91 N. W. 576; Rogers v. Olds, 117 Mich. 368, 75 N. W. 933. The supreme court of Illinois in Anderson v. Friend, 85 Ill. 135, said: "It has been uniformly held that where the prosecutor fairly presents all the facts to a respectable practising attorney, who, from such a statement of facts, advises they are sufficient to warrant a prosecution, the prosecutor is protected against a suit for malicious prosecution, and, from the very nature of our criminal laws, it must be so, otherwise there would be no safety in originating such proceedings. But few persons outside the profession can determine, in many cases, whether the facts will justify a criminal conviction; but it is to be presumed that all respectable attorneys in full practice do know, and it is their duty to fairly and honestly advise in these as in all other cases; and, if a prosecutor may not safely act upon such advice, then he has to almost guarantee a conviction when he starts a prosecution.

of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law; but upon examination it will be found rather a seeming difference than a real difference. It will not do to say upon this instrument (the Constitution), as is sometimes broadly said, that probable cause is matter of fact, depends upon the testimony, that the jury are the constitutional judges or triers of the fact, and therefore the judges of what is probable cause, or not probable cause. The Constitution does not warrant this conclusion, that because they are the triers or the judges of the facts, that therefore they are the judges of probable cause; for probable cause is the conclusion or result of law upon the facts, and, to use the expressions in the books, the jurors cannot respond to the law, nor can the judges respond to the facts. Probable cause, then, in malicious prosecution, being a combined operation of fact and law, necessarily requires the intervention of both the jury and the judge, to arrive at the result or conclusion of whether probable cause or not. The correctness of this course on jury trial is proved not only by authority, but by those cases where the intervention of a jury does not take place, from the facts being previously found or ascertained in some other mode, as by plea and demurrer, as stated in the case of Kelton v. Bevins, Cooke (Tenn.) 107, 5 Am. Dec. 670, where, in malicious prosecution, the defendant by plea presents to the court the facts and circumstances on which he relies to show the plaintiff's guilt probable, to which plea there is a demurrer. Then the question of law arises, to which the court must respond, to wit, whether the facts set forth by the plea constitute as their result, or operate in law, the conclusion of probable cause or not. So, in like manner, if the facts relied upon to show the plaintiff's guilt probable were settled by the parties, and presented to the court as an agreed case, there the question with the court is, Does the case agreed amount to probable cause? In, however, by much the greater number of cases, the question arises upon the evidence given to the jury upon the plea of not guilty, and issue joined thereon in the action of malicious prosecution; and in this mode of trial, the respective departments of jury and judge are equally distinct; the respective functions of both being equally necessary to be exercised in coming to the conclusion of law upon the facts, of whether probable cause or otherwise. The jury decided upon the existence of the facts, the judge decides upon their operation in law. Thus, when the evidence is closed, the judge declares to the jury that if they believe the testimony, or facts given in evidence, to be true, the law arising on that testimony is, or that testimony amounts to, probable cause, or not probable cause. And this mode is strictly agreeable to our Constitution above stated. It says, the courts shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact; that is, the courts shall not say that this or that fact is proved or not proved, or that such testimony is to be believed or not believed. Not that the court shall not charge the law upon the facts or testimony; for the next following expression, that they (to wit, the courts) may state the testimony and declare the law, is explicit as to the meaning of the former. It is true that it has been advanced by some very able and learned judges, in former times, that on all personal issues the juries are judges of the law as well as of the fact, and in this capacity they may act upon the matter before them, and find the issue accordingly; and some instances are to be found in the books where juries have with pertinacity acted upon this principle, and returned a second like verdict to the first, after a new trial had been granted because the first verdict was contrary to law, as declared by the judge; a case of this kind took place as late as the time of Lord Mansfield, and when he presided on the trials. But the law at this day is certainly held the other way, pursuant to the common-law doctrine, Ad questionem legis respondent iudices, ad questionem facti respondent juratores, and our Constitution is in accordance with this maxim in the place above cited. That the jury are the triers or judges of the

The criminal law must be enforced, and human agencies must be employed for the purpose, and the law wisely protects all persons who in good faith act on reasonable presumptions of the guilt of the accused: and where the prosecution is commenced on the advice of respectable counsel, after fairly presenting to his consideration all the facts, and he advises that they are sufficient, it cannot be held the prosecution is groundless, and there is a want of probable cause." The supreme court of Michigan in Rogers v. Olds, supra, said: "Citizens must be left free to in good faith state to the proper officers the grounds for their belief that a crime has been committed, and that a certain person is the offender. It is true, they must have reasonable grounds for their belief, and act in good faith. This is all that the law requires. . . . 'This action is strictly guarded. . . . It is never encouraged except in plain cases. Were it otherwise, ill consequences would ensue to the public, for no one would willingly undertake to vindicate a breach of the public law, and to discharge his duty to society, with the prospect of an annoying suit staring him in the face.'"

We are satisfied from undisputed evidence that the appellants did make full, truthful, and complete statements, and that the prosecuting attorney, having all information possessed by them, advised them to proceed. The respondent, however, contends that they did not make a full and fact, and the court the declarers or judges of the law upon the fact, is not now to be disputed. It is not necessary to quote authorities to this general position; it is to be found in every book where the question is touched upon. One only will be cited, not for the purpose of supporting the general proposition, which, however, it does at the same time, but for its being on the very question in the present cause, viz., probable cause in malicious prosecution. It is from Purcel v. M'Namara, 1 Campb. 199. An abstract of it is to be found in Esp. N. P. Dig. pt. 2, p. 130, as follows: 'There is this difference between malice and probable cause, that the one is a question of fact, the other of law. Both must generally be submitted to the jury, but when the facts to show probable cause are ascertained, whether they amount to a defense or not is to be decided by the judge.' This book goes hand in hand with our Constitution on the law, adopting the very principle that the fact belongs to the jury, the law to the judge. It may be then asked, where lies the difference? It is answered, the difference lies not in theory, in principle, or in positive regulation, but in the practice; and in this the judges in England sometimes take the liberty of trespassing upon the principle, and invading the province of the jury, by expressing their opinion on the fact, whether it is proved or not. This constitutes the only difference, a difference in the practice, not in the law; a deviation from the principle, which is corrected and reformed by our Constitution. Having now stated the law as held in England and in this state, and the practice under it in both, it only remains to be seen whether the charge of the judge in the present record is conformable to our Constitution or otherwise. The part objected to is 'that probable cause was composed partly of law and partly of fact, and the court say to the jury, if they believe the testimony of the witnesses, there was, in the opinion of the court, no probable cause.' Now what part of this charge is wrong? Where is the error? We have seen from the books that probable cause is composed of law and fact. In the case of Kelton v. Bevins, supra, cited by the plaintiff in error, the doctrine is thus laid down: 'Our Constitution hinders the judges from charging the jury as to the matters of fact; whenever, therefore, an action of this kind is commenced, and a plea of not guilty pleaded, the jury are to try the question of probable cause, and it is a question then compounded of law and fact. The jury are to decide it as other questions under the direction of the court as to the law. They judge of the facts for themselves, and receive the law from the court.' What language can be more plain than this? It seems to me no comment by way of explanation can add to its clearness. The charge of the judge in the present case is not only in meaning and substance the same, but almost in terms the same. The charge is, 'probable cause is composed partly of law and partly of fact;' the book is, 'It is a question then of law and fact.' But this expression, 'the jury were to try the question of probable cause,' is seized on and made the subject of observation; it is used on argument as though they were to try it solely without the intervention of the court. The expression would bear this construction if it stood alone, and were not explained by what preceded and followed it. The next succeeding passage shows the meaning of the able judge who was delivering his judgment. It is a question then, says he, composed of law and fact,—explaining the meaning of the preceding words that 'the jury are to try the question of probable cause.' How are the jury to try it, it may be asked? The answer follows directly in his next succeeding words. 'The jury are to decide it as any other question under the direction of the court as to the law; they judge of the facts for themselves, and receive the law from the court.' So much from this able and learned judge. Now is not this the very case or proceeding here in this record? Did not the circuit judge leave the facts to the jury themselves, and deliver or declare the law? No language could express this clearer than he has done. He says, 'And the court say to the jury, if they be-truthful statement to the prosecuting attorney; that, as shown by the evidence, the slugs were continually scattered about the floor of the warehouse, where any employee of the company could see or obtain them; that employees did see them, and played them back in the machines to which they belonged; that appellants did not communicate these facts to the attorneys. He also contends that, although appellants told the attorneys Simmons and Tracy had access to the room where the machines were stored, they did not tell them that some fifty other employees had like access during business hours. The evidence does not show the appellants had any knowledge or information that slugs were scattered around, as stated. Hence, they could not make any such a statement to the attorneys. It did appear that, on one occasion when the owner of the machines called at the warehouse to repair some of them, a few slugs fell on the floor while he was working, and that, in his presence and with his knowledge, some employees then present played them back into the machine from which they had fallen. As to the failure to inform the attorneys that all employees had access to the room during business hours, we fail to see how such an omission became material, or how that fact, if told, would remove suspicion from Simmons or Tracy. Simmons had been frequently seen with Tracy, who had a key admitting him at all times. These, and all other material facts, were made known lieve the testimony of the witnesses.' Is not this leaving them to judge of the facts for themselves? He then proceeds, 'There was, in the opinion of the court, no cause.' Was not this receiving the law from the court? My opinion upon this part of the charge is that there is no error."

And in Memphis Gayoso Gas Co. v. Williamson, 9 Heisk. 314, the court said: "The rule as practised upon in Tennessee is that 'whenever an action of this kind is commenced, and a plea of not guilty pleaded, the jury are to try the question of probable cause; and it is a question, then, compounded of law and fact. The jury are to decide it as any other question, under the direction of the court as to the law. They judge of the facts for themselves, and receive the law from the court. But neither in this nor in any other case are our courts at liberty to tell the jury that this or that fact is proved or not proved, or that such and such testimony is to be believed or not believed.' Meigs's Dig. § 1296. In the case of Whirley v. Whiteman, 1 Head, 617, Judge McKinney, in referring to the mode of trying cases consisting of both law and fact, says: 'The truth of the facts and circumstances offered in evidence in support of the allegations on the record must be determined by the jury; but it is for the court to decide whether or not those facts and circumstances, if found by the jury to be true, are sufficient, in point of law, to maintain the allegations in the pleadings. And this must be done in one of two modes,—either the court must inform the jury hypothetically whether or not the facts which the evidence tends to prove will, if established in the opinion of the jury, satisfy the allegations; or the jury must find the facts especially, and then the court will apply the law.' The circuit judges have no duties to perform more embarrassing than those of instructing juries in cases involving mixed questions of law and fact. It is a difficult and delicate task to state, hypothetically, to a jury the proof relied on by the opposite sides, so that each side shall feel that his evidence has been fully and fairly arrayed; L.R.A.1915D.

yet such is the duty to be performed, unless a special verdict is ordered. In the present case the circuit judge first defined what constitutes probable cause: 'It is the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite in a reasonable mind the belief of a right to bring the suit, and the want of probable cause or without probable cause is the want or absence of such reasonable ground as a man of ordinary sagacity would have acted upon under the like circumstances. What these circumstances were you must look to the testimony and find out. The fact that he had brought a suit, if the fact is so, in the state court for substantially the same thing, and had partially failed; the fact, if it was so, that he supposed he could get a more impartial hearing in the Federal court than in the state court; the fact that counsel advised him to bring suit in the United States court, if the fact is so; the fact that a simulated state of facts was made to appear the truth, and sworn to as true,—if these facts are so, all these facts, and all the other facts and circumstances of the case bearing upon or throwing light upon this branch of the case, you will consider in determining whether or not a man of ordinary sagacity would have acted as Dean or Fitch, or those who acted with them, if any did, in bringing that suit; and if you find, under this charge, that a man of ordinary sagacity would have so done, you should find that there was probable cause.' The facts from which probable cause is to be deduced are to be found by the jury; the deduction, as matter of law, is to be made by the court. The rule by which the court determines whether there is probable cause or not is to look at the facts as found by the jury, and from these determine whether a reasonable man, in view of the facts so found, would have instituted the suit. The circuit judge left the jury to find the facts, and he also left to them the deduction as to whether the facts were such as would have induced a man of ordinary sagacity to sue. This was a deduction of law to be made by the court. The objection to the charge is twofold,— to the attorneys. No other employee was shown to have associated with Tracy, under like circumstances. The question was whether probable cause existed against Simmons and Tracy. All known facts or circumstances affecting them were fully and truthfully stated. No question is raised by respondent but that truthful statements were made, except as above suggested, and the appellants' evidence stands without dispute. The facts shown, coupled with the advice given by the prosecuting attorney, constituted probable cause as a matter of law sufficient to justify the prosecution and avoid any recovery by the respondent herein.

The motion for a directed verdict should have been sustained.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the action.

Hadley, Ch. J., and Root, Fullerton, and Mount, JJ., concur.

it fails to lay down with sufficient distinctness and precision the respective duties which devolve upon the court and jury in determining the question of probable cause. In the next, it contains a partial enumeration of facts from which probable cause, or want of probable cause, is to be deduced, leaving the jury to ascertain from the other facts and circumstances what influence they ought to have in determining whether there was probable cause or not. This enumeration of a few of the facts was calculated to give them a prominence in the estimation of the jury which may have misled them as to the importance to be attached to other facts and circumstances not enumerated. Nothing is said in the charge as to the weight to be given, on the question of probable cause, to the fact that Judge Trigg, after argument, entertained jurisdiction of the case and granted the injunction. It is clear that this fact constituted the starting point in the investigation of the question of probable cause. As matter of law, it was sufficient evidence of probable cause until overturned by evidence of fraud or improper conduct in procuring the decision to be made. The burden was on the plaintiff to make proof to overcome this prima facie evidence furnished by the action of the judge. The facts and circumstances relied on by plaintiff to establish fraud or improper contrivance in procuring the injunctions, together with the facts and circumstances relied on by defendants to show that there was no fraud or improper contrivance, should have been submitted to the jury with specific instructions as to what facts and circumstances would, and what would not, amount to such fraud or improper contrivance as would overturn the prima facie force of the action of the court."

In Merriam v. Mitchell, 13 Me. 439, 29 Am. Dec. 514, the trial judge instructed the jury that there was, in point of law, no probable cause for the prosecution; but he submitted certain questions of fact to their consideration, the determination of which was designed to enable the court to decide upon the correctness of this instruction,—and from their finding it appeared that the plaintiff was entirely innocent of the charge preferred against him. On appeal, the case was affirmed.

In Illinois the cases seem to unite in holding that probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact; that after the facts are given in evidence, it is for the court to say in its instructions to the jury whether or not they make up probable cause; and that whether the facts proved constitute probable cause for commencing a criminal proceeding against a party has always been regarded as a question of law. Jacks v. Stimpson, 13 Ill. 701; Israel v. Brooks, 23 Ill. 575; Wade v. Walden, 23 Ill. 425; Brown v. Smith, 83 Ill. 291; Angelo v. Faul, 85 Ill. 106; Schattgen v. Holnback, 149 Ill. 652, 36 N. E. 969; Low v. Greenwood, 30 Ill. App. 184; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 75 Ill. App. 17; Young v. Lindstrom, 115 Ill. App. 239; Barker v. Ronk, 134 Ill. App. 499.

But some of the cases have followed this with the statement that, such being the law, the court should so define probable cause or instruct the jury as to what facts or circumstances, if proved, constitute probable cause, as to enable the jury to apply the law to the facts, and should not leave that body without guidance to pass upon questions of both law and fact. Schattgen v. Holnback, 149 Ill. 646, 36 N. E. 969; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 75 Ill. App. 17.

In the Schattgen Case, the court said: "In the reply brief and argument of counsel for plaintiff in error it seems to be contended that the question of probable cause should be passed upon by this court as one of law, but how it is so presented and can be treated we are at a loss to understand. It is true that we often find it stated that probable cause is a matter of law, to be determined by the court, and where the facts are undisputed that is doubtless the rule easy of application; but where the facts relied upon as showing probable cause are controverted, and the evidence as to their existence is conflicting, it is very clear that they must be settled by the verdict of a jury before the court can apply the law to them. In such case the practice in this state, and many others, has been to treat it as a mixed question of law and fact, to be submitted to the jury under instructions as to what amounts, in law, to probable cause (Newell, Malicious Prosecution, 278, and cases cited in note, 3). A different practice has been adopted by other courts (Driggs v. Burton, 44 Vt. 124; Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937). But we see no good reason for changing the practice here. Defendant's counsel evidently understood the mode of procedure in such trials to be as here indicated. They submitted no questions to the jury for special findings, nor did they ask the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant. On the contrary, they submitted, and the court gave, the following and other like instructions on behalf of the defendant: 'If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant, when he instituted the prosecution complained of, honestly believed the plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged, and the defendant's belief was founded on a knowledge of circumstances tending to show guilt, and sufficient to induce in the mind of an ordinarily reasonable, cautious man the belief in such guilt, then such belief on the part of the defendant negatives the idea of the want of probable cause.' The question then having been properly submitted to the jury without objection, and being without the means of knowing what particular facts were found, we are powerless to determine, as a matter of law, whether probable cause existed or not. It cannot be said the facts are undisputed. It is true that it was not denied that the defendant consulted with the state's attorney and other lawyers, but it was not admitted that he acted in good faith in doing so, or that he fully and fairly stated the facts within his knowledge, or which, by the use of due care, he might have known. These were facts, therefore, to be settled by the jury (Anderson v. Friend, 71 Ill. 475, and cases referred to). We are of the opinion, then, that the question of probable cause was properly submitted to the jury, and that its finding and judgment of affirmances in the appellate court conclusively settle it against plaintiff in error."

And in Davis v. Baker, 88 Ill. App. 251, it was held that whether one acted in good faith and upon evidence sufficient to create in the mind of a prudent and reasonably cautious man a belief that the charges upon which the attachment was issued were true, were questions of fact for the jury.

And in Lasher v. Littell, 202 Ill. 551, 67 N. E. 372, affirming 104 Ill. App. 211, defendant introduced no evidence, but at the close of the plaintiff's evidence moved the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant, which the court declined to do. On appeal it was contended that the court erred in declining to take the case from the jury. But the court said the evidence fairly tended to show want of probable cause for the arrest, and malice, and that there was no error in submitting the case to the jury.

And see Franczak v. Plotzki, 178 Ill. App. 279, holding that the question for the jury was, not the plaintiff's guilt, but did the defendant institute the prosecution without probable cause and with malice.

In Laughlin v. Clawson, 27 Pa. 328, it appeared that the defendant sought the advice of the district attorney; but all the evidence was conflicting, and the trial court refused to instruct the jury that there was probable cause if the defendant's evidence was believed, saying: "It is urged that probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. The authorities on this subject must be reasonably construed. They mean that the question of probable cause must not be left loosely to the jury to decide, upon their unskilled conceptions of the law. It is surely asking a court to go beyond judicial functions, when they are called upon to say that a given state of facts is sufficient to create a suspicion of guilt in the mind of a reasonable and prudent man. This seems one of those duties which fall peculiarly within the province of the jury. It is the duty of the court to state what probable cause is, to fix the standard to which the evidence shall come, to announce what the law demands as establishing probable cause; but it remains for the jury to determine what facts are proved, and also whether those facts are sufficient to found a reasonable suspicion of guilt in the mind of a prudent man. This latter cannot surely be a question of law, upon which the court must give a binding instruction. From its nature it involves an inquiry of fact, and cannot be determined by the application of any principle of law known to us. At the same time that we decline giving a binding instruction on this subject, we feel free to give our opinion upon the facts, with which the jury may agree or disagree as they see fit. We think if the jury believe that Laughlin and wife testified truly before the grand jury, there was reasonable ground of suspicion, sufficient to constitute probable cause. This opinion we found on the belief of the jury: First, that Laughlin actually lost the money on the road; and, second, that Clawson had in his possession, at Laughlin's house, the identical rag in which the money was wrapped when lost. The jury will consider all the testimony adduced by plaintiff, tending to show that defendant's story was a fabrication,—some evidence that he did not describe the money correctly at first, or gave a different description of it lately; and the evidence of money corresponding in kind to that lost being recently found in Jacksonville. We suggest that this last circumstance should be considered with caution, as it is of a nature easily manufactured." On appeal the upper court said: "On both principle and authority we think that the instruction ought to have been given. General instructions were very properly given, but the defendant demanded specific instructions according to his very case, and he was entitled to them. This is sufficiently proved by the authorities cited in the argument. And there are very plain principles of justice that demand this rule. If the officers of the state, who are appointed on account of their legal learning, consider that a given state of facts is sufficient evidence of probable cause, how can the private citizen be said to be in fault in acting upon such facts, and how can the state condemn him to damages for so doing? To decide so is to use the machinery of government as a trap to ensnare those who trust in government for such matters, and who ought to trust in it. If such officers make a mistake, it is an error of government itself, and government cannot allow the citizen to suffer for his trust in its proper functionaries. There are cases where the judgment of the lower grades of officers (Reynolds v. Kennedy, 1 Wils. 232; Whitney v. Peckham, 15 Mass. 243; Smith v. Macdonald, 3 Esp. 7; Leigh v. Webb, 3 Esp. 165; Ulmer v. Leland, 1 Me. 138, 10 Am. Dec. 48), and even of those who are not properly officers at all (Walter v. Sample, 25 Pa. 275; Williams v. Vanmeter, 8 Mo. 339), is sufficient to establish probable cause. If the party prosecuted should suffer from such mistakes, he must bear it as one of those accidents for which in the nature of things there can be no redress, for the government cannot make the prosecutor suffer for the injuries which it has itself through mistake committed. This would be the injustice of direct action, and not of mere omission or defectiveness. Besides this, in the trial of a cause it is always the duty of the court to pronounce the law arising on a given state of facts. And this again is only an exemplification of the principle of good sense that prevents us from applying to a schoolmaster or a preacher to instruct us in the arts of tanning or glass blowing, or to work at those trades for us."

In Shaul v. Brown, 28 Iowa, 37, 4 Am. Rep. 151, the court said: "It is claimed that the question of probable cause is purely a question of law for the court, and that the judge trying the cause may not instruct the jury what is probable cause in law and leave them to find whether such probable cause is proved in the case, but he must collate all the facts proved and fairly inferable from the evidence, and instruct the jury whether or not they constitute probable cause. No question has undergone more general discussion than the question of probable cause in actions for malicious prosecution. It is sometimes said to be purely a question of law for the court, and sometimes a mixed one of fact and law. See Center v. Spring, 2 Iowa, 393. Without entering at length into the discussion, we may remark that the question of probable cause in every case involves, first, the ascertainment of the facts from the evidence, and then the application of the law to the facts ascertained. This is precisely what is done in every case involving an issue of fact. Where the facts are conceded or few, or the evidence to establish them is brief, unquestioned, and uncontradicted, the court has directly before it the basis upon which to rest its application of the law. But, where the facts are complicated and disputed, or the evidence to establish them is questioned and conflicting, the jury must find the facts, and of necessity the court must state the law as applicable to the facts hypothetically; that is, if the facts found shall be one way, the law is for plaintiff; if the other way, then for defendant, or the like. The proper method, under our practice, of instructing juries in every case of complicated or disputed facts is this hypothetical way, by molding the statement of the law to the peculiarities of fact developed by the proof, and making its application practical to the case in hand, instead of stating abstract legal propositions. But the correct statement of one or more abstract legal propositions in relation to the questions involved in the case has never been held to be so erroneous as to justify a reversal therefor. The question of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution is not different in principle nor in its practical application from other questions of law resting upon facts to be found by a jury, and which arise in the every-day practice of courts. The efforts of some courts (see Bulkeley v. Smith, 2 Duer, 261) to make the question of probable cause sui generis, and to establish peculiar and impractical rules for its solution, unless rebuked and overturned, will lead to confusion and injustice in this class of actions. In actions for malicious prosecution, as in other actions, it is desirable and proper to call the attention of the jury to the facts which the evidence tends to establish, as they may be claimed by the respective parties or otherwise, and to state the law applicable to such different hypotheses of fact. A general statement of the abstract propositions of law upon which the whole case rests would not, of course, be erroneous. But the molding of the statement of the law to the particular facts of each case as disclosed by the evidence gives to the jury a more intelligible comprehension of the case, and hence leads to a more satisfactory verdict. This is substantially what is meant by most of the courts when they say that it is the duty of the judge to inform the jury if they find the facts to be proved, and the inferences to be warranted by such facts, that the same do or do not amount to probable cause, so as thereby to leave the question of fact to the jury and the abstract question of law to the judge. Panton v. Williams, 1 Gale & D. 504, 2 Q. B. 169, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545; Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 384; 1 Hill, Torts, 438-444, and cases cited. To instruct the jury that if they find from the evidence that the defendant had probable cause (without stating what constitutes probable cause in law) to institute the criminal proceedings against the plaintiff, they should find for defendant; or the converse of it, whereby the question of probable cause as a fact is left to the jury,—is rightly held by all the authorities to be erroneous. Let us now turn from these general observations to the particular case before us. The instructions are too long for insertion at length in this opinion. We can only copy those which are the leading instructions, and bearing directly upon the question of probable cause, remarking that the others are perfectly in accord and consistent with them. 'Probable cause is a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the person accused is guilty of the offense charged.' The burden is on the plaintiff to show affirmatively, by circumstances or otherwise, that the defendant had no ground for the prosecution—no such reasonable ground for suspicion, sufficiently strong in itself—as to warrant a cautious man in believing that the plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged. You cannot infer want of probable cause from malice. If you find that the defendant, previous to the commencement of the prosecution, believed the plaintiff to be an honest man; and find that the plaintiff and defendant, just before the taking of the pup in question by the plaintiff, disputed as to whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to the pup, the plaintiff claiming that he was, and the defendant denying it; and further find that defendant knew, when he commenced the prosecution, that plaintiff had taken said pup under a claim of right, and that he took it openly, and not secretly, in the daytime, and without other suspicious circumstances,—such facts would be evidence of want of probable cause. If, on the other hand, you find that the plaintiff took the pup in question secretly and without the knowledge of Brown, and concealed the same; and that such taking was, without any claim of right, known to Brown; and find that those facts alone were known to Brown; and that Brown made a reasonable effort to ascertain the facts of the case, and learned only the above; and find that Brown really believed that Shaul had stolen the pup,—such facts would constitute probable cause. The question of probable cause does not depend on the question whether Shaul was guilty in point of fact, nor whether Brown, in fact, believed him guilty; but the question is, Were the facts and circumstances, within Brown's knowledge and upon which he acted, sufficient in themselves to raise a reasonable ground of suspicion in the mind of an ordinarily cautious man; and did Brown believe Shaul guilty? It will be seen by these instructions that the court gave to the jury the definition or legal statement of what constitutes probable cause in law, substantially as given by Mr. Justice Washington in Munns v. De Nemours, 3 Wash. C. C. 31, Fed. Cas. No. 9,926; found also in 1 Am. Lead. Cas. (Hare & W.) 200, which has been often approved. And the court also informed the jury that, if they found certain facts proved, such facts would show the want of probable cause; and if they found certain other facts proved, such facts would constitute probable cause. The court, therefore, complied with both phases of the rule as laid down in the various adjudicated cases found in the reports, and stated the respective rules substantially correct. See the case, following this, of Smith v. Howard, 28 Iowa, 51."

In Krehbiel v. Henkle, 142 Iowa, 677, 121 N. W. 378, the court said: "True, evidence of malice and want of probable cause for the prosecution must be shown in order to sustain a recovery of damages, but the question as to the existence of these elements of the case is ordinarily one for the jury to determine from a consideration of all the facts and circumstances. While the court may instruct the jury what acts will or will not constitute probable cause, the question whether those facts have been shown remains for the decision of the jury, except only in those cases where the testimony is so clear and undisputed that all reasonable minds must agree in reaching the same conclusion therefrom. Center v. Spring, 2 Iowa, 393. Such is not the case presented by the record before us. The evidence tends very clearly to show both malice and want of probable cause; and if the jury believed the statements of the witnesses to be true, as it could rightfully have done, a verdict for appellant was inevitable."

And, citing this case, the court in Wilson v. Thurlow, 156 Iowa, 656, 137 N. W. 956, said: "Except where the evidence is so clear and undisputed that all reasonable minds must reach the same conclusion therefrom, the question whether there was or was not probable cause must be determined by the jury. . . . There was evidence in this case from which the jury might [rightly] have concluded that the defendants did not exercise the degree of care required by the law, and that the charge was recklessly made."

In passing upon this question, the court in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Allen, 70 Kan. 743, 79 Pac. 648, reviewing a number of authorities, said: "The contention of plaintiff in error under the assignment referred to is that the trial court in effect left it to the jury to decide what facts would authorize the conclusion that there was or was not probable cause for the arrest of Allen, instead of confining them to a determination of what the facts were under the evidence, and declaring as a matter of law that probable cause was or was not shown, according to what the facts might be found to be. There was testimony that the railway company's depot had been broken into and a quantity of bottled whisky stolen from it; that on the next morning Allen had a bottle of whisky which, from its appearance, might have been a part of the stolen property, although by no means fully identified as such; that Allen had told Harmon that he had obtained the liquor from one Ed. Kinney on the day before the burglary as part payment on an account; that he had told another person that he had obtained it after the burglary; that what seemed to be a part of the stolen goods was afterward found in a livery stable where Allen kept his horses; that these matters, and perhaps also the fact that Kinney denied having furnished any liquor to Allen, were communicated to Harmon before he swore to the complaint. There were other items of evidence affecting the question of probable cause, but this statement is sufficiently full for the purposes of the present discussion. The court did not in so many words submit to the jury unreservedly the broad general question whether or not, under all the evidence, probable cause for the prosecution had been established; but in the enumeration of the questions of fact to be passed upon in arriving at a conclusion in that regard, it included (with others of the same character), first, whether an ordinarily cautious and prudent man, having the information that came to Harmon before he instituted the prosecution against Allen, would have believed that the liquor shown to have been in Allen's possession on the morning after the larceny was a part of the stolen property; and, second, whether an ordinarily cautious and prudent man, under the circumstances shown, would have been satisfied from Allen's statement or explanation that he came by it rightfully. The inquiry presented is whether this constituted an infraction of the rule that in actions for malicious prosecution it is for the jury to determine only what facts are proved, and for the court to say whether or not they amount to probable cause. The courts are substantially unanimous in recognizing, theoretically at least, the existence of such a rule (Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smith, 60 Kan. 4, 55 Pac. 272; Drumm v. Cessnum, 58 Kan. 331, 49 Pac. 78; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 669; 33 Century Dig. cols. 2003-2005). But variations in its practical application have produced a singular confusion in the authorities. For illustration, in Heyne v. Blair, 62 N. Y. 19, a majority of the judges say that even if there is no dispute in the evidence, if the facts shown are capable of different inferences, the question of the existence of probable cause is for the jury, adding: 'Such is the rule in all questions of the like character, and there is no reason why this class of action should form an exception to the rule.' On the other hand, in Driggs v. Burton, 44 Vt. 146, it was said in a carefully considered, and, as we think, a sound opinion: 'What constitutes probable cause in these actions is a question of law for the court. All inferences to be drawn from facts, undisputed or found by the jury to exist, are upon this subject inferences of law, and not of fact, and are to be drawn by the court, and not by the jury. This rule is peculiar to this class of actions, and has been long established, and is well founded upon sound reasons and good authority.' The defendant in error cites Johnson v. Miller, 69 Iowa, 566, 58 Am. Rep. 231, 29 N. W. 743, in which it was said: 'When the prosecution was commenced, then, the defendants knew (1) that the property had been stolen by some person; (2) that by the plaintiff's own admission he had the stolen property in his possession soon after the larceny; and (3) that he claimed to have acquired the possession of it by purchase from the man Smith. That the first two facts, standing alone, would have afforded probable cause for instituting the prosecution, cannot be denied; but it is equally apparent that, if plaintiff's story in explanation of his possession of the property is true, no ground for the prosecution existed. The question, then, whether there was probable cause depends upon whether the facts and circumstances of the transaction, as they were known and understood by the defendants, would have warranted an ordinarily prudent and cautious man in the belief that plaintiff's story as to how he acquired the possession was false. The answer to the question depends, then, upon the conclusion or deduction which should be drawn from the numerous facts and circumstances of the case, and we think it was the province of the jury to draw that conclusion. The court could not say, as a matter of law, that the story was so unreasonable or improbable as to be unworthy of belief. It was properly left to the jury, and we cannot interfere with their finding.' If this case be accepted as an authority, it justifies the instructions given by the trial court; but we do not think it consistent with the rule referred to, which ordinarily is enforced in Iowa as well as elsewhere. See Erb v. German American Ins. Co. 112 Iowa, 357, 83 N. W. 1053. As indicated in the quotation given, under the circumstances there present the question whether the person arrested was guilty was narrowed down to the question whether his story as to how he came by the stolen property was false. If the circumstances warranted an ordinarily prudent and cautious person in believing that his story was untrue, then they warranted such a person in believing that he was guilty of the theft, and there was probable cause for his prosecution (19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 657, 659). In allowing the jury to determine whether a man of ordinary prudence and caution would have believed the story told by the person accused, the court permitted them to decide whether probable cause existed for his arrest. There is an intimation in the language quoted that the case is to be distinguished from those in which it is held that the question as to what facts will constitute probable cause is one of law, upon the ground that deductions are required to be made from numerous circumstances. This consideration, however, will not serve for that purpose. If the court can declare that certain admitted or proved facts do or do not amount to probable cause only in case they are of such character that reasonable men cannot differ as to the conclusions to be drawn from them, then there is no difference in that regard between this class of cases and any other; for in any litigation where the facts are not disputed and admit of but one inference, nothing remains but for the court to declare their legal effect. But the rule referred to is peculiar to actions for malicious prosecution. It is said to be based upon 'considerations of public policy, in view of the importance of not discouraging public prosecutions' (Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 192, 22 N. W. 300), although the early English cases, in which it was first declared, seem to assume that a question as to what evidence affords reasonable grounds for a criminal charge is intrinsically one to be decided by a judge rather than by a jury. Its effect is to reserve to the court the function of determining the probative effect of the matters known to the complaining witness bearing upon the guilt of the person he accuses. Under its operation it is for the jury to say what facts were known to the complaining witness, but not what conclusions a reasonable man would draw from such facts. That is exclusively the province of the court. These considerations are determinative of the case at bar. Their force is perhaps more obvious here than in the Iowa case commented upon. Allen did not admit that he had possession of a part of the stolen liquor and attempt to explain the fact. He asserted that what liquor he had was obtained before the burglary. If his statement was true, the liquor in his possession could not have been a part of the stolen property. If the liquor was a part of the stolen property the statement could not be true. Therefore, if the circumstances known to Harmon were sufficient to satisfy an ordinarily cautious and prudent man that the liquor which Allen had on the morning after the burglary was a part of that taken from the depot, they were sufficient to satisfy such a man that Allen's story as to how he came by it was untrue, and that he was guilty of the offense charged; or, in other words, they were sufficient to constitute probable cause for his prosecution. Consequently, in submitting to the jury the question whether, under all the evidence, the facts known to Harmon would have satisfied a reasonably prudent man that Allen did have some of the stolen property in his possession, and the question whether such a man would have accepted Allen's story as true, the court in effect left it to them to determine whether, under all the evidence as they might view it, there was probable cause for Allen's arrest. This was a violation of the rule stated, and requires a reversal of the judgment."

In Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 387, reversing 4 Sandf. 450, the court in effect said: Where there is no dispute about the facts, the question of the want of probable cause is for the determination of the court. Where the facts are controverted or doubtful, whether they are proved or not belongs to the jury to decide, or, in other words, whether the circumstances alleged are true is a question of fact; but, if true, whether they amount to probable cause is for the court. So, if the judge supposes that the truth of the facts sworn to admits of a doubt, he should express his opinion on the L.R.A.1915D.

law arising upon those facts, if proved, and then submit to the jury the question whether they are credibly proved or not.

The same doctrine is stated in Carpenter v. Sheldon, 5 Sandf. 77, in these words: "That the question of probable cause upon a given state of facts is, in all cases, a question of law, and that the judge, therefore, erred in submitting it to the jury to determine whether the facts and circumstances in evidence afforded the defendants reasonable grounds for believing that the plaintiff was guilty of the offenses which they laid to his charge; this was calling upon the jury not merely to pass upon the evidence, but to determine a question which the judge was himself bound to decide."

And again in Bulkeley v. Smith, 2 Duer, 261, the court said: "In an action for a malicious prosecution, if the judge is of opinion that the facts admitted or clearly established are not sufficient to prove a want of probable cause, he must either nonsuit the plaintiff, or instruct the jury to find their verdict for the defendant; but if the facts upon which, in his judgment, the question depends are rendered doubtful by the evidence, he must instruct the jury that if the facts shall be found by them in a certain manner, they do or do not amount, as the case may be, to a want of probable cause, and consequently will, or will not, entitle the plaintiff to the verdict which he seeks. If, instead of such a direction, he leaves it to the jury to determine not only whether the facts alleged by the plaintiff are true, but whether, if true, they prove a want of probable cause, he adjures his own functions, and commits a fatal error. We deem it unnecessary to refer to any cases in the English reports, or in our own, in support of these positions, since, could we have been justified in considering the law as previously doubtful, we are bound to regard it as now settled by the recent decision of the court of appeals reversing the judgment of this court, and ordering a new trial, in the very case that is now before us. The ground of this reversal was that the judge told the jury that it was their province to determine whether the facts and circumstances in evidence did or did not establish the want of probable cause, thus leaving the whole matter to their determination, instead of expressing his own opinion as to the conclusion of law to be drawn from the facts, as alleged by the plaintiff, should the jury believe them to be proved. Bound as we are by this decision, we are constrained to say that the charge of the presiding judge upon the last trial was just as erroneous as that which led to the reversal of our former judgment, as from the terms in which it was expressed, it necessarily involved the submission to the jury of the question of probable cause, and was not limited to the facts upon which the question depended. He instructed the jury that they were to consider and determine whether the facts and circumstances known to the defendants were reasonable grounds for their believing that the charge which they made against the plaintiff was true, and we are unable to make a distinction between the existence or nonexistence of reasonable grounds of belief, and the existence or want of a probable cause. There is a difference in the form of expression, but none in the meaning, since the existence of reasonable grounds for believing a charge to be true is, in reality, nothing more than a legal definition of a probable cause for making it. In deciding that there were no reasonable grounds of belief, a jury, of necessity, decides that there was a want of probable cause. The charge of the judge, therefore, amounted to no more than the definition which the law gives of probable cause, and permitted the jury, in the exercise of their own judgment, to apply the definition to the facts of the case,—that is, permitted them to determine whether the facts which they might consider to be proved, did or did not amount to a want of probable cause. It was because this question upon the first trial was decided by the jury, and not by the judge, that our former judgment was reversed. The judge, in the charge before us, also submitted to the jury, as a material question, whether the defendants themselves believed the charge against the plaintiff to be true when they preferred it; and it is not impossible, nor improbable, that it was upon the ground of the disbelief of the defendants that the jury founded their verdict. We apprehend, however, that when in an action for a malicious prosecution the existence of facts constituting a probable cause is admitted or established, the presumption of law is that the defendant entertained and acted upon the belief which the circumstances within his knowledge justified him in holding; nor have we found a single case in which, under these circumstances, the question of the actual belief of the defendant has been submitted to the decision of the jury. We do not say that cases may not arise in which this submission of the question might be eminently proper, but we are clearly of opinion that this can only happen when the presumption of law, to which we have adverted, is met and repelled by affirmative proof on the part of the plaintiff. Vide Carpenter v. Sheldon, 5 Sandf. 97. In the present case, if the defendants did not believe the charge which they made against the plaintiff, they were guilty, in the affidavits upon which the charge was founded, of wilful and deliberate perjury; and looking at all the evidence in the case, it seems to us it would be monstrous to say that the jury could be justified in drawing such a conclusion, and if not warranted to draw the conclusion, the question involving it ought not to have been submitted to their determination."

cited, many others, however, and more particularly those since Heyne v. Blair, 62 N. Y. 19, appear to sustain the contrary doctrine announced in that case, that when the facts are disputed, or though undisputed, are susceptible of conflicting inferences as to probable cause, that question is one of fact for the jury. Cases to this effect are: Hazzard v. Flury, 120 N. Y. 223, 24 N. E. 194; Wass v. Stephens, 128 N. Y. 123, 28 N. E. 21; Rawson v. Leggett, 184 N. Y. 504, 77 N. And see also the cases cited infra, in connection with the Heyne Case, which is there quoted in part. And see Sweet v. Smith, 42 App. Div. 502, 59 N. Y. Supp. 404, holding that the question of probable cause should have been submitted to the jury.

So, in Wass v. Stephens, 128 N. Y. 124, 28 N. E. 21, the court said: "The question of probable cause may be a question of law for the court, or of fact for the jury, depending upon the circumstances. If the facts are undisputed and admit of but one inference, the question is one of law; if disputed, or if capable of opposing inferences, the question is for the jury."

And in Collins v. Manning, 32 N. Y. S. R. 993, 10 N. Y. Supp. 658, where the defendant's appeal prevailed "because the trial judge took the question of probable cause away from the jury, and decided it himself as a question of law," the court said: "In a suit for malicious prosecution, where the facts are undisputed and admit of only one inference as to the existence of probable cause for the action of the prosecutor, the question is a question of law, to be determined by the court; but it becomes a question of fact, to be passed upon by the jury, when the facts are in dispute, or when, even though there may be no dispute as to the facts, they will reasonably sustain different inferences, leading some minds to the conclusion that there was, and others to the conclusion that there was not, probable cause for instituting the prosecution which is the subject of complaint."

In Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 217, the court said: "The court are of opinion that the judge, at the trial, should have somewhat more distinctly directed the jury what leading facts, or classes of facts, if proved to the satisfaction of the jury, would constitute reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, and what would not, leaving the facts and the inferences to be drawn from them to be found by the jury. The judge declined so to instruct the jury, but instructed them that the evidence might be considered as tending to establish these propositions or facts: (1) An intent or motive in the plaintiff to commit the crime; (2) guilty conduct, or acts, or knowledge of the plaintiff; (3) that the fire was the act of an incendiary; and that if they found any two of these propositions proved, they would constitute probable cause, but that neither alone would be sufficient. We are of opinion that this direction was not correct in matter of law. It is very questionable whether, if the plaintiff had a motive to burn his factory, and it was true that the factory was wilfully burnt, it would be sufficient to raise a strong suspicion against the plaintiff, without some further evidence to fix the charge on him. But further, guilty conduct, acts, and knowledge, alone, if they were of such a nature as to make them bear upon this particular charge of burning his factory, such as manifestations of conscious guilt, obscure and equivocal admissions, futile attempts to attribute the fire to other causes, and the like, might be alone sufficient to raise that belief or suspicion which would amount to probable cause. But guilty knowledge, acts, and conduct, if they did not lead to a belief of the plaintiff's guilt of this particular charge, would not alone, or with either of the other hypothetical cases, amount to proof of probable cause. In order to enable the jury to pass upon the facts in question, and the court to decide whether in law, if proved, they would constitute probable cause, the evidence tending to prove the prominent facts of the particular case should have been distinctly laid before the jury, with a more specific direction as to the law. Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545."

In Mitchell v. Wall, 111 Mass. 492, the court said: "Whether there was probable cause, in cases of this kind, is a question of law upon the evidence, provided the facts are ascertained. But where the evidence is contradictory, the court will submit the question to the jury, with instructions adapted to the facts which they shall find to be proved. Kidder v. Parkhurst, 3 Allen, 393. The defendant justifies his proceedings on the ground of an honest mistake, resulting from an alleged strong personal resemblance between the plaintiff and the real offender. But the existence of any such resemblance was a controverted fact. There was evidence, also, which had some tendency to show that such information was furnished as to the plaintiff's general good character, and that such circumstances were pointed out as to his personal appearance, as to render it doubtful, as a matter of fact, whether the defendant was acting upon such reasonable grounds of belief as to justify him for the purposes of this trial, or whether, on the other hand, his conduct was reckless, unreasonable, and without probable cause. This was a question of fact, and was submitted to the jury with proper instructions."

And it was held in Londy v. Driacoll, 175 Mass. 426, 56 N. E. 598, where there was evidence looking to two conclusions, that the credibility of the evidence, and the facts to be drawn from it, were for the court who tried the case without a jury; and the question of probable cause was one of fact.

And in Casavan v. Sage, 201 Mass. 547, 87 N. E. 893, where the evidence as to probable cause was conflicting, a request to charge the jury, as a matter of law, that defendant acted on probable cause if he believed the information communicated to him by his witnesses, was properly refused as being based on a partial view of the evidence.

But in Ellis v. Simonds, 168 Mass. 316, 47 N. E. 116, the defendant was held to have no ground for exception where the judge in effect instructed the jury that, if the defendant acted in instituting the prosecution with such care and prudence as a reasonable and ordinarily prudent person would have acted under the circumstances, then they should find that there was probable cause.

While it is believed that most of the Missouri cases sustain the general rule, and the rule prevailing thereunder stated in the beginning of this section, there nevertheless seems to have been at least some apparent misapplications of the law. In this connection the court, in Thomas v. Smith, 51 Mo. App. 605, where no instruction was given by the trial judge telling the jury what facts under the various hypotheses presented by the evidence would or would not amount to probable cause, said: "The law on this question is very simple, but its application to the individual case is often difficult. In Hill v. Palm, 38 Mo. 13, Judge Wagner thus states the law: 'The question of probable cause is composed of law and fact; it being for the jury to determine whether the circumstances alleged are true or not, and for the court to determine whether they amount to probable cause. It, therefore, falls within the province of the jury to investigate the truth of the facts offered in evidence, and the justice of the inference to be drawn from such facts, whilst at the same time they receive the law from the court, that according as they find the facts proved or not proved, and the inferences warranted or not, there was reasonable and probable ground for the prosecution or the reverse; and this rule holds, however complicated or numerous the facts may be.' The learned judge, having thus stated what has unquestionably been the common-law rule all the time, immediately proceeds to make a seeming misapplication of it by saying, 'The facts being contested, the court decided rightly in leaving the matter with the jury, with instructions as to what constitutes probable cause,' although in that case there was not even the vaguest legal definition of probable cause in any of the instructions given by the court, much less a submission to the jury for their finding of hypothetical facts, and the judgment of the court thereon as to whether such facts did or did not constitute probable cause. Ever since that decision was made, the courts of this state were engaged in a struggle to reconcile in some manner the seeming incongruity between the statement of the law in that case and its application to the point in judgment. All the decided cases since, with the seeming exception of Meysenberg v. Engelke, infra, substantially concede this to be the rule. The question of probable cause on conceded facts is a pure question of law, and on disputed facts is likewise a question of law, based upon the hypothetical finding of the jury; yet, in the absence of a request by either party that the court do charge the jury what facts, if found, will or will not amount to probable cause, the omission of the court so to charge is mere nondirection, and hence not error. It is only on this theory that the judgments actually rendered in Callahan v. Caffarata, 39 Mo. 136; McGarry v. Missouri P. R. Co. 36 Mo. App. 340, and to some extent the first opinion in the case of Sharpe v. Johnston, 59 Mo. 557, can be supported. It is true that in Meysenberg v. Engelke, 18 Mo. App. 354, it was held error for the court to give an instruction on the question of probable cause in general terms, but as in that case the defendant did ask proper instructions based upon an hypothesis of facts which were refused, the point decided is not in conflict with what is herein said. The definition of probable cause as an abstract legal proposition is correctly stated both in the plaintiff's instruction and that of the defendant, and, under the L.R.A.1915D.

previous rulings in this state, we would not be warranted in reversing the judgment for nondirection on that account. But the refusal of the defendant's specific instruction, submitting the facts for the finding of the jury which the defendant claimed, if found, did constitute probable cause, was error. There was evidence tending to prove every element contained in that instruction, and its unusual length was necessitated by the fact that the court excluded the record of the judgment, which set conclusively at rest many facts stated in that instruction. It is true that the plaintiff, having been discharged upon preliminary examination by the committing magistrate, could not, under the rule stated arguendo in Brant v. Higgins, 10 Mo. 728, and approved in Casperson v. Sproule, 39 Mo. 39, be nonsuited, but that discharge raised no question of fact. Its effect as evidence was a mere question of law, and whether certain other facts, if shown, had the legal effect to overcome plaintiff's prima facie case made out by his discharge on preliminary examination was a pure question of law. It is our duty to say whether the facts stated in defendant's instruction, if found by the jury to be true, constituted probable cause in law for the prosecution. We are of opinion that they did, and, hence, that the refusal of that instruction was prejudicial error."

In Meysenberg v. Engelke, 18 Mo. App. 346, the court said: "This brings us to the next substantial question; namely, whether the case was properly put to the jury. It is often said in the books that, in actions for malicious prosecution, the question whether there was probable cause for instituting the prosecution is a question of law for the court. This proposition does not mean that it is the province of the court to decide upon conflicting evidence whether there was, or was not, such probable cause, but that where the evidence is not conflicting, or where the facts are conceded, it is the province of the court to tell the jury whether the facts do or do not afford such probable cause. Where, as in this case, the evidence as to the facts is conflicting, it is the duty of the court to tell the jury whether the hypothetical state of facts which the evidence of each party tends to prove does, or does not, if found by them to exist, afford such probable cause. As a general rule, it is error for the court in instructing the jury to submit a question of law to them for determination. And, hence, in an action for malicious prosecution, it is error for the court to submit to the jury generally the question whether there was, or was not, probable cause for the prosecution. This the court did in the present case. The instructions as here given authorized the jury to decide not only the effect in law of whatever knowledge the defendants may have had of the plaintiff's acts, but also the purely legal question, whether the acts of the plaintiff, thus coming to the knowledge of the defendants, were sufficient to constitute an indictable offense. We believe that no authoritative case can be found in which such an instruction, thus standing alone, has been sustained. In Sharpe v. Johnston, 59 Mo. 557, subsequent appeal in 76 Mo. 660, a similar definition of probable cause was given to the jury, but it was carefully guarded with hypotheses framed upon the evidence, informing the jury what facts, if proved to their satisfaction, would, or would not, be sufficient in law to establish the defense. Such is the general, and, beyond question, the only safe practice. The present record abounds in material for such explanatory hypotheses. The court might properly have supplied them of its own motion, but was not bound to do so. When not thus supplied, their absence must be fatal to the instruction given in general terms, because of its direct tendency to mislead the jury as to the nature of their duties, in submitting to them questions which it is not within their competency to determine. Said the supreme court of the District of Columbia in Tolman v. Phelps, 3 Mackey, 154: 'It is settled here and everywhere that it is for the court to tell the jury what facts would constitute probable cause. Substantially, the court only told the jury the rule of law, that probable cause was what a reasonable, intelligent man would think justified him in making the charge. It is not everybody who is supposed to know, neither prosecutor nor jury, what facts make up a crime, and, therefore, it is necessary that the court should tell the jury what facts justify a person in alleging crime. The court did not follow that course, but really gave the jury to suppose that they might examine all that testimony and make up their own minds as to what would constitute probable cause.' See also Hill v. Palm, 38 Mo. 22; Sharpe v. Johnston, 76 Mo. 660; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 454. But for reasons which will be stated hereafter, this error is not such as to oblige us to reverse the judgment. The court refused to give to the jury several appropriate instructions submitted by the defendants, as to what were the ingredients of the offense of obtaining goods under false pretenses under the law of this state. The court, therefore, not only submitted to the jury upon the whole case the question whether there was or was not probable cause for instituting the criminal prosecution, but refused even to define to them the grounds on which such a prosecution may be lawfully instituted, although requested to do so by the defendants. By thus refusing to give the jury any special guide by which to determine this question of law, the error of submitting it to the jury became the more palpable and the more obviously prejudicial. Nor was this error cured by that part of the instruction given at the request of the defendant, 'that by the words, "probable cause," as used in the instructions of the court, is meant a belief by the defendants, or either of them, in the guilt of the accused, based upon circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to induce such belief in the mind of a reasonable and cautious man.' If the court had instructed the jury properly upon hypothetical facts submitted to them as to this question of probable cause, the general instructions submitted by the defendants as to what constitutes the obtaining of goods under false pretenses would have been properly refused. It is perceived that these two rulings present for determination a very peculiar question; namely this, the court, at the request of a party, submits a question of law to the jury. At the same time the court refuses additional instructions requested by such party, which instructions, if given, would assist the jury in determining this question of law. Is this an error of which the party asking these instructions can complain? We think it is. Obviously, the defendants cannot complain that the court upon their request left it to the jury to say generally whether this criminal prosecution for obtaining money and goods by false pretenses was instituted without probable cause. But, in order to enable them to determine this, it is necessary for them to have some understanding of the nature of the crime. This the defendant offered to supply by further instructions, and these instructions the court refused to give, at the same time giving no equivalent instructions. The jury were left to determine the question whether there was probable cause for instituting this prosecution upon less information as to the law than the defendants had; for they had the advice of men learned in the law as to the ingredients of this crime and the facts on which a prosecution for it may be sustained. It is perceived that the case was not put to the jury upon the defendants' theory. Their theory was that the jury was to decide the question of probable cause upon full directions as to the law; but the court committed it to them for decision, at the same time withholding from them full directions as to the law, which were submitted by the defendants. Although the defendants' theory was erroneous, they are not concluded by a ruling of the court which submitted the cause to the jury upon a theory a great deal more erroneous."

And in Boogher v. Hough, 99 Mo. 183, 12 S. W. 524, the court said: "Probable cause is a question of fact or a mixed question of law and fact. The legal effect of the evidence offered to show the same is for the court, but the rule is, we think, well settled that the court cannot determine the question as a matter of law unless the facts, when taken as true, are insufficient to make out a case." This language is quoted in Clark v. Thompson, 160 Mo. 461, 61 S. W. 194, which seems to hold that it is sufficient for the court to leave the existence of the facts to the jury, with a definition of probable cause.

And in Frissell v. Relfe, 9 Mo. 851, it was held: "Want of probable cause, it is laid down in the books, is a question of law to be determined by the court, upon the facts in evidence; but it has been usual in this state to leave this, as well as the question of malice, to be determined by the jury."

And in Pinson v. Campbell, 124 Mo. App. 260, 101 S. W. 621, where it was contended that the trial court did not instruct the jury what facts, if proved, would constitute probable cause, the court said: "Counsel for defendant must have overlooked instruction No. 3, given for plaintiff, which reads as follows: 'The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant had probable cause to institute the criminal proceedings against the plaintiff, then the plaintiff cannot recover. Probable cause is defined to be a reasonable ground for suspicion, supported by circumstances and evidence sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the person accused is guilty of the offense of which he is charged.' This instruction correctly defined the meaning of probable cause, and it was for the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances shown in the case whether or not Campbell had probable cause to believe Pinson was guilty of the crime charged, at the time the several affidavits were made." And see to somewhat the same effect, Lindsay v. Bates, 223 Mo. 294, 122 S. W. 682; and Vansickle v. Brown, 68 Mo. 634.

In Ewing v. Sanford, 19 Ala. 605, the trial judge instructed the jury that they should determine, as reasonable men, from the evidence, whether there was or was not probable cause for the prosecution. It was objected that this left the question as to what amounts to probable cause to the jury, when it was a question of law. The court said: "Where the facts are ascertained and undisputed, the question whether they constituted probable cause would be a pure question of law, and in such case it would be erroneous for the court to refer such question to the jury. But where the facts are to be ascertained by the jury from the evidence which is doubtful or conflicting, the most that the court can do is to charge the jury hypothetically as to what would or would not constitute reasonable or probable cause for the prosecution; and in such case probable cause becomes a question for the jury. So that, in the language of Lord Ch. J. Denman, in the case of James v. Phelps, 11 Ad. & El. 508, 'the question whether there be or be not probable cause may be for the jury or not, according to the circumstances of the particular case. . . . We think the case before us presents a state of facts which warranted the judge in submitting the question to the jury, it being a mixed question of law and fact.'"

In the same connection, see McLeod v. McLeod, 75 Ala. 483; O'Neal v. McKinna, 116 Ala. 606, 22 So. 905; Gulshy v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 167 Ala. 122, 52 So. 392; Abingdon Mills v. Grogan, 167 Ala. 146, 52 So. 596; Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. O'Neal, 169 Ala. 83, 52 So. 953; Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Ellis, 5 Ala. L.R.A.1915D.

App. 525, 58 So. 796; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stephenson, 6 Ala. App. 578, 60 So. 490. And see to the effect that when it has been shown that an attachment was wrongfully sued out, it is for the jury to determine whether it was done maliciously and without probable cause. Goldstein v. Drysdale, 148 Ala. 486, 42 So. 744; Alsop v. Lidden, 130 Ala. 548, 30 So. 401; and Lunsford v. Dietrich, 93 Ala. 565, 30 Am. St. Rep. 79, 9 So. 308.

The doctrine of the earlier English and Canadian decisions on this question has been put somewhat in doubt, it seems, by the practice adopted by the courts in some of the later cases of submitting certain questions to the jury, upon whose answers to which the court declares as to existence or absence of probable cause. This practice has its origin, it appears, in the case of Abrath v. North Eastern R. Co. L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 79, where Cave, J., left three questions to the jury: "(1) Did the defendants in prosecuting the plaintiff take reasonable care to inform themselves of the true state of the case? (2) Did they honestly believe the case which they laid before the magistrates? and (3) Were the defendants actuated by any indirect motive in preferring the charge against the plaintiff?"

In Brown v. Hawkes [1891] 2 Q. B. 718, where similar questions were put to the jury, Mr. Justice Cave said: "I should, however, like to say that, in my judgment, the learned judge ought not to have left to the jury the question which he did leave to them as to the defendant having taken reasonable care to inform himself of the true facts of the case. The facts which the defendant proved before the magistrates were all of them true and undisputed, and the simple question for the judge was whether they showed an absence of reasonable and probable cause. If they did show such an absence, it was quite unnecessary to inquire whether the defendant took reasonable care to inform himself of the true facts. If they did establish the presence of reasonable and probable cause, it was not incumbent on the defendant to make any further inquiries. Lister v. Perryman, L. R. 4 H. L. 521, 39 L. J. Exch. N. S. 177, 23 L. T. N. S. 269, 19 Week. Rep. 9. As Lord Bramwell, then Baron Bramwell, remarked in that case, it might have been reasonable to make such inquiries, but it does not follow that it was unreasonable not to make them. It was sought to justify the putting of this question on the ground that a similar question was put in Abrath v. North Eastern R. Co. supra; but in that case the evidence on which the defendant acted in prosecuting the plaintiff was all false. I entertained some doubt whether it was right to put the question even in Abrath v. North Eastern R. Co. supra, where I put it ex majori cautela; and it seems to me that, if such a question is to be put in every case, the result will be to transfer the decision of the question of what is reasonable and probable cause from the judge to the jury, except when the judge holds that there is an absence of such cause. If, however, the judge is of opinion that there is a prima facie case of reasonable and probable cause, he is still bound to ask the jury whether the defendant took reasonable care to inform himself of the whole of the facts; the result will be that the jury will always be able to overrule the view of the judge by finding that the defendant did not take such reasonable care. The inquiries which it appears to have been suggested the defendant should have made in this case afford some idea of the kind of considerations which would be submitted to the jury if such a question were allowed to be put."

And in Renton v. Gallagher, 19 Manitoba L. Rep. 478, Howell, Ch. J., said: "If these facts which he deems essential are in dispute, he must leave the finding of them to the jury, and he should clearly indicate to the jury, so far as this issue is concerned, that they must simply find these facts to assist him so that he may decide the issue; in the language of Chief Justice Strong in the case below cited, 'He, and not the jury, is to make the deduction, and if he shifts the burden of doing so upon them the case is not properly tried.' These principles are fully supported by Archibald v. McLaren, 21 Can. S. C. 588, and Brown v. Hawkes, supra. Pollock on Torts lays down this proposition: 'It does not follow that, because it would be very reasonable to make further inquiry, it is not reasonable to act without doing so;' and this law is quoted with approval in Archibald v. McLaren by Mr. Justice Patterson at p. 603, and also by Mr. Justice Rose in Malcolm v. Perth Mut. F. Ins. Co. 29 Ont. Rep. 406. In Brown v. Hawkes, Sir Lewis Cave, referring to Lister v. Perryman, says: 'As Lord Bramwell, then Baron Bramwell, remarked in that case, it might have been reasonable to make such inquiries, but it does not follow that it was unreasonable not to make them.' Let us now consider how the learned judge disposed of the issue which he had to decide in this case. The witness Gallagher shows that he became suspicious; that he employed a detective, and got his reports, and then laid the whole matter before his solicitor; and, further, that he then believed, in fact still believes, in the guilt of the plaintiff; and none of these facts are disputed, but on the contrary they are corroborated by other witnesses. He left to the jury this question: 'Did the defendants take reasonable care to inform themselves of the true facts of this case?' and, of course, the jury said, 'No.' Now, it seems to me that this is merely asking the jury if the defendants had reasonable and probable cause for laying the information, which is solely for the judge. In other words, the question really involves a conclusion of law. Suppose the learned judge had asked a question to follow the above, something like the following (and which, to my mind, would have been highly proper): 'If the answer to the former question is in the negative, state fully what further should have been done;' and if, in answer, the jury L.R.A.1915D.

merely stated, for instance, that the defendants should have taken further legal advice, I apprehend that the learned judge would have paid no attention to the answer to the first question, and would have decided that the plaintiff had not established the issue which was upon him. I gather from the charge that at the trial, as in the argument in appeal, counsel for the plaintiff argued that, because further inquiry was not made by way of asking the plaintiff what he had to say as to the charge, the defendants acted unreasonably and recklessly. It might be reasonable for the defendants to have done so, and yet not unreasonable if they had taken the opposite course; perhaps the jury acted on this suggestion and answered the first question in the negative, because they thought this course should have been pursued by the defendants. If the learned trial judge had told the jury that, considering the investigations made by the defendants according to the undisputed evidence, it was not unreasonable for them not to ask the party whom they thought guilty to explain his action, I would have thought he was simply explaining the law to them; and if they refused to follow this direction and answered the first question in the negative because the defendants had refrained from asking this explanation from the plaintiff, it seems to me the judge would have been again justified in refusing to find the issue in favor of the plaintiff. The learned trial judge, however, had high authority for putting the question. It is identically the question put in Brown v. Hawkes, and practically the question put in Abrath v. North Eastern R. Co. supra. In the last case the trial judge held that the onus on the issue of reasonable and probable cause was on the plaintiff, and entered a verdict for the defendant. The divisional court differed from the trial judge on this point of law, and ordered a new trial. This view of the law was reversed in appeal, and in the House of Lords the plaintiff again failed. The question asked in that case was practically as wide as in the case at bar; but, as the finding of fact in that case was in favor of the defendant, and as the sole question was that of the burden of proof, the form of the question really did not come up for discussion. Sir Lewis Cave was the trial judge in that case and was one of the judges in appeal to the divisional court in the case of Brown v. Hawkes; and he held that the question was improperly left to the jury in the latter case, and that he had doubt as to the propriety of the question put by him in the former case. I think I can fairly say that the latter case was decided solely on the ground of malice, the jury having found that the defendants believed the charge to be true, there was no evidence of malice, and the form of the question was, therefore, not much considered."

And in Hamilton v. Cousineau, 19 Ont. App. Rep. 203, Hagarty, Ch. J. O., reviewing many decisions on this question, says:

"In Webber v. McLeod, 16 Ont. Rep. 609, the learned chancellor reviews many of the cases, and I think his view of the ordinary method of trying such cases is as we understand it. He notices Mr. H. Stephen's book, on Malicious Prosecution. It contains a valuable collection of authorities. The learned author evidently does not approve of the course now generally pursued, but he thus sums up (p. 82) in reference to Abrath v. North Eastern R. Co. supra: 'I can put no other construction upon the whole of the judgments in this case than that every judge who tries an action of malicious prosecution is entitled—to put it at the lowest—to sum up in the sense of the passages quoted above from the summing up of Mr. Justice Cave, and to put to the jury the two questions which Mr. Justice Cave devised, namely: 1. Did the defendant take reasonable care to inform himself of the true state of the case? 2. Did he honestly believe the case he laid before (whatever the tribunal may have been)? These two seem to me to cover the whole ground of reasonable cause. If the jury answer them both, "Yes," the judge will be justified in holding that want of reasonable cause has not been proved. If the jury answer either question, "No," the judge will be justified in holding that it has.' Of course the judge may put the case hypothetically to the jury thus: 'If you find that the defendant did not honestly believe, etc., then find a verdict for the plaintiff,' and so as to any other important matter."

The question of what constitutes probable cause is for the court, but whether there is evidence of the same is for the jury (Hamilton v. Cousineau, supra). That is, the jury must decide whether the facts brought forward in evidence are true or not, but whether they constitute probable cause is a matter of law. Ibid.

But in Archibald v. McLaren, 21 Can. S. C. 588, Strong, J., said: "The well-known case of Lister v. Perryman, L. R. 4 H. L. 521, 39 L. J. Exch. N. S. 177, 23 L. T. N. S. 269, 19 Week. Rep. 9, had, as I have always supposed, settled the law as regards this class of action, to be that the question of reasonable and probable cause was, although a question of fact, one to be determined by the court, and not by the jury. That in such cases the respective functions of the trial judge and jury were these, that whilst the jury were to find all the facts from which the inference was to be drawn, yet that the inference itself, deducible from those facts, was one to be drawn, not by the jury, but by the judge. This is certainly most clearly laid down in the case of Lister v. Perryman, supra, and the apparent anomaly and exceptional character of the rule by which a question of fact was thus withdrawn from the jury, who, generally speaking, were judges of the facts, and left to be decided by the court, occasioned expressions of surprise from some of the law lords, who, having been trained in courts L.R.A.1915D.

of equity or in the Scottish tribunals, had not been practically familiar with such questions. It has, however, been suggested in a little book written by Mr. Stephens, on the Law of Malicious Prosecutions, that this rule of Lister v. Perryman, supra, was displaced by the decision in the case of Abrath v. North Eastern R. Co. supra. Having repeatedly read this last-mentioned case, and having also read Mr. Stephens' book, I am clearly of the opinion that there is no warrant for this proposition. The judge is entitled, no doubt, to the utmost assistance from the jury in finding the facts, and he is entitled for this purpose to put questions to them in any form which his ingenuity may suggest, but he, and not the jury, is to make the deduction; and if he shifts the burden of doing so upon them the case is not properly tried. In the late case of Brown v. Hawkes, supra, decided in June, 1891, and therefore long since the judgment of Armour, Ch. J., in the present action which is now under appeal was pronounced, Lord Asher, M. R., thus states the law: The question whether there is an absence of reasonable and probable cause is for the judge, and not for the jury; and if the facts on which that depends are not in dispute, there is nothing for him to ask the jury, and he should decide the matter himself. If there are facts in dispute upon which it is necessary he should be informed in order to arrive at a conclusion on this point, these facts must be left specifically to the jury, and when they have been determined in that way the judge must decide as to the absence of reasonable and probable cause. Now it appears to me that if the learned chief justice had had this clear enunciation of the law as to the respective functions of judge and jury in these cases of malicious prosecution before him at the trial, and had expressly adopted it for his guide, he could not have followed the rule laid down by the master of rolls more exactly than he actually did. There were no disputed facts . . . to leave to the jury, and the learned judge could not have left any question material to be decided in the case to them without abdication of the functions which the law had delegated to himself."

In Baker v. Kilpatrick, 7 B. C. 150, the court said: "The jury in this case found in answer to questions submitted to them that the defendant did not take reasonable care to inform himself of the facts of the case before he proceeded against the plaintiff; and that he did not honestly believe in the charge he laid before the magistrate; and that the defendant had an indirect wrong motive in bringing the prosecution before the magistrate, namely, to obtain recompense for the loss of his horse. The facts in this case are not in dispute as far as relates to the action of the defendant in instituting these proceedings; but the learned judge who tried the case, after he had submitted to the jury the questions which resulted in the above findings, on motion for judgment came to the conclusion that as no facts were in reality in dispute, he ought to have withdrawn the case from the jury, and decided it on the ground that there was no absence of reasonable and probable cause, and in the result he so decided it in favor of the defendant. The burden of proof of the absence of reasonable and probable cause lay on the plaintiff. See Abrath v. North Eastern R. Co. supra. By putting the first question to the jury it in fact transferred to the jury the decision of what was reasonable and probable cause, and such a question should not be put. See judgment of Cave, J., in Brown v. Hawkes, supra, which met the approval of Bowen, L. J., in the same case on appeal. But when such a question has been put and answered, and at the same time the jury have found that the defendant did not honestly believe in the charge he laid before the magistrate, but was actuated by an indirect motive, it seems impossible to say that the plaintiff was acting with reasonable and probable cause. Shrosbery v. Osmaston, 37 L. T. N. S. 792. The plaintiff may have formed a belief in the defendant's guilt on insufficient foundation, but if he honestly entertained such a belief it is for the judge to say if that constituted reasonable and probable cause. An unfounded charge, and not believed in by the prosecutor, shews an absence of reasonable cause, and when that is the case the law would imply malice. I think on the jury findings that the judgment ought to have been entered for the plaintiff. The fact that the judge may not agree with the verdict is insufficient to set it aside if the verdict is one which reasonable men, acting upon the evidence as a whole, could properly have found, and we cannot say on reading the evidence that such is not the case here." In this case the questions asked the jury were: (1) Did the defendant take reasonable care to inform himself of the facts of the case before he proceeded against the plaintiff? A. No. (2) Did the defendant honestly believe in the charge he laid before the magistrate? A. No. (3) Was defendant actuated by malice or bad motive in the proceedings taken against plaintiff? A. Cannot agree. (4) Had the defendant any indirect wrong motive in bringing the prosecution before the magistrate, and, if so what was it? A. Yes; to obtain recompense for the loss of his horse.

2. "Mixed question of law and fact."

Additional confusion has been introduced into the subject under consideration by the employment of the phrase "mixed question of law and fact." As stated in 23 Am. & L.R.A.1915D.

Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 550, that phrase, at least as applied to questions of negligence, has come to be used in the sense of "the question that arises in that class of cases where the facts are to be determined by the jury, and where in addition the law, although it affords general principles, does not give the precise rules for the determination of the case, so that it is incumbent upon the jury to ascertain not only the facts, but also the application of the law, stated by the court more abstractly than in ordinary cases, the findings of the jury being not merely findings of fact, but findings upon the ultimate question or questions involved in the case." The phrase, however, as applied to the question of probable cause now under investigation, does not seem to have been generally employed in that narrow and restrictive sense, but in a broader sense, importing that the jury are to determine the facts, and the court is to determine whether or not the facts so found constitute probable cause, the jury being instructed hypothetically.

A few of the many cases that might be recited here sustaining this view are: Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 493, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 765, affirmed in 1 T. R. 784; *Taylor v. Thus, in the celebrated case of Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 T. R. 545, which has always been regarded as a leading authority on the question under consideration, Lord Mansfield said: "The question of probable cause is a mixed proposition of law and fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show it probable or not probable are true and existed is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law." Substantially the same language is used in Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 196, 25 L. ed. 116, likewise a leading case, which purports to quote from Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 493, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 765. Numerous other cases quote from one or the other of these cases, or use the same language, or language of the same effect, so that, for all practical purposes, they may be said to be on all fours.

In Pennsylvania Co. v. Weddle, 100 Ind. 138, the court said: "In a limited sense, the question of whether there is or is not probable cause is one of mixed law and fact, but it is not so in such a sense as to permit the court to surrender its function of deciding questions of law, nor to usurp that of the jury to decide questions of fact. The question is one of mixed law and fact thus far, no farther, namely: When the facts are contested, the jury decides the contest as to the facts, but in all cases, the court instructs them as to the law upon the facts."

"It is conceded on all hands," said Marcy, J., in Masten v. Deyo, 2 Wend. 424, "that the question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact; and it would seem necessarily to result that the jury are to say whether the circumstances relied on to show probable cause really existed; and the court are to decide, if they did exist, whether they constituted probable cause. A judge, therefore, who should assume the right to determine the whole question to the exclusion of the jury, would encroach upon their province. It is contended by the defendant in this case and the general proposition is laid down in several elementary treatises, and in some reports, as a well-established rule of law, that the judge, and not the jury, is to determine whether the defendant had probable cause. Bull. N. P. 14; Starkie, Ev. pt. 4, p. 912. It being, as all admit, a mixed question of law and fact, this general denial of the right of the jury to participate in its decision would establish an exception to that great and salutary principle which lies at the foundation of the right of trial by jury: ad questiones facti non respondent iudices; ad questiones legis non respondent juratores. . . . From a consideration of the authorities on this subject, they seem to me to establish a rule which in no respect tends to confound the acknowledged functions of judges and jurors. Where the circumstances relied on as evidence of probable cause are admitted by the pleadings, it belongs to the court to pronounce upon them; and where these circumstances are clearly established by uncontroverted testimony, or by the concession of the parties, and they fully establish a probable cause, the court may refuse to submit the cause to the jury, and order the plaintiff to be nonsuited; but this, I conceive, is done upon the same principle that a judge at nisi prius decides, in ordinary cases, that the plaintiff has not shown enough to carry his cause to the jury, and not that it is a question not falling within the province of the jury. But nonsuits should only be granted in cases where there is nothing for the jury to pass upon, where there is no evidence of a want of probable cause, or where probable cause is so clearly established that if the cases had been submitted to the jury, and they had found verdicts for the plaintiffs, this court would, on application for that purpose, set them aside as verdicts found without or against evidence. If, however, the facts are controverted,—if in anywise the weight of conflicting testimony is to be ascertained, or the credibility of witnesses estimated,—the evidence must go to the jury."

In Hall v. Suydam, 6 Barb. 83, the court, citing the preceding case, said: "The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show probable cause or the contrary are true and existed is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law. . . . Where the circumstances relied on as evidence of probable cause are admitted by the pleadings, it belongs to the court to pronounce upon them; and where these circumstances are clearly established by uncontroverted testimony, or by the concession of the parties, and they fully establish a probable cause, the court may refuse to submit the cause to the jury, and order the plaintiff to be nonsuited. . . . If, however, the facts are controverted, if in anywise the weight of conflicting testimony is to be ascertained, or the credibility of witnesses estimated, the evidence must go to the jury. . . . Where the facts relied on as evidence of probable cause are controverted, it is the duty of the judge to state his opinion distinctly to the jury, whether probable cause is or is not established, if the evidence introduced by the defendant proves to their satisfaction the truth of the facts on which the defendant relies. . . . The defendant has a right to call upon the judge to instruct the jury as to the law involved in the question of probable cause, and whether the facts relied on in the defense, on the supposition that they should be found true by them, made out a probable cause. . . . If the attention of the learned justice had been called to the well-settled principle that the question of probable cause was a mixed question of law and fact, he would undoubtedly have distinctly left to the jury alone to find the truth of the facts relied on as evidence of probable cause, and would have declared his opinion to them, whether such facts, if found by them to be true, amounted to probable cause or not."

And in Besson v. Southard, 10 N. Y. 236, the court said: "In the case of a private suit, probable cause may consist of such facts and circumstances as lead to the inference that the party was actuated by an honest and reasonable conviction of the justice of the suit. This question is composed of law and fact; it being the province of the jury to determine whether the circumstances alleged are true or not, and of the court to determine whether they amount to probable cause. When the matter of fact and matter of law, of which the probable cause consists, are so intimately blended together as not to be easily susceptible of separate decision, the judge is warranted in leaving the question to the jury; instructing them in the principles and rules of law by which they are to be governed in finding a verdict, and those instructions the jury are bound to follow. Whether the circumstances alleged to show probable cause, or the contrary, are true and existed, is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them true, they amount to probable cause, is a question of law. What is meant by the expression that probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact, and when it is proper to submit it to the jury to pass upon, is correctly explained in Masten v. Deyo, 2 Wend. 424. If the facts which are adduced as proof of a want of probable cause are controverted, if conflicting testimony is to be weighed, or if the credibility of witnesses is to be passed upon, the question of probable cause should go to the jury, with proper instructions as to the law. But where there is no dispute about facts, it is the duty of the court, on the trial, to apply the law to them."

Other cases using practically the same language are: Gorton v. De Angelis, 6 Wend. 418; Fagnan v. Knox, 66 N. Y. 525, reversing 8 Jones & S. 41; Palmer v. Palmer, 8 App. Div. 331, 40 N. Y. Supp. 829; Hamilton v. Davey, 28 App. Div. 457, 51 N. Y. Supp. 88; Rhodes v. Brandt, 21 Hun, 1; Bankell v. Weinacht, 99 App. Div. 316, 91 N. Y. Supp. 107.

However, while most of the cases take this view of the expression under consideration, a few, it seems, as is pointed out in Buckeley v. Smith, 2 Duer, 261, have been deceived and misled by the term. The court in that case said: "It is true, it is said by many of the text writers that probable cause is 'a mixed question of law and fact;' and, misled by this statement, it not unfrequently happens that judges content themselves with defining a probable cause, leaving the jury to decide whether the facts of the case correspond with the definition; which is, in effect, leaving the whole matter to their determination. It is evident, however, upon reflection, that the deceptive phrase, 'a mixed question of law and fact,' is either wholly unmeaning, or is intelligible and true only in a sense which renders it just as applicable to every question of law that a judge in the progress of a trial can be required to determine. Every rule of law depends for its application upon a given state of facts, and when the facts upon which it depends are controverted and doubtful, they must of necessity be ascertained by the verdict of the jury; but whether the facts are admitted or disputed, it is equally the duty of the judge to state explicitly to the jury the rule of law arising upon them, by which their verdict ought to be controlled,—the only difference being that, in the first case, the direction to the jury is positive; in the second, hypothetical. Thus, in an action for a malicious prosecution, if the judge is of opinion that the facts admitted or clearly established are not sufficient to prove a want of probable cause, he must either nonsuit the plaintiff, or instruct the jury to find their verdict for the defendant; but if the facts upon which, in his judgment, the question depends, are rendered doubtful by the evidence, he must instruct the jury that if the facts shall be found by them in a certain manner, they do or do not amount, as the case may be, to a want of probable cause, and consequently will, or will not, entitle the plaintiff to the verdict which he seeks. If, instead of such a direction, he leaves it to the jury to determine not only whether the facts alleged by the plaintiff are true, but whether, if true, they prove a want of probable cause, he abjures his own functions, and commits a fatal error."

But with the possible exception of some of the later New York decisions, which, contrary to the earlier decisions of the same jurisdiction, as has been seen, hold that what amounts to probable cause is a question for the jury when the facts are in dispute or though undisputed, are susceptible of conflicting inferences, the great majority of the cases taking the above-explained view that the expression "probable cause" is a mixed question of law and fact are in absolute accord with the cases which state that probable cause is in all cases a question of law, meaning thereby, as the holding in Buckeley v. Smith, supra, clearly seems to show, that what facts amount to probable cause is in all cases a question of law, which the court alone is competent to determine, and in relation to which the judge who tries the case is bound to express a positive opinion.

Probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the alleged circumstances existed or not is simply a question of fact, and, conceding their existence, whether or not they constitute probable cause is a question of law. Where the circumstances are admitted or clearly proved by uncontradicted testimony, it is the province of the court to determine the question of probable cause, and the court may order a nonsuit. But if there is a conflict of testimony, or the credibility of witnesses is to be estimated, the cause must go to the jury. As the question of probable cause is a mixed question of both law and fact, it is error to submit to the jury to say whether there was probable cause. The jury have solely the right to decide in cases of reasonable doubt, whether the alleged circumstances really existed. Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 218.

And in Travis v. Smith, 1 Pa. St. 234, 44 Am. Dec. 125, the court said: "Absolute certainty being unattainable in human affairs, we are compelled, in our most important concerns, to act on probabilities, and the law, which is derived from the nature and position of man, exacts no more from one who institutes criminal proceedings than that reasonable and prudential caution which the safety of others demands; and where that exists does not make him responsible for the event. He, therefore, who has probable cause, or in other words, reasonable grounds for belief of guilt, stands acquitted of liability, whatever may have been his motives. If, on the other hand, he acts rashly, wantonly, or wickedly, in charging another, he is responsible; he is conclusively deemed to have acted mala fide or maliciously. As the authority to institute a criminal prosecution, and the extent of that authority, are derived from the law, the law must judge of its exercise; it is therefore the duty of the court to determine whether the proof of certain facts constitutes probable cause, and it is error to submit that question to the jury. The duty of the jury is to say what facts are proved, and for that purpose they are to decide on the weight of evidence, the credibility of witnesses, the truth of conflicting allegations. The general question of probable cause is then a mixed question of law and fact, composing two distinct inquiries, both conducted at the same time on a jury trial, but yet cognizable before two distinct tribunals, each of which discharges its proper functions. In the present instance, the court below threw it on the jury to say, as a question of fact on the evidence, whether there was probable cause. This was leaving to them, in part, a question of law which the court was bound to decide; and it has frequently been held to be error to leave the law to the jury. This case must therefore be tried again, that the court may instruct the jury accordingly, as the case may hereafter appear."

And in Wilder v. Holden, 24 Pick. 8, the court said: "The question of probable cause is a mixed question, partly of law and partly of fact. But not, as in many cases, so combined as to blend the duties of the court and jury. What facts constitute probable cause is a question for the court. Whether those facts exist, in each particular case, is a question for the jury. The jury must weigh the evidence and ascertain what facts are proved, and the court must determine the inference of law from them. There is no doubt that the facts of which evidence was offered, and which, the jury were instructed, amounted L.R.A.1915D.

to probable cause, were such as would induce a candid and intelligent man, in the defendant's situation, to believe the plaintiff to be guilty of the crime for which he was prosecuted. One circumstance is very strong, if not decisive, in favor of the defendant. He who honestly and fairly takes the advice of counsel is justified in following it. Ravenga v. Macintosh, 2 Barn. & C. 693, 4 Dowl. & R. 107, 1 Car. & P. 204, 16 Eng. Rul. Cas. 742; Stone v. Swift, 4 Pick. 389, 16 Am. Dec. 349."

And in Pomeroy v. Golly, Ga. Dec. pt. 1, p. 26, it was said: "Whether there was a want of probable cause shown by the plaintiff, the court holds the law to be this: that to ascertain whether there be probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. And it is the duty of the court to charge the jury, if evidence is clear, as to the existence of certain facts, whether they amount to a probable cause for the prosecution, as this is a matter of law. But if there be evidence which renders the facts doubtful as to the probable cause, then the court must charge the jury in the alternative, either that there is, or is not, probable cause, as they may find the facts. In this case, there being evidence of defendant's sayings, both before and after taking out the warrant to arrest the plaintiff, the court charged the jury that if they believed, from the evidence, that the defendant was acting under an honest conviction that the plaintiff was the one who committed the forgery, then there was probable cause for the prosecution, and they must find for the defendant. But if, from the evidence before them, they believed that the defendant was not acting under such conviction of plaintiff's guilt, and was induced by the persuasion of others, and also to enable him to make a settlement with the bank on better terms, then there was a want of probable cause; and, from a want of probable cause, they, by law, had a right to infer malice, and in that event, to find for the plaintiff such damages as they, from the evidence, believed him entitled to. The jury having exercised their legal right, and having found against the state of facts which constituted a probable cause, and they having found in favor of that state of facts which show a want of probable cause, and thereby inferring malice, and assessed such damages as they believed just,—would not this court be assuming the right of the jury were it to set their verdict aside, because they did not find the facts the other way? It most certainly would assume such power, and which this court has not the legal power to do. It cannot, therefore, disturb the verdict on this ground." But see infra, IV. Coleman v. Allen, 79 Ga. 637, 11 Am. St. Rep. 449, 5 S. E. 204, as to rule under statute.

And in Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1, the court said: "This distinction between want of probable cause of malice is very marked and should be constantly borne in mind. The failure to do so has been the principal cause of the confusion and uncertainly so apparent in many of the decisions, as to what is probable cause, which we have cited. There is a very marked difference between the manner in which a question of negligence is generally to be decided, and a question of probable cause. Both of these questions have frequently been called mixed questions of law and fact; but they are so in very different senses. If the facts are numerous and complicated, the question whether such facts admitted or supposed to be true constitute or do not constitute negligence is generally a question of fact for the determination of the jury, and the court would err if it instructed the jury that certain complicated facts, which must, in the nature of the case, depend upon surrounding circumstances for their quality, did or did not constitute negligence. . . . But the reverse of this is true when the question is whether there be or be not probable cause. Though in such case the facts be numerous and complicated, the question whether they constitute probable cause, if such facts be true, is still a question of law for the court to determine; and therefore in every case the court may properly instruct the jury that certain facts, if found to be true by the jury, constitute or do not constitute probable cause. See Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545; Brown v. Connelly, 5 Blackf. 390. In the first of these cases the court says: 'Upon this bill of exceptions we take the broad question between the parties to be this: whether in a case in which the question of reasonable and probable cause depends not upon a few simple facts, but upon facts which are numerous and complicated, and upon inferences to be drawn therefrom, it is the duty of the judge to inform the jury, if they find the facts proved and the inferences to be warranted by such facts, the same do or do not amount to reasonable or probable cause, so as thereby to leave the question of fact to the jury and the abstract question of law to the judge? And we are all of the opinion that it is the duty of the judge so to do.' The reverse of this would be true if the question had been one of negligence, and not of one of probable cause. All that is left to the jury on a question of probable cause are the facts of the case, and on any assumed state of facts, however complicated, it is for the court alone to determine whether probable cause does or does not exist. But such is not the case where the question is one of negligence. The reason of this distinction is obvious. On the question of negligence, what a reasonable person would do under a complicated state of facts and circumstances should be left to the jury to determine. The court is obviously less competent and fitted to decide such a question than an ordinary business man. Such a man can more wisely decide how, under complicated facts and circumstances, a reasonable man ought to act, than could a court. It is in its nature a question of fact, and not of law. But it is very different where the question is whether probable cause does or does not exist. In such a case, however complicated the facts and circumstances may be, if they are admitted or supposed to exist, the court is always more competent to decide whether, as a reasonable man, the defendant should have instituted the prosecution. To determine such a question, no matter how numerous and complicated the supposed facts may be, the court is peculiarly fitted, as it must largely depend on correct views of the law. A jury would be peculiarly unfitted to determine wisely such a question. In its nature it is a question of law, and not of fact. That is, if negligence be the question, the deduction to be drawn from supposed or admitted facts is generally a question of fact for the jury; but if want of probable cause is the question, this deduction to be drawn from supposed or admitted facts is always a question of law for the court to decide. The reverse of this, however, is emphatically true where the question is: Was the defendant actuated by malice? This is always a question of fact for the jury. The court has no right in any case to instruct the jury that certain supposed or admitted facts constitute malice. It must be left to the jury in every case not only to determine the facts, but also to determine whether from the facts malice can be inferred. The court can never from any facts infer malice. It is emphatically a question of fact, and not of law. Into its decision not only the facts of the case, but also the opinions and motives of the defendant, must largely enter, and upon such opinions and motives the jury, and the jury only, should pass. The court cannot decide on the motives and opinions of the defendant wisely. In its nature such a question is emphatically a question of fact."

3. Taking opinion of jury as to the facts.

As has been said, probable cause is in the nature of a judgment to be rendered by the court upon a special verdict of the jury, and is not to be rendered until after the jury has given its verdict upon the facts by which it is to be determined. Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937; Hess v. Oregon German Baking Co. 31 Or. 503, 49 Pac. 803.

This practice of requiring specific findings of the jury on the facts in cases of this kind has much to commend it to the profession, and should be frequently resorted to. But, surprising as it is, only a few cases have been found approving the practice. Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 189, 22 N. W. 300; Lammers v. Mason, 123 Minn. 204, 143 N. W. 359; Erb v. German American Ins. Co. 112 Iowa, 359, 83 N. W. 1053; Stubbs v. Mulholland, 168 Mo. 47, 67 S. W. 650; Helwig v. Beckner, 149 Ind. 131, 46 N. E. 644, 48 N. E. 788;

Indiana Bicycle Co. v. Willis, 18 Ind. App. 525, 48 N. E. 646; Taylor v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 18 Ind. App. 692, 48 N. E. 1044; Cooper v. Flemming, 114 Tenn. 52, 68 L.R.A. 849, 84 S. W. 804.

What constitutes probable cause is a question of law for the court to determine; and where a special verdict is returned, the jury must find the facts; and upon the facts found the court must, as a matter of law, decide whether there was probable cause. Helwig v. Beckner, 149 Ind. 131, 46 N. E. 644, 48 N. E. 788.

Where a special verdict is returned in an action for malicious prosecution the question of probable cause for the prosecution complained of is not a fact to be found by the jury, but the jury must find the facts, and upon the facts found by the jury the court must, as a matter of law, determine whether there was or was not probable cause. Indiana Bicycle Co. v. Willis, 18 Ind. App. 525, 48 N. E. 646.

Probable cause is a legal conclusion to be drawn by the court from the facts, and where the facts are found, and are beyond dispute, as in the case where the jury returns a special verdict, the question whether the undisputed facts do or do not constitute probable cause is a pure question of law to be decided by the court, and with which the jury has nothing to do, they having agreed upon the facts and presented them to the court by their special verdict. And where in such case the jury, in answer to an interrogatory, volunteers the additional answer, not elicited by the question, that the prosecution was without probable cause, such answer is properly disregarded by the court. Taylor v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 18 Ind. App. 692, 48 N. E. 1044.

And see, supra, III. b, 1, English cases following the Abrath Case.

But, while probable cause, as just pointed out, is in the nature of a judgment to be rendered by the court upon a special verdict of the jury, it is not necessary that the facts be found by the jury in the form of a special verdict. For the prevailing practice in most jurisdictions for obtaining the opinion of the jury on its particular phase of the case is by submitting the question of probable cause to the jury with instructions from the court as to what facts do or do not amount to probable cause. Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 196, 25 L. ed. 120; Sanders v. Palmer, 5 C. C. A. 77, 14 U. S. App. 297, 55 Fed. 217; Erb v. German American Ins. Co. 112 Iowa, 357, 83 N. W. 1053; Walker v. Culman, 9 Kan. App. 691, 59 Pac. 606; Lancaster v. Langston, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 299, 36 S. W. 521; Moore v. Large, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 409, 46 S. W. 508; Hemenway v. Woods, 1 Pick. 524; Hamilton v. Smith, 39 Mich. 222; Wilson v. Bowen, 64 Mich. 133, 31 N. W. 81; Huntington v. Gault, 81 Mich. 144, 45 N. W. 970; Rankin L.R.A. 1915D.

v. Crane, 104 Mich. 6, 61 N. W. 1007; Goode v. Eslow, 151 Mich. 48, 114 N. W. 859; Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 189, 22 N. W. 300; Lammers v. Mason, 123 Minn. 204, 143 N. W. 359; Hill v. Palm, 38 Mo. 13; Dreyfus v. Aul, 29 Neb. 191, 45 N. W. 282; Leahy v. March, 155 Pa. 458, 26 Atl. 701; Burk v. Howley, 179 Pa. 539, 57 Am. St. Rep. 607, 36 Atl. 327; Weinberger v. Shelly, 6 Watts & S. 336; Bruff v. Kendrick, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 468; Bryant v. Kuntz, 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 102. And see other cases cited supra, III. b, 1, which need not be here repeated.

Or, as many cases say, under proper instructions from the court as to the law to be applied, it seems, according as one state of facts or another is found. Hardin v. Hight, 106 Ark. 190, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 368, 153 S. W. 99; Lancaster v. McKay, 103 Ky. 616, 45 S. W. 887; Davis v. Cassidy, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 955, 64 S. W. 633; Kidder v. Parkhurst, 3 Allen, 393; Hart v. Leitch, — Md. —, 91 Atl. 782; Lammers v. Mason, 123 Minn. 204, 143 N. W. 359; Sharpe v. Johnston, 59 Mo. 557; Moody v. Deutsch, 85 Mo. 237; Stubbs v. Mulholland, 168 Mo. 47, 67 S. Ewing*, 174 Pa. 341, 34 Atl. 584; Acker v. Gundy, 9 Sadler (Pa.) 452, 12 Atl. 595; Ramsey v. Arrott, 64 Tex. 320; Garrison v. Pearce, 3 E. D. Smith, 255; Thompson v. Lumley, 50 How. Pr. 105; Gorton v. De Angelis, 6 Wend. 418; Weaver v. Townsend, 14 Wend. 192; Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 387; Burns v. Erben, 40 N. Y. 463; Fagnan v. Knox, 66 N. Y. 525, reversing 8 Jones & S. 41; Rhodes v. Brandt, 21 Hun, 1; Kline v. Hibbard, 80 Hun, 50, 29 N. Y. Supp. 807, affirmed without opinion in 155 N. Y. 679; Clark v. Palmer, 116 App. Div. 117, 101 N. Y. Supp. 759, affirmed without opinion in 191 N. Y. 540, 84 N. E. 1110; Goodman v. Bedras, 123 N. Y. Supp. 250; Palmer v. Palmer, 8 App. Div. 331, 40 N. Y. Supp. 829; Schmidt v. Medical Soc. 142 App. Div. 635, 127 N. Y. Supp. 365, appeal dismissed in 206 N. Y. 730, 100 N. E. 1133; Memphis Gayoso Gas Co. v. Williamson, 9 Heisk. 314.

So, in Hamilton v. Smith, 39 Mich. 222, the court said: "It is the province of the jury to ascertain what state of facts exists, and it is the province of the judge to decide whether that state of facts constitutes probable cause; and the law intends that these functions shall be kept distinct. But as the law appropriate to the facts cannot be laid down unequivocally until it is ascertained what the facts are, it is found necessary where they are in dispute to submit the whole subject to the jury under proper instructions as to the rule of law to be applied according as they find one state of facts or another. The law belonging to any state of facts subject to be found being given to them in advance, they are enabled, on coming to an agreement as to what is the true state of facts, to apply the law delivered to them as belonging thereto, and to formulate the result. Here the facts were in dispute, but the judge failed to give proper attention to this distinction, and also neglected to define or explain probable cause, and the jury returned a general verdict. In such a state of things it is impossible to find out what combination of facts the jury ascertained, or whether they had any intelligent idea at all of this feature of the case." This language is quoted in Wilson v. Bowen, 64 Mich. 133, 31 N. W. 81.

As has been said, when the facts are controverted and the evidence is conflicting, then the determination of their legal effect is necessarily hypothetical, and the jury are to be told that if they find the facts in a designated way, then that such facts, when so found, do or do not amount to probable cause. Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 144; Fulton v. Onesti, 66 Cal. 575, 6 Pac. 491; Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937; People v. Kilvingston, 104 Cal. 86, 43 Am. St. Rep. 73, 37 Pac. 799; Erb v. German American Ins. Co. 112 Iowa, 357, 83 N. W. 1053; Shaul v. Brown, 28 Iowa, 37, 4 Am. Rep. 151.

Under this practice the court performs its function of determining whether the facts found to exist amount to probable cause, by collating the evidence and charging the jury hypothetically that if they find certain facts, enumerating them, to exist, there was probable cause for the prosecution complained of and they must find for the defendant; but if, on the other hand, certain other likewise enumerated facts are found to exist, there was a want of probable cause for the prosecution, and their verdict must be for the plaintiff. McDonald v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 3 Ariz. 96, 21 Pac. 338; Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644; Eastin v. Bank of Stockton, 66 Cal. 123, 56 Am. Rep. 77, 4 Pac. 1106; People v. Kilvington, 104 Cal. 86, 43 Am. W. 801; Finigan v. Sullivan, 65 Wash. 625, 118 Pac. 888.

In Johnson v. Miller, 63 Iowa, 529, 50 Am. Rep. 753, 17 N. W. 34, the court said: "Without determining whether there should be a reversal because of the refusal, under the circumstances, to give the instructions asked, we deem it proper, in view of a retrial, to say that, in actions of malicious prosecution, when the evidence is conflicting, and when the facts it tends to prove are numerous, it is exceedingly important that the instructions in relation to what constitutes probable cause should be clear, definite, and certain. It is true, we apprehend, that what constitutes probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. When the facts are admitted, or have been found by the jury, the law declares whether there was probable cause or not. We think it is important, and the better way, for the court to group together in the instructions the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and then to instruct the jury, if they find that such facts have been established, that they must find that there was or was not probable cause."

But in Donnelly v. Burkett, 75 Iowa, 613, 34 N. W. 330, the plaintiff objected to certain instructions on the subject of probable cause, on the ground that the jury were not informed what facts constituted probable cause for the prosecution. The court said: "We think the instructions are not justly subject to this objection. Among other rules for determining the existence of probable cause, the court informed the jury that if defendants honestly thought the plaintiff guilty, and that belief was based upon a knowledge of facts and circumstances tending to show guilt, which were sufficient to induce an ordinarily reasonable and cautious man to believe plaintiff guilty, the jury should find probable cause. This rule is clearly correct, and sufficient to enable the jury to determine the issue of probable cause. Counsel for plaintiff think the court erred in failing to 'group facts' in the instructions tending to show probable cause; relying upon Johnson v. Miller, supra. We do not think a failure to do this, when it is unnecessary to direct the minds of the jury to facts to be considered upon the question of probable cause, is error. We think it was unnecessary in this case. The jury having been informed that if defendant believed, from facts which would induce a man of ordinary caution to believe, plaintiff guilty, there was probable cause for the prosecution, it was not necessary for the court to enumerate and specify the facts which would induce such belief."

And in Pomeroy v. Golly, Ga. Dec. pt. 1, p. 26, it is held that if there be evidence which renders the facts doubtful as to probable cause, then the court must charge the jury in the alternative, either that there is, or is not, probable cause, as they may find the facts.

(2) When facts are numerous or complicated.

Where the question of reasonable and probable cause depends not upon a few simple facts, but upon facts which are numerous and complicated, and upon inferences to be drawn therefrom, it is the duty of the judge to inform the jury, if they find the facts to be proved, and the inferences to be warranted by such facts, that the same do or do not amount to reasonable or probable cause, so as thereby to leave the question of fact to the jury, and the abstract question of law to the judge. Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169. The court said: "In the more simple cases, where the question of reasonable and probable cause depends entirely on the proof of the facts and circumstances which gave rise to and attended the prosecution, no doubt has ever existed from the time of the earliest authorities but that such question is purely a question of law, to be decided by the judge. . . . And such being the rule of law where the facts are few and the case simple, we cannot hold it to be otherwise where the facts are more numerous and complicated. It is undoubtedly attended with greater difficulty in the latter case, to bring before the jury all the combinations of which numerous facts are susceptible, and to place in a distinct point of view the application of the rule of law, according as all or some only of the facts and inferences from facts are made out to their satisfaction; but it is equally certain that the task is not impracticable, and it rarely happens but that there are some leading facts in each case which present a broad distinction to their view, without having recourse to the less important circumstances that have been brought before them. Upon the whole, as the question both of law and of fact was left in this case entirely to the jury, we think the exception must be allowed, and that there must be a venire de novo."

So, the court cannot divest itself of its duty to determine the question whether the facts amount to probable cause or not, however numerous or complicated those facts may be. It must instruct the jury upon this subject in the concrete, and not in the abstract, and must not leave to that body the office of determining the question, but must itself determine it, and direct the jury to find its verdict in accordance with such determination. The court should group in its instructions the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and then instruct the jury that if they find such facts to be established, there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be, and that their verdict must be accordingly. Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937.

Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 387; Martin v. Hutchinson, 21 Ont. Rep. 388; Humphries v. Edwards, 164 N. C. 154, 80 S. E. 165, sustain the same rule.

(3) Instructions based upon partial or imperfect presentation of facts.

A trial court is right in refusing to give an instruction based upon a partial and imperfect presentation of the facts bearing upon the question of probable cause. Coleman v. Heurich, 2 Mackey, 189.

Such an enumeration of the facts is improper, as it tends to mislead the jury. Memphis Gayoso Gas Co. v. Williamson, 9 Heisk. 314.

And in Rives v. Wood, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 587 (abstract), where appellant was arrested on the complaint of the appellee, president of a turnpike company, for attempting to evade payment of tolls at a certain gate on the company's road, it was held that "if, as a matter of law, appellant was in duty bound to pay toll at the time, it was for the jury to say, from all the facts given in evidence as to what occurred at that time, whether there was or not probable grounds to believe that appellant's purpose was to evade the payment of toll, and an instruction singling out one fact of many, and telling the jury that one fact excluded the idea of probable cause for the arrest, was properly refused."

And in Roberts v. Kendall, 12 Ind. App. 269, 38 N. E. 424, the trial court instructed the jury: "If you find from the evidence that before the commencement of the prosecution, the defendants, Roberts and Harworth, had full knowledge of the facts contained in the affidavit of said Griffin read in evidence on this trial, and that they honestly believed, and had reason to believe, that the statements contained in said affidavit were true, and had no reason to believe the contrary, then there was probable cause to institute the criminal proceedings, but if said defendants did not honestly believe said affidavit to be true, but believed, or had reason to believe, that the same was false, and that the facts therein contained were fabricated by said Griffin, then there was not probable cause for such prosecution, and, if the same was instituted maliciously, your finding should be for the plaintiff." The appellate court, disapproving of this instruction and reversing for the error contained therein, said: "By this instruction the court told the jury that if the defendants did not honestly believe, or had no reason to believe, the statements contained in the affidavit, then there was not probable cause for the prosecution. The court thus singles out from the evidence certain parts tending to or offered for the purpose of showing probable cause, and upon such isolated parts tells the jury that if they find the defendants did not honestly believe, or have reason to believe, it to be true, no probable cause existed for the prosecution. If the affidavit referred to was the basis of the prosecution and all of the evidence introduced tending to show probable cause, the instruction might not be subject to criticism, but there is other evidence tending to prove a state of facts which, if found to be true, would constitute probable cause. The court wholly ignores this evidence, and, in effect, tells the jury that the only basis for the prosecution, and from which they had a right to say the defendants had or had not probable cause for the institution thereof, arises from whether or not they honestly believed, or had reason to believe, the statements contained in the affidavit. There were other facts and circumstances which might fairly be found and inferred from the evidence, which would have constituted probable cause, as well as an honest belief or reason for believing the truthfulness of the statements contained in the affidavit."

It seems that when the court, after all the evidence is in, has to deal with the question of probable cause, it would be highly improper to allow a particular part of the testimony, disconnected from all the other conceded facts and circumstances of the case, to be selected as the hypothesis for the determination of the jury, and upon that alone to declare there was probable cause for the prosecution, and thus defeat the action. McWilliams v. Hoban, 42 Md. 56.

Where, in its hypothetical instructions to the jury, the court, at the request of plaintiff, very briefly and meagerly grouped the facts which would constitute a want of probable cause, and instructed the jury that if they found those facts to be true, the verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff; and at the request of defendants very fully grouped the facts which the evidence tended to prove, and instructed the jury that if they found these facts to be true, then they constituted probable cause for the prosecution against the plaintiff, and the verdict should be for the defendants,—it was held in Holliday v. Holliday, 123 Cal. 26, 55 Pac. 703, that the fact that the facts, as grouped at the request of plaintiff, were insufficient to show a want of probable cause, could not have misled the jury, when all the instructions were read together, as the jury must be presumed to have understood that if the facts, as grouped at the request of the defendants, were not found to be true, then there necessarily must have been a want of probable cause.

In Boush v. Fidelity & D. Co. 100 Va. 735, 42 S. E. 877, the court said: "The question of probable cause embraces a mixed proposition of law and fact. Whether the evidence relied on, if true, establishes facts which amount to probable cause, is a question of law for the court, but whether such evidence is true is a question of fact for the jury. It is permissible, therefore, for a court to instruct the jury that certain facts and circumstances, if they exist, are sufficient to constitute probable cause. But it is not permissible for a court to submit the question of the existence or nonexistence of such facts and circumstances to the jury either upon a partial enumeration of them, or upon a part only of the evidence relevant to that issue. To illustrate, an instruction which tells the jury that certain evidence adduced by the defendant, if true, establishes facts and circumstances which amount to probable cause, omitting other material elements entering into that question, and ignoring the countervailing evidence of the plaintiff relevant to that issue, is erroneous. The proposition is obvious, and does not require elaboration. Such an instruction comes within the prescription of that line of decisions which hold that an instruction must not call special attention to a part only of the evidence and the fact which it tends to prove, and disregard other evidence relevant to the matter in issue." In this case an agent was arrested on a charge of embezzlement, and there was evidence tending to support the charge, but there was also evidence tending to show that the principal and agent had agreed to occupy the relation to each other of debtor and creditor, and that the defendant knew of this fact; but this evidence was ignored by the trial court in its instruction. The circumstance of the relation of debtor and creditor, of course, had an important bearing upon the question of probable cause, and ought not to have been excluded from the instruction.

"It is now the established doctrine, both in this country and in England, that what facts and circumstances amount to probable cause is a question of law, but whether these facts and circumstances exist in the particular case is for the jury. In this state the jury are instructed hypothetically as to what constitutes probable cause, leaving it to them to find the facts embraced in the hypothesis. Boyd v. Cross, 35 Md. 197. But when the court has to deal with such a case after the evidence is all in, it would be highly improper to allow a particular part of the testimony, disconnected from all the other conceded facts and circumstances of the case, to be selected as the hypothesis, and upon that alone to declare there was probable cause for the prosecution, and thus defeat the action. Such a course would in many instances defeat the ends of justice." Stansbury v. Fogle, 37 Md. 369.

Where a prayer instructs the jury that the plaintiff is entitled to recover if certain facts are found to exist, its effect is to withdraw from the consideration of the jury all facts other than those specified, and the rule is that the prayer is erroneous if the facts which it excludes admit of a conclusion different from the one to which it is directed. Hart v. Leitch, — Md. —, 91 Atl. 782.

It is held error in Glasgow v. Owen, 69 Tex. 167, 6 S. W. 527, to so frame an instruction to the jury as to practically withdraw from the consideration of the jury a fact in evidence which they might legally consider in determining the existence of probable cause for the prosecution. And see to the same effect, Heldt v. Webster, 60 Tex. 207.

An instruction that the jury may find a want of probable cause from the fact that the criminal prosecution against plaintiff by defendant resulted in favor of the former was held erroneous in Danzer v. Nathan, 145 App. Div. 448, 129 N. Y. Supp. 966, because it ignored affirmative evidence of probable cause, and permitted the jury to act merely on a prima facie case, unaffected by such evidence.

(4) Examples of instructions.

The want of probable cause is a question of law for the court. Where the facts are admitted, it is the duty of the court to declare to the jury whether or not there is want of probable cause; otherwise, it should be left to the jury to determine whether certain controverted facts exist, they being instructed that upon their finding touching these facts will depend the question of want of probable cause. That is to say, the judge must say to the jury: "I tell you, if you think so and so, there is a want of reasonable and probable cause." Whether the circumstances relied on are true is a question for the jury, but whether, if true, they amount to want of probable cause, is a question of law for the court. Stamper v. Raymond, 38 Or. 17, 62 Pac. 20; Gee v. Culver, 12 Or. 228, 6 Pac. 775, is to the same effect.

And where the court had repeatedly and correctly charged the jury that they were the sole and exclusive judges of the facts, but that what facts would constitute a want of probable cause was a question of law for the court, and had stated to them that if certain facts which were enumerated existed, probable cause was shown, and they should find for the defendants, and that certain other enumerated facts, if found to exist, would show a want of probable cause for instituting the proceedings complained of, and the verdict should be for the plaintiffs, a further instruction that the plaintiffs, in order to establish their case, must show such facts as would warrant the jury in finding "that there was malice and want of probable cause on the part of the defendants," while not an apt expression, was held not such as to mislead the jury in the face of the other instructions, to believing that they were to find upon the question of law as to what facts constituted probable cause. Sandell v. Sherman, 107 Cal. 391, 40 Pac. 493.

that plaintiff, in order to recover, "has only to show to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence the following: 1. That the prosecution was without probable cause; 2. That the prosecution was malicious; 3. That plaintiff has been damaged thereby. You are the exclusive judges of all the questions of fact," and it was claimed that this instruction declared "probable cause" to be a question of fact,—the court said: "This court has repeatedly held that 'probable cause' is a question of law, but that the existence of sufficient facts to constitute probable cause is a question of fact. Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937; People v. Kilvington, 104 Cal. 91, 43 Am. St. Rep. 73, 37 Pac. 799. The instruction we have quoted is not perfect in form. At the same time we do not consider it seriously objectionable, especially in view of the other instructions given upon the question of probable cause. The jury were told, strictly in accordance with the law, that if they found the evidence disclosed certain facts (naming them), then there was no probable cause for the arrest. Under these circumstances, we cannot be brought to believe that the jury were in any way misled by the instruction heretofore quoted."

And where the evidence diametrically conflicted, it was not improper for the court to say in its charge to the jury: "This discrepancy in the evidence will present to the jury the duty of deciding, as matter of fact, who has told the truth here, and who has failed in that respect, because as they ascertain the facts to be in regard to this possession of the property by the present plaintiff, their verdict will probably be for the one or the other party now in litigation." Barhight v. Tammany, 158 Pa. 545, 38 Am. St. Rep. 853, 28 Atl. 135. The court said: "There is no substantial ground for the complaint that the charge was inadequate. The principles governing the action were clearly and correctly stated in it. But the evidence submitted by the appellee showed that the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause, while the evidence submitted by the appellant showed the existence of probable cause, and the absence of malice on his part. This conflicting testimony was for the consideration of the jury, and what the learned judge said in reference to it amounted to an instruction that if the facts were as claimed by the appellee, the verdict should be in her favor, and if they were as claimed by the appellant, it should be against her. This instruction was quite as intelligible to the jury as if the learned judge had said that the testimony on the part of the appellant showed that there was probable cause for, and no malice in, the prosecution, or that the testimony on the part of the appellee showed that there was malice in it and a want of probable cause for it."

was alleged, on the one side, that a felony had been committed, and on the other, that the whole matter was a false conspiracy, supported by perjury. The court would leave it to the jury on the whole evidence to determine how the truth was: if, as alleged on behalf of the defendant, a felony had been committed, plaintiff could not recover; if, on the other hand, it were all false, the plaintiff should recover, and the jury were the sole judges of what damages should be given.' We are not able to perceive any error in this part of the charge. The court states to the jury the point in controversy arising out of the testimony, viz., that the defendant contends that the plaintiff is guilty of the felony charged, and the plaintiff that she is innocent, and that the charge is got up by a conspiracy by the defendant and others, and is supported by perjury. Whether this be so or not, the court very properly says, is a question for the determination of the jury, depending upon the facts proven, and the fair deductions to be drawn from them; and the proposition is most unquestionably true that if the plaintiff were guilty of the felony charged, she had no cause of action, but that if the charge originated in a conspiracy, and was supported by perjury, she was entitled to a verdict, and to such damages as the jury, in their discretion, might think proper to allow. If it resulted as a necessary consequence, from this part of the charge, that the plaintiff, unless she were guilty of the felony, was, in the opinion of the court, entitled to a verdict, it would be erroneous. But no such consequence follows, because the court expressly says in that part of the charge immediately preceding, 'that a party might have probable cause to institute a prosecution for felony against an innocent person, and in that case no action could be maintained.'

And in Leahey v. March, 155 Pa. 458, 26 Atl. 701, the court said: "What facts and circumstances will amount to probable cause is a question of law; whether they exist in a particular case is a question of fact; where the facts are in controversy, the subject must be submitted to the jury, in which event it is the duty of the court to instruct them what facts will constitute probable cause, and submit to them only the question of such facts, Dietz v. Langfitt, 63 Pa. 241. Following this well and clearly defined principle, the learned judge in this case instructed the jury that, to entitle plaintiff to recover, he must show that the prosecution was instituted without cause and with malice, and, after defining malice, he says: 'We say to you that if the account given by Leahey (appellee) is a true one, if you believe what he says as to the agreement and the manner and terms upon which he regained the possession of the four notes, there was no larceny of the notes; that he was entitled to their possession, and his taking them off the desk was not a felonious taking. In other words, we say to you that March had no probable cause to suppose the taking of the notes was a theft of them, nor that it was other than Leahey had a right to do under the agreement.' The last sentence is made the first assignment of error, and it is contended that it amounted to a binding instruction to find for plaintiff. The malicious prosecution for which this action was brought arose from a transaction in reference to four promissory notes drawn by the Altoona Fuel & Ice Company to the order of John Flannigan; and in regard to the appellee's account of the transaction the learned judge said: 'The theory of the plaintiff's complaint is that on the agreement the four notes were placed in March's (appellant's) hands as collateral security for a loan on them of 50 per cent of the amount of the notes, or for the return of the $200, and that as March could not raise the sum of 50 per cent of the notes, he was therefore entitled to the return of the $200; and as Leahey, at March's request, actually returned the $200 by his check, he, Leahey, was entitled to have again the four notes. He contends that his picking them off the desk where March had laid them for him was not an offense at all; that it was only carrying out the terms of the agreement; that, as he had paid back the $200, the notes were redeemed from the pledge; and, in short, they were his notes again and his own property. If this narration of Leahey is correct, then the notes were Leahey's again, and he had a right to take them.' It is manifest that if appellee owned the notes and had a right to take them, there was no probable cause for his arrest for stealing them, and when the learned trial judge used the words in question, in connection with that which preceded, he simply indicated to the jury that if those facts were true appellant had no probable cause to suppose the appellee in taking them was guilty of a theft. It is claimed that he intended them as a binding instruction. Clearly they were not so, and it is equally clear that the jury could not have so understood them."

And an instruction that if the jury shall believe from the evidence in the case that defendant, at the time complained of by the plaintiff, had received information to the effect that a person of plaintiff's description had stolen a watch in a certain city, and that said information was such a reasonably prudent person would act upon, and that defendant, from such information, had reasonable grounds to believe, and in good faith did believe, that plaintiff was the thief, then defendant had probable cause for procuring her arrest and instituting a prosecution for the theft,—was held in Keiner v. Collins, — Ky. —, 171 S. W. 399, to properly submit the question of probable cause to the jury.

But it is error to instruct the jury: "If the facts are disputed, it is for you to determine whether or not there was probable cause." Beihof v. Loeffert, 159 Pa. 365, 28 Atl. 217.

And an instruction that "the length of time that elapsed between the alleged discovery of the forgery by the defendant and the date of the arrest may be considered by the jury in determining the question of malice and the want of probable cause," was erroneous as leaving it to the jury to determine not only the existence of the facts, but to say whether they amounted to probable cause. Costello v. Knight, 4 Mackey, 65.

So it was error to charge the jury: "If you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant procured the arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint herein, and that the same was done with malice, and without probable cause therefor, then you will find for the plaintiff." "If, on the other hand, you find that no malice or want of probable cause has been shown on the part of the defendants, then your verdict will be in favor of the defendants." Fulton v. Onesti, 66 Cal. 575, 6 Pac. 491.

An instruction given by the court stating "that the plaintiff's discharge by the examining magistrate is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause for the charge, and the burden is upon the defendant to prove to the satisfaction of the jury the existence of probable cause," was objectionable for the same reason. Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 144. If the court was of the opinion that the discharge of the plaintiff, under the undisputed circumstances appearing, established the want of probable cause, the jury should have been so instructed; if, however, there were other and disputed facts, the ascertainment of the truth of which by the jury in the one way or in the other would affect the question of probable cause, the disputed facts should have been called to their attention, and the legal effect of those disputed facts, when found either way, as bearing upon the question of probable cause, should have been explained to them.

A requested instruction that if the jury believed from the evidence "that at the time of the alleged prosecution, the facts of which the defendant, Moore, then had knowledge, were sufficient to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the alleged charge was true, the plaintiff cannot recover in this action," was properly refused as an attempt to submit to the jury the question of the existence of probable cause. Ibid. The court said: "This instruction as requested was obnoxious to the same objection as the last, in that it omitted all reference to the actual state of mind or belief of the defendant at the time; though the facts or circumstances of which he knew or was informed 'were sufficient to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the alleged charge was true,' still the defendant may not, in fact, have believed the charge to be true; and if he did not so believe, there L.R.A.1915D.

could, as to him, be no probable cause for setting the prosecution on foot. But the proposed instruction is in another respect objectionable. It sought to submit to the jury the question of the existence of probable cause. To inquire whether or not such facts as were known to the defendant were sufficient to warrant him as a reasonable man in the belief that the plaintiff was guilty is to inquire not only what particular facts were known to him, but also, and at the same time, to determine their legal sufficiency or insufficiency as constituting probable cause. The authorities are substantially uniform that the question of probable cause, however presented, is a question of law, and therefore one to be determined by the court. When the facts in reference to the alleged probable cause are admitted, or established beyond controversy, then the determination of their legal effect is absolute, and the jury are to be told that there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be. When, however, the facts are controverted, and the evidence is conflicting, then the determination of their legal effect by the court is necessarily hypothetical, and the jury are to be told that if they find the facts in a designated way, then that such facts, when so found, do or do not amount to probable cause. But in neither case are the jury to determine whether or not the established facts do or do not amount to probable cause."

In Emerson v. Skaggs, 52 Cal. 246, the trial court instructed the jury as follows: "Whether there was probable cause for the prosecution against Emerson is a mixed question of law and fact, and I charge you that the evidence offered for the defendant, even if accepted as true, does not establish probable cause for the prosecution. If all the statements of defendant and his witnesses which relate to the relations between Skaggs and Emerson and between Skaggs and the other parties arrested upon his complaint, and all the acts of hostility testified to, and the testimony in relation to communications made to Skaggs, and all the actions of Emerson and those who were arrested with him, be true, as stated by said witnesses, still they do not amount to probable cause, and did not justify the arrest of the plaintiff. I charge you, in plain terms, that if all the evidence offered by the defense in this action be true, it does not establish probable cause for the arrest of plaintiff." And the appellate court, sustaining defendant's exception thereto, said: "It is not error for the trial court to instruct the jury in an action for malicious prosecution, that, if certain facts are proved, there was or was not probable cause for the prosecution alleged to have been malicious. On the contrary, such an instruction is eminently proper, and it is error to leave it to the jury to determine whether the facts and circumstances proved do or do not establish the want of probable cause. Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 387; Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644. Where there is no dispute about the facts proved by plaintiff, and it clearly appears to the judge that the facts fail to establish a want of probable cause, he may grant a nonsuit, or direct a verdict in favor of defendant. In this action the burden is on the plaintiff to show affirmatively that there was a want of probable cause. 29 Cal. 655. This being made out prima facie by plaintiff, it is for defendant to overcome the plaintiff's case by disproving the facts sought to be established by him, or by proving other facts which establish probable cause. But the court is not authorized, in its instructions, to assume the existence of any fact where there is a conflict in the evidence in respect to it, or its nonexistence where there is evidence tending to prove it. It is not necessary to point out specifically the facts which the evidence introduced by defendant tended to prove, and which, if proved to the satisfaction of the jury, would have established probable cause. It is enough to say that, in our opinion, the court below should have specified those facts in its instructions, leaving it to the jury to determine whether they were established or not."

It was error to instruct the jury that "to authorize a recovery in this class of cases, it must not only appear that the defendant was actuated by malice, but the jury must further believe from the testimony that the defendant had no probable cause or no reasonable grounds to believe the plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged against him; and the court further instructs the jury that probable cause means a reasonable ground of suspicion supported by circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonably cautious man to believe that the person accused is guilty of the offense charged." Bell v. Keepers, 37 Kan. 64, 14 Pac. 542.

In Bell v. Keepers, supra, the trial court also instructed the jury as follows: "'11. To constitute probable cause for a prosecution, there must be such reasonable grounds for suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong, to warrant an ordinarily cautious man in the belief that the person arrested is guilty of the offense charged.' '14. To authorize a recovery in this class of cases, it must not only appear that the defendant was actuated by malice, but the jury must further believe from the testimony that the defendant had no probable cause or no reasonable grounds to believe the plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged against him; and the court further instructs the jury that probable cause means a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonably cautious man to believe that the person accused is guilty of the offense charged.'" The appellate court said: "By these instructions the court gave to the jury the question of probable cause, and left them to determine what facts would constitute probable cause. This was error. Probable cause, or the want thereof, is a question of law to be determined by the L.R.A.1915D.

court, and not a question of fact to be found by the jury. True, if the facts upon which probable cause is to be founded are in dispute, the court may submit to the jury the questions of fact; but even in that case, the instructions must state what facts, when found by the jury, will be sufficient to establish probable cause. The relations of the parties, their rights and interests in the property in dispute, being fixed by the written contract, no question then of probable cause was in dispute, and the court ought to have instructed the jury as to whether or not plaintiff had established the want of probable cause. Justice Brewer held in Parli v. Reed, 30 Kan. 534, 2 Pac. 635: 'The court passes upon the law. It is its province to say what constitutes probable cause, for that is a matter of law.'"

In Driggs v. Burton, 44 Vt. 124, the charge, although stating correctly what in law would constitute probable cause, was erroneous in that it submitted to the jury to decide not only upon the existence of the facts, but whether upon the facts they should find to have existed, there was probable cause as defined by the court.

In Cottrell v. Cottrell, 126 Ind. 181, 25 N. E. 905, the court said: "This brings us to instruction No. 6, given by the court to the jury. By this instruction the jury were told, among other things, as follows: 'If, on the other hand, when the defendant inquired for the children, if so he did, he was informed in good faith by the mother that she had the children, and if they wished to return with him they could do so, but if they did not he would have to walk over her dead body to get them, this is a fact you may consider as tending to show want of probable cause.' The instruction was erroneous. It is well-settled law that as to what constitutes probable cause is a question of law for the court. The well-considered case of Pennsylvania Co. v. Weddle, 100 Ind. 138, collates the authorities, and is a valuable discussion of the subject. The court refers to certain isolated facts in this part of the instruction under consideration, and informs the jury that if they find the facts to which it refers to exist, they may consider such facts as tending to show want of probable cause, thus leaving it to the jury to say whether there was, or was not, probable cause. By this instruction the court delegated to the jury the right to determine the legal question of probable cause. The instruction gave the jury to understand that they might or might not, in their discretion, find the absence of the element of probable cause in case they found that certain facts to which their attention was called had been proved. The instruction was calculated to mislead the jury; they might readily conclude therefrom that in case they found the facts named in the instructions, they might disregard all the other evidence in the case and find that there was an absence of probable cause. Had the court, in recognition of its right to determine as a question of law from the facts proved the presence or absence of probable cause, informed the jury that the facts stated in the said instruction proved a want of probable cause, in disregard of the other evidence in the case, it would have been error, and the instruction as given was equally, if not more, objectionable. It was the duty of the court to state in hypothetical form the material facts which the evidence tended to establish, and give them positive instructions as to whether, upon the state of facts assumed, there was probable cause. And if there was conflicting evidence, it was the duty of the court to charge the law upon the conflicting theories. Pennsylvania Co. v. Weddle, supra."

The objection that the trial court therein delegated to the jury the right to determine the legal question of probable cause was sustained to the following instruction in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Dixon, 51 Ind. App. 658, 96 N. E. 815: "In determining the question as to whether the defendant had probable cause to institute the prosecution in controversy, you are to consider only such facts and circumstances as the evidence shows were known to the defendant, or the agent of the defendant, at the time he made the affidavit charging the plaintiff with the crime of receiving certain stolen goods." The court said: "It is well settled by the authorities of this and the supreme court, that the question whether, under a given state of facts, probable cause existed, is a question of law for the court, and not a question of fact for the jury. 'What facts and circumstances amount to probable cause is a pure question of law. Whether they exist or not in any particular case is a pure question of fact. The former is exclusively for the court; the latter for the jury. This subject must necessarily be submitted to the jury when the facts are in controversy; the court instructing them what the law is.'" And citing a number of the earlier decisions in that jurisdiction the court continued: "These authorities make certain the duty of the court not to tell the jury that certain facts may be considered by it in determining whether probable cause existed, nor that, if it find certain facts to exist, it may consider such facts in determining such question. The court must for itself search the evidence on this question, and if there be no conflict therein, it then becomes the court's duty to say, as a matter of law, whether there was or was not probable cause. If, however, the evidence presents two conflicting theories on said question, one consistent with probable cause, and the other consistent with its absence, it then becomes the duty of the court, on the one hand, to group the facts within the evidence which it concludes, as a matter of law, show probable cause, and then hypothetically state such group of facts to the jury, directing it that if it finds such group of facts proven by the evidence that it must [in that event] find that there was probable cause; and, on the other hand, to group the other facts within the evidence which it concludes, as a matter of law, to show the absence of probable cause, and then hypothetically state those facts to the jury, directing it that if it finds such group of facts proven by the evidence that it must find that there was not probable cause; and in no event must the court delegate to the jury the duty of determining for itself, as a matter of law, whether either groups of facts, or any other group that it may find to be proven by the evidence, shows probable cause. That said instruction [supra] violated this rule, and delegated to the jury the duty which the law imposes upon the court, there can be no question."

In Sunderbrand v. Shills, 82 N. J. L. 700, 82 Atl. 914, the court said: "At the conclusion of the case, after the court, in charging the jury, had stated the essential elements which go to make up the gravamen of such an action, the defendant preferred the following request: 'You must find that this arrest was made from malice; that there was no probable cause for the complaint, and that the defendant was fully discharged, in order to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant.' The court properly refused to so charge, since the request involved the submission to the jury of the question of probable cause. That question is always for the court in this class of cases. Where there are disputed facts, the actual facts must be determined by the jury, and it is for the court to instruct as to probable cause or the want of it according as the jury find the facts one way or the other."

An instruction "that if the jury believe from the evidence that defendant had arrested and imprisoned the plaintiff upon a charge of theft, and which was proved not to be true upon a trial before the justices' court, then the law is for the plaintiff, and they must so find; provided there were not probable grounds for so doing upon the part of defendant," is erroneous because it leaves the question whether there was probable cause or not to be settled entirely by the jury, without any directions as to the principles of law arising from the evidence by which they should be governed in determining the question. Greenwade v. Mills, 31 Miss. 464. The court said: "Since the leading case of Johnstone v. Sutton, it is universally agreed that the question of probable cause is a mixed proposition of law and fact; that whether the circumstances alleged to constitute probable cause are sufficiently established is a matter of fact for the jury; but whether, supposing them to be true as alleged, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law to be decided by the court. Munns v. De Nemours, 3 Wash. C. C. 31, Fed. Cas. No. 9,926; Broad v. Ham, 5 Bing. N. C. 722, 8 Scott, 40, 8 L. J. C. P. N. S. 357; Pangburn v. Bull, 1 Wend. 345; Thomas v. Rouse, 2 Brev. 75. If the evidence in relation to essential facts be doubtful, or the testimony conflicting, the court should instruct the jury with reference to the different views to be taken of the evidence, that if they believe certain facts from the evidence, there was not probable cause, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover; but that, if they take a different view of the facts and so find, they should find for the defendant. Masten v. Deyo, 2 Wend. 424; Paris v. Waddell, 1 McMull. L. 358; White v. Fox, 1 Bibb, 369, 4 Am. Dec. 643; Williams v. Norwood, 2 Yerg. 329. If there is no disputed question of fact, no conflict of testimony, or no question of credit of witnesses, it is competent for the court, and its duty, to instruct the jury whether the circumstances are or are not sufficient to show probable cause. But it is error for the court to refer the determination of the question of probable cause to the jury under any state of the case, without declaring to them the principles by which they must be governed in determining the question; because it would be leaving to the jury the determination of questions of law. Ulmer v. Leland, 1 Me. 135, 10 Am. Dec. 48; Plummer v. Gheen, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 66, 14 Am. Dec. 572."

So, to instruct the jury "that if they believed from the evidence that the defendants instituted and carried on a prosecution against plaintiff on the charge of larceny, of which he was acquitted, and that the prosecution was without probable cause, and malicious, they must find for the plaintiff," was erroneous, as leaving the question of probable cause entirely to the jury. Whitfield v. Westbrook, 40 Miss. 311. The court quoted from the Greenwade Case, 31 Miss. 464, and this case may be cited to the same general propositions.

In Schwartz v. Boswell, 156 Ky. 103, 160 S. W. 748, where the court instructed the jury that "reasonable and probable cause means such cause as would induce a reasonably cautious and prudent person to have another arrested under the same or similar circumstances as are shown by the evidence in this case, with the exception of causing a conviction of the party arrested on the charge preferred," one of the two grounds of objections to this instruction was that it failed to inform the jury as to what facts would constitute probable cause. Sustaining this objection, the court said: "As to the first ground of objection to this instruction, it was said by this court in the case of Ahrens & O. Mfg. Co. v. Hoehner, 106 Ky. 692, 51 S. W. 194, that the court should tell the jury what facts constitute probable cause, and let them determine in a case like this whether these facts are proven. Whether certain facts constitute probable cause is a question of law for the court; but whether such facts are proven is for the jury. So, the court should have instructed the jury hypothetically within the range of the facts which the evidence tends to establish, as to what would constitute probable cause, and thus have left to the jury the determination only of whether such facts were proven. 26 Cyc. 109. Upon the state of facts in this record, the court in defining probable cause should have given the following instructions: 'If the jury should believe from the evidence that the defendant, at the time he procured the issuance of the warrant of arrest complained of, believed, and had such grounds as would induce a man of ordinary prudence to believe, that plaintiff, on the occasion mentioned in the evidence, attempted to assault him; or did, or said anything of, a violent nature, calculated to disturb the peace and good order of the persons present; then, and in that event, there was probable cause for procuring the issuance of the warrant. Otherwise, there was not such probable cause.'

So, an instruction that "'probable cause' is such reasonable grounds as ordinarily prudent persons are accustomed to act upon when engaged in a like business, or the doing of a like thing, under like or similar circumstances," was defective as it did not tell the jury what facts constituted probable cause in the case. Keiner v. Collins, — Ky. —, 171 S. W. 399.

In Furness v. Porter, Walk. (Miss.) 442, where the facts had not been found by the jury, although the testimony was conflicting, it was held error to instruct the jury "that admitting all the testimony in favor of the plaintiff to be true, yet that he had not shown a want of probable cause." The courts said: "It is said in some of the elementary books that what shall be deemed probable cause is a matter upon which the courts shall decide, and not the jury. See Espinasse, N. P. 529; 2 Starkie, Ev. 912. But in Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 T. R. 520, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 765, Buller, Justice, said that the question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact; whether the circumstances alleged to show it probable or not existed is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them to be true, they amount to probable cause, is a question of law. In this case, there being evidence on both sides, and the evidence being contradictory, it was surely the province of the jury exclusively to find the facts, to determine which were to be believed, the witnesses of the plaintiff or of the defendant, so that, according to the English authorities, we think the charge of the court was incorrect."

In Dreyfus v. Aul, 29 Neb. 191, 45 N. W. 282, the trial court of its own motion instructed the jury as follows: "If you find that the prosecution against the plaintiff was commenced without probable cause, excuse, or justification, you will find for the plaintiff," etc. The giving of this instruction was error. It left it for the jury to conjecture what facts constituted probable cause or excuse, when it was the duty of the court to inform the jury what facts constituted probable cause, and then leave it for the jury to say what facts were proven.

And it was error to instruct the jury that "if they find from the evidence that, at the time the defendant commenced the prosecution against the plaintiff on the charge of larceny before the magistrate, he had been informed that the plaintiff, either alone or with others, was converting the property, or had converted the property, of the defendant, to his own use, and that the defendant believed such statements to be true, and if they further find that such information was of such character as to warrant a cautious man, that is, a man of ordinary prudence, in believing the plaintiff guilty of the offense charged, and that the defendant did so believe, then the defendant would not be liable in this action." Turner v. O'Brien, 5 Neb. 542, and see subsequent appeal in 11 Neb. 108, 7 N. W. 850. The court said: "In the instruction the court stated the nature and character of the fact to be proved, namely, the mere conversion of property, and then threw upon the jury to determine whether such fact or circumstance constituted probable cause, or in other words, would warrant a man of ordinary prudence to believe the plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged. It is the duty of the court to determine whether such fact, if found, constituted probable cause, or a reasonable ground of suspicion, sufficient to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the plaintiff was guilty of larceny; and it was error to submit this question to the jury."

In Rogers v. Mahoney, 62 Cal. 611, the trial judge instructed as follows: "The jury, in an action for malicious prosecution, are not to determine whether the facts amount to a probable cause; but it is the province of the court to determine that question. I have determined that question, gentlemen, when I tell you that the very fact that this man was arrested and liberated in the police court gave him a right of action," etc. The appellate court, reversing and ordering a new trial, said: "There was such conflict in the evidence as left it proper that the question of the existence of the facts on which the want of probable cause depended should be passed upon by the jury, unless the court below was correct in holding that the bare facts that the woman (called man in the instruction) was 'arrested and liberated' in the police court gave her a cause of action. The charge was erroneous, in that the court determined that the facts mentioned established conclusively want of probable cause. The rule as laid down by the court would certainly simplify the trial of this class of actions. If correct, the law might be thus formulated: First, where plaintiff has been arrested, charged with an offense, and convicted, his action for malicious prosecution will not lie; second, where he has been arrested, charged, and discharged, and these facts are proven to the satisfaction of the court, the case of plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution is made out, because malice may be inferred from want of probable cause. It needs but to state the second position to show that it cannot be successfully maintained." L.R.A.1915D.

A prayer which asks the court to instruct the jury that there is legally sufficient evidence of probable cause does not leave the jury to find the existence of the facts relied on as constituting probable cause, and is therefore properly rejected. Smith v. Brown, 119 Md. 236, 86 Atl. 609.

c. When facts are undisputed.

1. In general.

The authorities generally agree that when the facts and circumstances relied on to show probable cause, or the want of it, are undisputed, admitted, or clearly established by uncontroverted testimony, and not capable of different inferences of fact, the question of probable cause becomes a pure question of law, and that the court without any assistance from the jury has only to say at once, as a matter of law, whether such facts and circumstances amount to probable cause. Or, as the rule is frequently and briefly stated, when the facts and circumstances are undisputed, probable cause is a question of law for the court, which it is error to submit to the jury. Cases taking this view, irrespective of the practice when the facts are in dispute, are:

As stated in Gilbertson v. Fuller, 40 Minn. 413, 42 N. W. 203, "there being no controversy over the facts [in a particular case] it was for the court to declare whether probable cause existed; that is, whether the defendant had 'a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances suffiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the person accused is guilty of the offense with which he is charged."

In Bell v. Atlantic City R. Co. 58 N. J. L. 227, 33 Atl. 211, the court said: "We think that the question of the existence of a reasonable cause for the prosecution in question should have been decided by the court, and should not have been left, as it was, to the jury. The facts on which that question turned were not, as it seems to us, in any degree in dispute, and when that is the condition of affairs the legal rule is that it is the function of the court to pass upon their effect in law. To omit such duty was to deprive the defendant of the important right of testing, in a definite form, by a bill of exception and writ of error, the legal value of the plaintiff's case in its most important feature. In the presence of such a mistake as this, it is not possible to permit the verdict to stand."

In Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 81, the court said: "The defendant's counsel claims a right to have it tried by the jury. He alleges that it is a mixed question, involving both law and fact, and therefore should be submitted to the jury. This argument has in it more of truth than appositeness. Mixed questions must necessarily go to the jury; but with proper instructions from the court as to the law and its application to the facts. But such questions, when the facts are undisputed, resolve themselves into pure questions of law. The functions of the court and jury are different and generally distinct; though sometimes, especially in criminal cases, they run into each other so that they cannot be clearly distinguished or separated. For this case and others of the kind, we think there is no difficulty in drawing the line. If these functions encroach upon each other, it will not be because their respective provinces are not separated by plain boundaries. What facts and circumstances amount to probable cause is a pure question of law. Whether they exist or not, in any particular case, is a pure question of fact. The former is exclusively for the court; the latter for the jury. This subject must necessarily be submitted to the jury when the facts are in controversy; the court instructing them what the law is. 2 Starkie Ev. 912; Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 T. R. 545, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Revised Rep. 269, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 766; Candell v. London, cited in 1 T. R. 520; Reynolds v. Kennedy, 1 Wils. 232; Hill v. Yates, 2 J. B. Moore, 80; Isaacs v. Brand, 2 Starkie, 167, 19 Revised Rep. 695; Brooks v. Warwick, 2 Starkie, 389; Reed v. Taylor, 4 Taunt. 616, 13 Revised Rep. 701; Legget v. Blount, 4 N. C. (Term Rep. 123) 7 Am. Dec. 702; Munns v. Dupont, 2 Browne (Pa.) 42 Appx.; s. c. 3 Wash. C. C. 31, Fed. Cas. No. 9,926; Crabtree v. Horton, 4 Munt. 59; Kelton v. Bevins, Cooke, 90, 5 Am. Dec. 670; Ulmer v. Leland, 1 Me. 135, 10 Am. Dec. 48. But it may happen that this and other mixed questions need not and cannot properly be sent to the jury. When the facts are undisputed, or when all the facts which the plaintiff's evidence conduces to prove, do not show a want of probable cause, it becomes a mere question of law which the court must decide, and it would be useless and improper to take the opinion of a jury upon it; for if they found for the plaintiff, the court would set aside the verdict, not so much because it was against evidence, as because it was against law. Golding v. Crowle, Sayer, 1; Bull. N. P. 14. But such was not this case. The judge instructed the jury that the evidence showed a want of probable cause. In other words, that all the facts which all the evidence tended to prove did not amount to a probable cause for the prosecution of the plaintiff. This withdrew nothing from the jury which belonged to them. It was undoubtedly a virtual decision of this branch of the case, and the jury could not find for the defendant without rejecting this instruction. But it did not assume to decide that any particular facts were or were not proved; but that all, of which there was any evidence, were not sufficient to justify the defendant. It was the most favorable course for him, because it brought his case to a decision upon his own testimony, as given before the magistrate, and upon the assumption that everything was proved which could fairly be inferred in his favor from that and all the other evidence in the case. If it had been left more generally to the jury, they might have found some of these inferences against him. But what is of more importance, it was exactly conformable to the rule of law upon this subject, and according to the principles which we have just explained. To have taken the opinion of the jury, whether certain facts amounted to probable cause or not, would have been to obtain their judgments upon a pure question of law; which would have been a manifest dereliction of duty on the part of the court, an avoidance of the responsibility which belongs to it, and a confounding of the functions of judge and jury, which should ever be kept as distinct as possible."

The rule requiring the court to collate the evidence and instruct as to what facts in the particular case constitute probable cause has no application where there is no evidence of probable cause. Where all the facts which all the evidence tends to prove do not amount to probable cause, the court may instruct accordingly. Grimes v. Greenblatt, 47 Colo. 495, 107 Pac. 1111, 19 Ann. Cas. 608. The court said: "But were we to determine otherwise, and that it is the duty of the court to specifically collate the evidence and instruct the jury as to what facts, if found, would constitute 'probable cause' in the particular case on trial, the rule can apply only where there is some evidence of probable cause. If there be no such evidence the court certainly cannot collate the evidence and so advise the jury. Where there is dispute as to the facts relied on as constituting probable cause, or as showing a want thereof, the determination of such dispute is, like other questions of fact, for the jury; but where all the facts, which all the evidence tends to prove, do not amount to probable cause for the arrest or prosecution, it becomes a question of law to be determined by the court. The court could very properly have instructed the jury in this case that there was no probable cause for the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiff. The facts and circumstances under which defendant acted were not sufficient to justify him, as a man of ordinary caution and prudence, to proceed against plaintiff in the manner disclosed by this record."

In French v. Smith, 4 Vt. 363, 24 Am. Dec. 616, where there was a motion to set aside a verdict and enter a nonsuit, the court said: "The motion for a nonsuit necessarily supposes the question of probable cause in this kind of action to be solely a question of law for the decision of the court. And it is so, when it depends wholly on the evidence of records or written documents, as also when there is no conflict of evidence, nor ground of dispute as to the facts proved. Reynolds v. Kennedy, 1 Wils. 232; Hathaway v. Allen, Brayton (Vt.) 152. But in general, if the evidence relating to this question rests in parol testimony, and especially if there is such evidence on both sides, it then becomes a mixed proposition of law and fact. Whether the circumstances relied on to show the cause for prosecuting to have been probable are true and existed is a matter of fact for the jury to find; but whether, supposing them true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law for the court. Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 T. R. 545, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Revised Rep. 269, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 766. And in a case where there is confessedly no evidence tending to negative the existence of probable cause, the court should, of course, decide that the plaintiff has failed in a point essential to his right of recovery. There is no occasion to determine whether, in this instance, the want of probable cause was sufficiently shown, or whether the evidence was of a character for the court to pronounce upon, since we are of opinion, upon more general grounds, that the motion ought not to prevail."

So, in Bell v. Keepers, 37 Kan. 64, 14 Pac. 542, where the relations of the parties, their rights and interests in property in dispute, were fixed by written contract, no question of probable cause was in dispute, it was held that the court should have instructed the jury as to whether or not plaintiff had established want of probable cause. And to the same effect, see Blachford v. Dod, 2 Barn. & Ad. 179, 9 L. J. K. B. 196.

Obviously, in many cases, though the evidence is accepted, or conceded to be true, different persons may honestly draw diverse conclusions from it. The definitions of probable cause, as pointed out in the beginning of this note, are such as to require the prosecutor to act as a reasonable and prudent man would under the like circumstances, and do not impose liability upon him for his mistaken conclusions, where they are such as that fictitious person, the reasonable and prudent man, would have drawn if placed in the same situation. The evidence may be without substantial conflict, and the witnesses by whom it was given not only entitled to credit, but in fact implicitly believed, and yet one jury or court might reach the conclusion that the prosecutor acted as a reasonable and prudent man, and another that he did not. In such a contingency is the jury or the court the proper tribunal to draw the inference from the undisputed evidence? While there is not a great deal of discussion of this question to be found, the authorities which unqualifiedly assert that when the evidence is not conflicting the court must decide whether probable cause existed imply that the inference referred to must be drawn by the court.

Thus, in Driggs v. Burton, 44 Vt. 124, the court said: "What constitutes probable cause in these actions is a question of law for the court. All inferences to be drawn from facts, undisputed or found by the jury to exist, are upon this subject inferences of law, and not of fact, and are to be drawn by the court, and not by the jury. This rule is peculiar to this class of actions, and has been long established, and is well founded upon sound reasons and good authority. Where the inference to be drawn from existing facts is one of fact, as it usually is in questions of the sufficiency of highways, ordinary care, and the like, it is always to be drawn by the jury. The cases cited upon this point on the part of the plaintiff are apt illustrations of this rule, but they have no application except to cases of that kind. The rule upon this subject as to the existence of probable cause was adopted as early as actions founded upon the want of probable cause were brought into use, and has never been relaxed. In the early history of these actions it was customary to set forth the facts in the defendant's plea, and upon demurrer the court would determine whether there was probable cause or not, upon the facts set forth. Tindal, Ch. J., Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 192, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545. Where some or all the facts were in dispute, the existence of the facts, and that only, was submitted to the jury. The early authorities seem to be uniform to this effect. There are some cases—and among them are Taylor v. Willans, 2 Barn. & Ad. 845, 1 L. J. K. B. N. S. 17, and Broad v. Ham, 5 Bing. N. C. 722, 8 Scott, 40, 8 L. J. C. B. N. S. 357—which alone might seem to countenance the doctrine that the whole evidence and all inferences to be drawn from it were to be submitted to the jury. As to these cases, Ch. J. Tindal, in Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545, in reviewing one of the decisions of Ch. J. Denman, said: There have been some cases in the later books which appear at first sight to have somewhat relaxed the application of that rule by seeming to leave more than the mere question of the facts proved to the jury; but upon further examination it will be found that although there has been an apparent, there has been no real, departure from the rule. And he proceeded to apply the rule to the decision he was reviewing, and reversed it. In Turner v. Ambler, 10 Q. B. 252, 16 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 158, 6 Jur. 346, Lord Denman, Ch. J., said, in granting the rule: A rule nisi must be granted; but it is not to be presumed that we mean to question the doctrine of Panton v. Williams. The rule was afterwards stated and enforced in England, in Heslop v. Chapman, 22 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 296. It has also been strictly adhered to in New York (Pangburn v. Bull, 1 Wend. 345; Baldwin v. Weed, 17 Wend. 224; Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 384); and also in Massachusetts (Kidder v. Parkhurst, 3 Allen, 393). In practice a true application of the rule seems to require that if none of the facts are in dispute, the question of probable cause arising upon them should be decided by the court as a question of law, without the intervention of the jury at all. That if some of the facts are undisputed, and others are in controversy, and the question of probable cause cannot be determined upon the undisputed facts without determining the existence of those in dispute, then the case should be presented to the jury by stating which of the disputed facts are to be passed upon and how, so that by determining the mere existence or nonexistence of them, the question of probable cause or the want of it will be determined, according to the view of them in law taken by the court."

But, on the other hand, however, the New York doctrine, at least, it seems, since Heyne v. Blair, 62 N. Y. 19, reversing 3 Thomp. & C. 263, is that the jury is the proper tribunal to determine what, upon facts from which different men would draw different conclusions, would be the belief and action of men of ordinary caution and prudence. In that case the court said: "The question of probable cause, when there is no conflict in the evidence, no disputed facts, nor any doubt upon the evidence, or the inferences to be drawn from it, is one of law for the court, and not of fact for the jury. It is said in Besson v. Southard, 10 N. Y. 236, that if the facts which are adduced as proof of want of probable cause are controverted, if conflicting testimony is to be weighed, or if the credibility of witnesses is to be passed upon, the question of probable cause should go to the jury with proper instructions as to the law. In such cases it is a mixed question of law and fact. The rule laid down in Masten v. Deyo, 2 Wend. 424, is expressly approved by Jewett, J., in that case. In Masten v. Deyo, Marcy, J., after a review of the authorities, says: 'Where the circumstances relied on as evidence of probable cause are admitted by the pleadings, it belongs to the court to pronounce upon them; and where these circumstances are clearly established by uncontroverted testimony, or by the concession of the parties, and they fully establish a probable cause, the court may refuse to submit the cause to the jury, and order the plaintiff to be nonsuited.' This rule, adhered to, will prevent a confounding of the duties of courts and of juries in actions of this character. The same principle was recognized in Carl v. Ayers, 53 N. Y. 14. It is pre-eminently a question for the judgment of twelve men to determine what, upon a doubtful state of facts, or upon facts from which different men would draw different conclusions,—that is, upon facts capable of different inferences,—would be the belief and action of men of ordinary caution and prudence. Such is the rule in all questions of the like character, and there is no reason why this class of action should form an exception to the rule. It is not the province of this court to pass upon the weight of evidence in the case before us, or determine whether, submitted to the jury with proper instructions, they should have found the want of probable cause. We think there was a fair question for the jury, and they must pass upon it uninfluenced by any intimation from us. It is enough to say that the evidence did not conclusively establish a probable cause, and the evidence tended to show the want of such cause. It should be borne in mind that no act or declaration of the plaintiff was suspicious or relied upon as giving color to the suspicion of wrong on his part. Neither was any act or declaration of others of which he had cognizance relied upon as justifying the prosecution. He was confessedly innocent not only of all wrong, but of every appearance of wrong, and in this respect the case differs from most of those found in the reports. The only circumstances relied upon were a supposed discrepancy in appearance between the indorsement, alleged to have been forged, and other signatures of the same party, and the opinion or impression of the teller of the bank at which the indorser transacted business, as testified to by him, that it did not look exactly like Ackerman's signature; that if he wrote it, he wrote it with a different pen from what he had been in the habit of writing with, and that he might have written it with a bad pen; and the statement of Ackerman, made to the same witness and communicated to the defendant, casually made, and without any knowledge of the purpose of inquiry, that he had only indorsed one $300 note for the plaintiff, when, in fact, the defendant held two such notes. Ackerman had, to the knowledge of the defendant, indorsed many notes for the plaintiff. The defendant states the declarations of the teller in respect to the signature more strongly in his favor, and so far as there was any discrepancy in the testimony, it was for the jury to determine which spoke the truth, as it was also for them to determine the effect which all the information and knowledge in the defendant's possession would have had upon the mind of a man of ordinary prudence and caution, acting conscientiously; that is, the belief which the defendant might have honestly entertained from these and all the other circumstances of the case. The evidence was not of that decisive and conclusive character that justified the court in taking the case from the jury."

And accordingly the following cases hold that if the facts are undisputed and admit of but one inference, probable cause is a question of law for the court; but if the facts are capable of opposing inferences, the question is one of fact for the jury: Hazzard v. Flury, 120 N. Y. 223, 24 N. E. 194; Wass v. Stephens, 128 N. Y. 123, 28 N. E. 21; Collins v. Manning, 32 N. Y. S. R. 998, 10 N. Y. Supp. 658; *Willard v. So it would seem, therefore, that the cases already cited from this jurisdiction as sustaining the rule that probable cause is purely a question of law for the court when the facts are undisputed, together with the following later decisions which appear to sustain the same unqualified rule, must nevertheless be considered in the light of the doctrine of the cases just referred to: Thaule v. Krekeler, 81 N. Y. 428; Neil v. Thorn, 88 N. Y. 270, reversing 17 Hun, 144; Anderson v. How, 116 N. Y. 336, 22 N. E. 695; Willard v. Holmes, Booth & Haydens, 142 N. Y. 492, 37 N. Nigh v. Keifer, 5 Ohio C. C. 1, makes a distinction between facts admitted and facts not contradicted. The court said: "It is within the legitimate province of the jury to investigate the truth of the facts offered in evidence, and the justice of the inference to be drawn from such facts, while at the same time they receive the law from the court that according as they find the facts proved or not proved, and the inferences warranted or not, there was reasonable ground or not for the prosecution. It may be said, in the light of the rule stated in Ash v. Marlow, 20 Ohio, 119, that the court did not err, because the facts in relation to consulting counsel are undisputed. It is true that Keifer and his attorney substantially agree as to what was said between them,—the communications made and the advice given. But if such facts, contradicted by direct testimony, will warrant the court in withdrawing a case from the jury, it would be next to impossible to maintain an action for malicious prosecution where counsel was consulted before the institution of the criminal action. The question of good faith is ignored in the proposition,—an element which we regard as essential to probable cause; a fact upon which the jury must pass. The court below must have assumed that Keifer and his legal adviser testified truthfully, and treated the facts testified to as if they were admitted. We think there is a difference between facts admitted and facts not contradicted. It is often impossible to meet testimony by direct proof; but that alone does not withdraw from the jury the right to pass upon the credibility of such testimony. It is competent for them to disbelieve a statement although it is not contradicted. So here, can it be said, as matter of law, that the jury would have believed the testimony of Keifer and his attorney and found accordingly? We are clear that the question of probable cause should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions as to what constitutes probable cause."

It is immaterial that some or many of the facts bearing on the issue as to probable cause are in dispute, if there are still enough established and undisputed to determine the question in point of law.

Bechel v. Pacific Exp. Co. 65 Neb. 826, 91 N. W. 853; Figg v. Hanger, 4 Neb. (Unof.) 792, 96 N. W. 658.

And where the plaintiff's own evidence discloses probable cause, the presumption in his favor arising from his acquittal in the criminal proceeding is not sufficient to take the case to the jury. Cole v. Reece, 47 Pa. Super. Ct. 212.

It is also a question of law whether there is sufficient evidence of a want of probable cause to sustain the burden of proof which is on the plaintiff. Donnelly v. Daggett, 145 Mass. 314, 14 N. E. 161; Cheever v. Sweet, 151 Mass. 186, 23 N. E. 831.

2. Directed verdict, nonsuit, etc.,

The court having determined, as required by the weight of authority, whether or not the undisputed or clearly established facts amount to probable cause, is likewise required by the same weight of authority to instruct the jury accordingly. See cases cited in preceding section, III. c, supra.

So, if he is of the opinion that the undisputed evidence shows probable cause, he should, according as the state of the case suggests, and the practice of the jurisdiction permits, either order a nonsuit—

In Bacon v. Townsend, 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. 120, Edwards, J., said: "Independent of the ground on which, at nisi prius, I rested the nonsuit, there are other grounds sufficient to sustain it; and, even if I was wrong in holding that the discharge of the recognizance did not put an end to the prosecution, I was right in granting the nonsuit, because there was no want of probable cause. It is well settled that where there is no dispute as to facts, the question of probable cause is one solely for the determination of the court. It would have been erroneous for me to have submitted to the jury to determine whether there was a want of probable cause. That was a question which it was my duty to decide, and it is manifest to me now, on reviewing the testimony as spread out in the bill of exceptions, that there was no want of probable cause. It is therefore no matter whether the reasons which I gave for the nonsuit, on the trial, were well grounded or not. The exception was not to my reasoning, but to the judgment of nonsuit which I ordered. The judgment was clearly right on other grounds, if not on that which I thus rested it, and it ought not be disturbed."

So it has held that probable cause having been shown by the plaintiff's own evidence, the duty of the court to decide that the plaintiff cannot recover may be performed on a motion for a compulsory nonsuit, or by the reservation of a question of law and subsequent entry of judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto. Scott v. Dewey, 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 396.

And it was held in Cooper v. Waldron, 50 Me. 80, that the facts being established as to probable cause, the judge might nonsuit even though evidence has been introduced in defense.

But a nonsuit is not properly granted where there is evidence of a want of probable cause. Simmons v. Brinkmeyer, 72 Cal. 486, 14 Pac. 101.

And a request to dismiss the complaint in an action of this kind at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to meet the burden resting upon him of showing want of probable cause, was properly refused in De Matteis v. La Maida, 74 Hun, 432, 26 N. Y. Supp. 471, where the court would not have been justified in holding as a matter of law that the defendant had such reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances of such strength, as to warrant a cautious man in believing that the plaintiff was guilty of the offense with which he was charged.

If plaintiff's evidence affirmatively shows that defendant had probable cause, a motion for a nonsuit should be granted; but that having been denied, and the cause submitted to the jury, it seems that the court should instruct the jury that the existence of probable cause affirmatively appears, and consequently the defendant is entitled to a verdict. Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644.

And if the facts which the plaintiff's evidence tends to prove would not establish a want of probable cause, although there may be a conflict of evidence, it is the duty of the court to withdraw the question from the jury, because a finding in favor of the plaintiff would not avail him in law upon the point. Fagan v. Knox, 66 N. Y. 525, reversing 8 Jones & S. 41.

And in the same connection the court, in Bechel v. Pacific Exp. Co. 65 Neb. 826, 91 N. W. 853, said: "Granting, however, that want of probable cause may be shown notwithstanding commitment by the examining magistrate, whether the facts adduced to that end show or fail to show want of probable cause is a question for the court. If there is sufficient in undisputed evidence to show probable cause for the prosecution, the trial court should direct a verdict for the defendant. Dreyfus v. Aul, 29 Neb. 191, 45 N. W. 282; Turner v. O'Brien, 11 Neb. 108, 7 N. W. 850. It cannot matter that some or many of the facts bearing on the issue as to probable cause are in dispute, if there are still enough established and undisputed to determine the question in point of law. The facts being determined, the question is one for the court; and if there are enough on which to base a determination without leaving anything that may be in dispute to the jury, there is nothing for the jury to pass upon." And Figg v. Hanger, 4 Neb. (Unof.) 702, 90 N. W. 658, is to the same effect.

And in Lacey v. Porter, 103 Cal. 597, 37 Pac. 635, it was insisted that the trial judge, in directing a verdict for the defendant, erred in "taking from the jury the questions of the credibility of witnesses, malice, motives, intention, and belief of respondent, and what facts the evidence established." The court, sustaining the action of the trial court, said: "The general rule undoubtedly is that these questions should be submitted to the jury where the evidence is conflicting; but it is equally well settled that the court may, within certain limits, control the verdict, either by such an instruction as was here given, or by setting it aside and granting a new trial, L.R.A.1915D.

either upon motion of the defeated party or upon its own motion. To justify the court in directing a verdict it is not necessary that there should be no conflict in the evidence; but where the evidence is such that it is clearly insufficient to support a verdict in favor of the party against whom the direction is given, the instruction is proper, unless the circumstances of the case indicate that, upon another trial, the evidence may be materially different; in which case the facts should be submitted to the jury in order that a new trial may be had. But in either case the decision of the court below will be sustained, unless the appellate court can clearly see that its conclusion is wrong upon the facts. . . . The circumstances relied upon by appellant to show malice on the part of defendant are insufficient for that purpose; but as it is clear that probable cause for the arrest was shown, it is not necessary to discuss them. We think the instruction to find for defendant was right, and that the judgment and order should be affirmed."

In Sartwell v. Parker, 141 Mass. 406, 5 N. E. 807, where it appeared upon the uncontested facts that the plaintiff had settled the alleged malicious suit by paying what was demanded in it, by being charged with it as an item in account, the court said: "A party who terminates a suit by paying what is demanded in it, by being charged with it as an item of account, cannot be admitted to say that the action was commenced without probable cause. The question whether want of probable cause appears is solely for the court, except so far as it depends upon disputed facts, which must be determined by the jury. In this case, the facts claimed by the plaintiff, with the undisputed facts, do not show want of probable cause, and will not sustain a verdict for the plaintiff; and the court properly ordered a verdict for the defendant. Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 81."

And where the facts as proved at the trial are sufficient to rebut the presumption of want of probable cause arising from the termination of the transaction favorably to the plaintiff, it is the duty of the court to direct a verdict for the defendant. Carroll v. Central R. Co. 134 Fed. 684.

Directing a verdict for defendant on the ground that no legally sufficient evidence of want of probable cause has been offered by the plaintiff is not bad in form as submitting questions of law to the jury. It does not submit anything to the jury, either questions of law or of fact. It simply informs the jury that the evidence offered by the plaintiff to prove an essential part of his case is not legally sufficient for that purpose, and that, therefore, their verdict must be for the defendant. Campbell v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 97 Md. 341, 55 Atl. 532.

In Richardson v. Powers, 11 Ariz. 31, 89 Pac. 542, after hearing the testimony in the case, the court instructed the jury, "that the evidence in this case is insufficient to sustain the plaintiff's alleged cause of action, and your verdict will therefore be in favor of the defendant." The appellate court, answering plaintiff's assignment of error on this instruction, said: "The abstract of the appellant does not contain the verdict, the judgment, or the minute entries of the trial court; nor does it contain the testimony given upon the trial, except that of the defendant, Powers. Counsel for appellant in their brief state that all the allegations of the complaint were proved beyond question by the evidence, except the allegations of malice and lack of probable cause; and upon the assumption that the evidence of the defendant, Powers, that is presented to us in the abstract, shows prima facie malice and want of probable cause, we are asked upon this incomplete record to reverse the judgment of the lower court, on the ground that the court should have submitted to the jury the question whether malice and probable cause in fact existed. Upon the record as it is before us, and without the testimony in the case, we could not, in any event, assume that the testimony as a whole did not warrant the action of the trial court in directing a verdict for the defendant. It is the duty of a trial court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant when the evidence given at the trial, taken as a whole, with all the inferences that the jury could justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff. Gila Valley, G. & N. R. Co. v. Lyon, 8 Ariz. 118, 71 Pac. 957; Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478, 27 L. ed. 1003, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 322; Haupt v. Maricopa County, 8 Ariz. 102, 68 Pac. 525. Without the testimony taken at the trial before us, we cannot say that the action of the court was erroneous."

A trial court having correctly found as a matter of law, from the undisputed facts, that defendant had probable cause, a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant is proper. Meyer v. Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. 98 Ky. 365, 33 S. W. 98.

And in Schott v. Indiana Nat. L. Ins. Co. 160 Ky. 533, 169 S. W. 1023, the court said: "The rule as to when a peremptory instruction should be given, in actions for malicious prosecution, is not different from that applicable in other like civil actions. A peremptory instruction should be given where the facts are undisputed, and on the undisputed facts there is not room for a difference of opinion among reasonable men as to the inference to be drawn from them."

But, on the other hand, if the undisputed evidence in the case shows a want of probable cause, the court should, it seems, so instruct the jury, and leave to them the determination of the other issues. Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937; Books v. Bradford, 4 Colo. App. 410, 36 Pac. 303; Huckestein v. New York L. Ins. Co. 205 Pa. 27, 54 Atl. 461.

d. Defining probable cause to the jury.

Inasmuch as the question of probable cause is always to be determined by the L.R.A.1915D.

court from the facts in each particular case, it would seem unnecessary to give to the jury any definition of the term, or any instruction upon abstract propositions relating to this subject. These abstract rules will guide the court in determining the question, but are apt to lead the jury away from their function of passing upon the effect of the evidence in support of the probative facts which the court may direct them to find in order to determine in which way their general verdict shall be rendered. Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937.

Accordingly it has been held error for the court to define, in general terms, what constitutes probable cause, and then to tell the jury that it is a question for them to decide whether or not there was probable cause for the prosecution complained of, i. e., whether the facts of the case are with-in or without the definition of probable cause given by the court. Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644; Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 384; Markley v. Kirby, 6 Kan. App. 494, 50 Pac. 953; Wilson v. Bowen, 64 Mich. 133, 31 N. W. 81; Finigan v. Sullivan, 65 Wash. 625, 118 Pac. 888; Hess v. Oregon German Baking Co. 31 Or. 503, 49 Pac. 803; Weaney v. Rei-Newfoundland Co. 39 N. S. 407.

Such a charge commits to the jury more than is their legitimate province to determine.

Concerning an instruction of this kind the court in Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 384, said: "The jury are told that it is their province to determine whether the facts and circumstances proved in evidence do or do not establish the want of probable cause. The judge does not decide whether these facts and circumstances are sufficient or not, provided the jury believe them to be proved, but leave the whole matter to the determination of the jury. If the judge had supposed the truth of the facts, as sworn to, admitted of a doubt, he should have expressed his opinion of the law arising upon those facts, if proved, and then submitted to the jury the question whether they were credibly proved or not."

Concerning a similar instruction the court in Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644, said: "The law makes it the duty of the judge who tries an action for malicious prosecution, to instruct the jury that as they may find and determine certain questions of fact, properly submitted to them, to be true or untrue, so must be their verdict for the plaintiff or for the defendant; not that they should determine the question of the want of probable cause or the contrary. It may sometimes be difficult to state to the jury what the testimony is, and what facts, if found to be true, establish the plaintiff's allegation of want of probable cause; but difficult as it may be, this duty is cast on the judge in this kind of actions, because he is presumed to know, much better than the jury can, what facts show the existence of probable cause or the want of it."

But while it is hardly proper (Scrivani v.

Dondero, infra), it is not error, for the court to give the jury a general definition of probable cause, where, by other instructions, they are told what facts under the evidence in the case, if found by the jury, would constitute probable cause or the want thereof. Jonasen v. Kennedy, 39 Neb. 313, 58 N. W. 122; Maynard v. Sigman, 65 Neb. 590, 91 N. W. 576; and Scrivani v. Dondero, 128 Cal. 31, 60 Pac. 463.

And see infra, IV.

In Hess v. Oregon German Baking Co. 31 Or. 503, 49 Pac. 803, the court said: "It is next claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury that the waiver of an examination is not of itself conclusive evidence of the existence of probable cause, but 'is a single fact to be weighed by the jury for what it, under all circumstances, appears to be worth in determining that question.' The objection to this instruction is that it assumes the question as to whether probable cause has been shown to be one of fact, to be determined by the jury, and not of law, for the court; and this seems to have been the view of the trial judge as indicated by his general instructions. After defining probable cause, and giving an unusually clear and accurate statement of the law as to when it would be a defense to an action of this character, the court concluded its charge upon the subject as follows: 'If, therefore, you find that the defendant had reasonable ground to believe and suspect that the plaintiff was guilty of larceny, or had knowingly received the avails of the larceny committed by another, and was assisting such other to secrete such avails, with the view to place them beyond the reach of the owner, and that, acting on such belief, he instituted the proceedings complained of, your verdict should be for the defendant.' This instruction necessarily involved the submission to the jury of the question of probable cause. There is no distinction between the existence or non-existence of a reasonable ground of belief, and the existence or want of probable cause. The difference is one of expression only, and not of substance. The existence of reasonable grounds for believing a charge to be true is nothing more than probable grounds for making it. And, in determining whether the defendant had reasonable grounds to believe the plaintiff guilty, the jury must necessarily decide whether or not there was probable cause for instituting the prosecution. The charge of the court, therefore, was nothing more than defining probable cause, and permitting the jury to determine whether the facts which they might consider to be proved were within or without that definition. The point for decision, then, is whether the question of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution is one of fact, to be submitted to the jury, or of law, to be decided by the court. The decisions upon this question are not entirely uniform, but we think the great weight of authority is to the effect that in this class of actions the question of probable cause is a mixed one of law and fact, in the sense that the facts, when in controversy, are to be determined by the jury, but whether they constitute probable cause is for the court. 'No rule of law is better settled, both in England and in America,' says Mr. Thompson, 'than that in civil actions for damages for the malicious prosecution of a criminal action the question of probable cause is a question of law, which the judge must decide, upon established or conceded facts, and which it is error for him to submit to the jury.' 2 Thomp. Trials, § 1613. And Mr. Newell says that 'what facts, and whether particular facts, constitute probable cause, is a question exclusively for the court. What facts exist in a particular case when there is a dispute in reference to them is a question exclusively for the jury. When the facts are in controversy, the subject of probable cause should be submitted to the jury, either for specific findings of the facts, or with instructions from the court as to what facts will constitute probable cause. These rules involve an apparent anomaly, and yet few, if any, rules of the common law rest upon greater unanimity or strength of authority.' Newell, Malicious Prosecution, 277. In Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545, decided in 1841, where the question was elaborately examined both by counsel and the court, Tindal, Ch. J., reviewing the earlier authorities, at length concluded that, in cases of this character, whether the facts which are relied upon to show probable cause are true or not is a question for the jury, but whether they constitute probable cause is a question wholly for the court. 'There have been some cases in the later books,' he said, 'which appear at first sight to have somewhat relaxed the application of that rule, by seeming to leave more than the mere question of the facts proved to the jury; but, upon further examination, it will be found that, although there has been an apparent, there has been no real, departure from the rule. Thus, in some cases, the reasonableness and probability of the ground for prosecution has depended not merely upon the proof of certain facts, but upon the question whether other facts which furnished an answer to the prosecution were known to the defendant at the time it was instituted. Again, in other cases, the question has turned upon the inquiry whether the facts stated to the defendant at the time, and which formed the ground of the prosecution, were believed by him or not. In other cases the inquiry has been whether, from the conduct of the defendant himself, the jury will infer that he was conscious he had no reasonable or probable cause. But in these and many other cases which might be suggested it is obvious that the knowledge, the belief, and the conduct of the defendant are really so many additional facts for the consideration of the jury; so that, in effect, nothing is left to the jury but the truth of the facts proved and the justice of the inferences to be drawn from such facts, both which investigations fall within the legitimate province of the jury, while at the same time they have received the law from the judge,—that, according as they find the facts proved or not proved, and the inferences warranted or not, there was reasonable or probable ground for the prosecution, or the reverse. And, such being the rule of law where the facts are few and the case simple, we cannot hold it to be otherwise where the facts are more numerous and complicated. It is undoubtedly attended with greater difficulty in the latter case, to bring before the jury all the combinations of which numerous facts are susceptible, and to place in a distinct point of view the application of the rule of law, according as all or some only of the facts, and inferences from facts, are made out to their satisfaction. But it is equally certain that the task is not impracticable; and it rarely happens but that there are some leading facts in each case which present a broad distinction to their view, without having recourse to the less important circumstances that have been brought before them.' In a great majority of the American states the same rule has been adopted, and it is held to be the duty of the court to determine, as a matter of law, whether a given state of facts, when conceded or established, no matter how numerous or complicated, constitutes probable cause for instituting a criminal prosecution. Whether the facts and circumstances alleged to show probable cause are true and exist is, of course, a question of fact, and, when controverted, must be determined by the jury, but whether, supposing them to be true, they amount to probable cause, is a question of law. If none of the facts are in dispute, the court must decide the question without the intervention of a jury; but, if the case cannot be so decided, it must go to the jury with instructions from the court that certain facts, if found by them to exist, do or do not constitute probable cause; or, as put by Waldo, Ch. J., in Gee v. Culver, 12 Or. 233, 6 Pac. 776, 'the judge must say to the jury: "I tell you, if you think so and so, there is a want of reasonable and probable cause."' In short, the jury must determine the facts if controverted, but not their legal effect. 'What facts and circumstances amount to probable cause is a pure question of law; whether they exist or not in any particular case is a pure question of fact. The former is exclusively for the court, and the latter for the jury,' says the supreme court of Massachusetts in Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 84. 'Probable cause is in the nature of a judgment to be rendered by the court upon a special verdict of the jury,' says Judge Harrison in Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 227, 27 Am. St. Rep. 173, 28 Pac. 938, 'and is not to be rendered until after the jury has given its verdict upon the facts by which it is to be determined. It is not, however, necessary that the facts be found by the jury in the form of a special verdict. The court may instruct them to render their verdict for or against the defendant, according as they shall find the facts designated to it which the court may deem sufficient to constitute probable cause. But it is necessary for the court, in each instance, to determine whether the facts that they may find from the evidence will or will not establish that issue. Neither is it competent for the court to give to the jury a definition of probable cause, and instruct them to find for or against the defendant, according as they may determine that the facts are within or without that definition. Such an instruction is only to leave to them in another form the function of determining whether there was probable cause. The court cannot divest itself of its duty to determine this question, however complicated or numerous may be the facts. It must instruct the jury upon this subject in the concrete, and not in the abstract, and must not leave to that body the office of determining the question, but must itself determine it, and direct the jury to find its verdict in accordance with such determination. The court should group in its instructions the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and then instruct the jury that, if they find such facts to be established, there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be, and that their verdict must be accordingly.' Without further elaboration of this question or further special reference to the authorities, it is sufficient to say that, under the adjudged cases, it is generally the duty of the trial court, in instructing juries in cases of this character, to apply the law to the facts by telling them whether the facts which the evidence tends to establish, if found by them to exist, will or will not constitute probable cause for the prosecution, leaving to the jury only the question as to the existence of such facts; and that it is error to define probable cause in general terms, and to submit to the jury the question as to whether the facts in the particular case do or do not come within such definition. The credibility of the evidence, and what facts it proves, are for the jury; but whether such facts do or do not constitute probable cause is a question exclusively for the court. The court should therefore, by means of a hypothetical instruction, group the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and instruct the jury that, if they find such facts to have been established, they must find that there was or was not probable cause. . . . Because this rule of law was not followed in the submission of the case under consideration, it must be reversed, and a new trial ordered, although the instructions as actually given by the court are unobjectionable and a lucid statement of the law, in view of the theory upon which the case was submitted by the trial judge."

Some decisions, however, seem to sanction the practice, when the evidence is conflicting, of defining probable cause to the jury, and leaving them to decide, in the light of such definition, whether probable cause for the prosecution existed or not. Cole v. Curtis, 16 Minn. 182, Gil. 161; Ash v. Marlow, 20 Ohio, 119; Landa v. Obert, 45 Tex. 539; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. James, 73 Tex. 12, 15 Am. St. Rep. 743, 10 S. W.

744; Schattgen v. Holnback, 149 Ill. 646, 36 N. E. 969; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 75 Ill. App. 17; Pinson v. Campbell, 124 Mo. App. 260, 101 S. W. 621; Schofield v. Ferrers, 47 Pa. 194, 86 Am. Dec. 532; Delany v. Lindsay, 46 Pa. Super. Ct. 26; Lytton v. Baird, 95 Ind. 349; Keener v. Jeffries, 54 Pa. Super. Ct. 553.

In Lytton v. Baird, 95 Ind. 349, objection was made to the following instruction: "Then you come to the last inquiry, if the defendant did procure said indictment to be returned, and the prosecution to be instituted, did he have no probable cause? Probable cause means that the party has possession of certain facts either from information or actual knowledge, which would induce a reasonably prudent man to believe that the crime in question was committed." The court answered the objection: "It will be observed that the court stated to the jury what constituted, in law, probable cause, and properly submitted to them the question whether the facts in this case, as shown by the evidence, established probable cause, as defined by the court. The question of probable cause, where there is no conflict in the evidence, nor disputed facts, nor any doubt upon the evidence, or the inferences to be drawn from it, is one of law. But if the facts adduced as proof of want of probable cause are controverted, or if conflicting evidence is to be weighed, or if the credibility of witnesses is to be passed upon, the question of probable cause should go to the jury, with proper instructions as to the law. In such cases it is a mixed question of law and fact." Citing 4 Wait, Actions & Defenses, p. 344, and cases there cited.

Yet this apparent sanction of such practice may be due, in some measure, to the failure of the parties to request instructions as to the legal effect of the particular facts which they believe to have been proved. See Cole v. Curtis, supra.

And see infra, IV. "General rule doubted, disapproved or modified."

e. Effect of general rule upon pleading.

It is a general rule that facts, and not legal conclusions, should be alleged in pleadings. 31 Cyc. 49.

Therefore, under the general rule that what facts, and whether particular facts amount to probable cause is question of law, it is generally held that the facts relied on as constituting such cause, or the want of it, must be alleged in the pleadings, as a simple averment that the prosecution was with or without probable cause would be nothing more than the averment of a conclusion of law. Giusti v. Del Papa, 19 R. I. 338, 33 Atl. 525; Closson v. Staples, 42 Vt. 209, 1 Am. Rep. 316; King v. Estabrooks, 77 Vt. 371, 60 Atl. 84; Brown v. Cape Girardeau, 90 Mo. 383, 59 Am. Rep. 28, 2 S. W. 302; Brown v. Connelly, 5 Blackf. 390; Horton v. Smelser, 5 Blackf. 428.

The facts, and not the conclusion of the pleader upon the facts, should be averred, L.R.A.1915D.

so that the court may judge from them on demurrer, whether the suspicion was reasonable, i. e., whether they amount to probable cause. Brown v. Cape Girardeau, 90 Mo. 383, 59 Am. Rep. 28, 2 S. W. 302.

So, a court in a declaration charging that the prosecution complained of was without reasonable or probable cause was held bad in King v. Estabrooks, 77 Vt. 371, 60 Atl. 84, where the court said: "But the count is bad in substance, for what is want of probable cause is a question of law, and therefore, it is not enough to allege, as here, merely want of 'reasonable or probable cause of action,' for that is only matter of law; but the facts should have been set out, that the court may see whether there is want of probable cause, and there is no allegation that amounts to setting out such facts. Driggs v. Burton, 44 Vt. 146. In Closson v. Staples, 42 Vt. at page 225, 1 Am. Rep. 316, it is said to be clear that an averment of want of probable cause is not sufficient without alleging facts showing such want. It is like pleading fraud, where it is not sufficient merely to allege that a thing is fraudulent, however strongly you may characterize it as such, for that is but the pleader's opinion, which the law will not regard, but requires that what is relied upon to constitute the fraud shall be set out, that the court may judge of the matter."

And a plea stating in general terms that the defendant had probable cause, but not stating the facts relied on for that showing, is insufficient on demurrer. Brown v. Connelly, 5 Blackf. 390; Horton v. Smelser, 5 Blackf. 428.

An averment in general terms of want of probable cause is a mere statement of a conclusion of law, and will not overcome the presumption arising from an allegation of facts which show that there was probable cause. Giusti v. Del Papa, 19 R. I. 338, 33 Atl. 525.

But Stuby-Estabrook Mercantile Co. v. Kyes, 9 Colo. App. 190, 48 Pac. 663, holds that a complaint alleging that the defendant had no probable cause is sufficient in that respect, as probable cause is not only a conclusion of law, but an ultimate fact as well. The court said: "The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. What the facts may be must be found by the jury; but the court must say whether they constitute probable cause or not. Probable cause, or the want of it, is a conclusion of law; but it is also an ultimate fact. It is ultimate, and not evidential, facts that should be pleaded. The former are conclusions from the latter, and in many cases, if not to the same extent in every case, necessarily involve conclusions of law. It is never proper to plead mere legal conclusions; but a distinction is to be taken between them and issuable facts in which they may be embodied."

The foregoing cases, however, are not intended to represent an exhaustive search for such authorities.

f. View of probable case on appeal.

As has been seen, while it is for the jury to determine any controversy as to the facts, it is for the court to declare the ultimate conclusion as to whether the facts, admitted or establish, by proof, are sufficient to show a want of probable cause, and in reviewing a determination upon a given state of facts as to the existence of probable cause, such determination is not to be treated, as a mere conclusion of fact, to be sustained if there is evidence reasonably supporting it, even though the conclusion be contrary to that which the appellate court would have reached from a consideration of the same facts. It is treated rather as a legal conclusion, and, in reviewing it, an appellate court will measure its correctness by its own judgment from the facts shown. Moore v. Northern P. R. Co. 37 Minn. 147, 33 N. W. 334; Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 189, 22 N. W. 300; Lammers v. Mason, 123 Minn. 204, 143 N. W. 359; Eickhoff v. Fidelity & C. Co. 74 Minn. 139, 76 N. W. 1030; Cox v. Lauritsen, 126 Minn. 128, 147 N. W. 1093; Archibald v. McLean, 21 Can. S. C. 588.

And many other cases impliedly sustain the same view, but see Grorud v. Lossel, 48 Mont. 274, 136 Pac. 1069; Heldt v. Webster, 60 Tex. 207; Williams v. Pullman Co. — Minn. —, 151 N. W. 895.

Appellate courts have therefore considered and examined the evidence bearing upon it as freely as if the question was before them originally. Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 189, 22 N. W. 300.

And while such courts may be loath to disturb the action of the trial court in assuming the responsibility of withholding a case from the jury upon the ground that the uncontroverted evidence did not show want of probable cause, yet, where, after careful consideration of the evidence, and after making due allowance for any advantage possessed by a trial court for observing the bearing of the witnesses upon the stand, and whatever may go to make up the atmosphere of the trial, the court is clearly of the opinion that the action should not have been dismissed, but the trial should have proceeded, a new trial will be granted. Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. supra.

g. When error of submitting probable cause to jury is no ground for reversal.

Where a question of probable cause has been erroneously submitted to the jury, still if, on a review of the case by the appellate court, it appears from the facts not disputed at the trial, that the jury have not erred in point of law, their verdict will not be set aside. Pangburn v. Bull, 1 Wend. 345; Hall v. Suydam, 6 Barb. 83; Staples v. Johnson, 25 App. D. C. 155; and Coleman v. Heurich, 2 Mackey, 189.

Thus, in Pangburn v. Bull, 1 Wend. 345, the court said: "The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show it probable or not probable are true and existed is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them true, they amounted to a probable cause, is a question of law. Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 T. R. 545, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Revised Rep. 269, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 766. The court observe that upon this distinction proceeded the case of Reynolds v. Kennedy, 1 Wils. 232. The court below erred in submitting both the law and the fact to the jury. This was, necessarily, the consequence of the charge; for the court instructed the jury that if from the testimony they should be of opinion that the prosecutions were malicious and without probable cause, and the defendant knew the facts to be so, they ought to find damages for the plaintiff. The jury found damages for the plaintiff. Probably they had no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the defendant's motives were malicious, after proof of the defendant's declaration that he would bring the plaintiff four times to Guelderland for the same cause, and the course he pursued to effect the object in view, but they also passed on the question of want of probable cause; and although the court ought to have instructed the jury whether, on the supposition that certain facts were established, they would show the want of probable cause, still, if on a review of the case by this court, it shall appear that, from the facts not disputed at the trial, there was evidently a want of probable cause, the verdict ought not to be set aside for the error of the court below in this respect, because this court is called on to pronounce on that question; and if they see that the jury have not erred in point of law; although the charge was erroneous, no injury had been done to the defendant below, of which he had a right to complain. In making this remark, however, it must be understood that, if the evidence as to any material facts is contradictory, or leaves the question doubtful whether the fact existed or not, then the error of the court is good ground for a reversal, inasmuch as this court cannot take upon itself to draw inferences from conflicting testimony; this is the exclusive province of the jury."

And in Coleman v. Heurich, 2 Mackey, 189, it is held that the ruling of the trial judge leaving the question of probable cause to the jury was altogether favorable to the plaintiff, since it placed it in the power of the jury to decide that the facts showed an absence of probable cause, while if the court had assumed the decision of the question, it certainly must have decided that the facts plainly showed its existence; and that the ruling, therefore, could have worked no injury to the plaintiff, and constitutes no ground for reversal.

An instruction that if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant prosecuted the plaintiff from a fixed determination of his own based upon some injury which he believed plaintiff had done him, or because plaintiff had failed to pay the debt which was due him, and not for the purpose of seeing that justice was done and society protected, they should consider these facts in determining whether there was probable cause for the institution of the prosecution complained of, and also whether or not it was malicious, is misleading and erroneous. But such error is without prejudice when there is no evidence of probable cause, so that upon the whole evidence and with correct instruction the jury must have found want of probable cause. The question of probable cause, the facts being established, is a question of law for the court, and not for the jury. Clark v. Folkers, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 96, 95 N. W. 328.

While, where the evidence upon the question of probable cause is not in dispute, it is the duty of the court to declare as a matter of law that no probable cause was shown, leaving the other questions involved to the jury by appropriate instructions, yet if, instead of instructing the jury that there was a want of probable cause, and so disposing of that question at once, the court submits it to their uncertain verdict, one who could not have possibly been harmed by such procedure has no ground of complaint. Brooks v. Bradford, 4 Colo. App. 410, 36 Pac. 303.

And in Bank of Miller v. Richmon, 68 Neb. 731, 94 N. W. 998, affirming on rehearing 64 Neb. 111, 89 N. W. 627, the court held that whether or not a given state of facts constitutes probable cause for procuring plaintiff's arrest is ordinarily a question of law; but that where defendants have requested special findings substantially embracing this question; they cannot afterwards complain of an instruction submitting its decision to the jury.

IV. General rule regretted, disapproved, or modified.

That the doctrine of the weight of authority on this important and difficult question is an anomaly has been frequently and frankly admitted by the authorities. It is not so strange or unnatural, therefore, that such a doctrine should have sometimes been regretted, modified, or even disapproved and denied. Many of the cases that have either apparently or in reality such effect have already been considered in the preceding sections of this note, and will not, as a rule, be repeated in this place, save by general reference. But aside from such cases, there are quite a number of other decisions of like effect which may be given here.

Thus, while Lister v. Perryman, L. R. 4 H. L. 521, sustains the rule established by the weight of authority, the language of several of the law lords sitting in that case is nevertheless interesting in this connection. Lord Chelmsford said: "My lords, there can be no doubt since the case of Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545, in which the question was solemnly decided in the exchequer chamber, that what is reasonable and probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution, or for false imprisonment, is to be determined by the judge. In what other sense it is properly called a question of law I am at a loss to understand. No definite rule can be laid down for the exercise of the judge's judgment. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances, and the result is a conclusion drawn by each judge for himself, whether the facts found by the jury, in his opinion, constitute a defense to the action. The verdict in cases of this description, therefore, is only nominally the verdict of a jury. The different views which may be entertained by judges as to whether a certain state of facts does or does not furnish a reasonable and probable cause for a prosecution is exemplified by the divided opinions of the learned judges in the court of exchequer in this case."

Lord Colonsay, said: "Finding that I had to deal with this as a matter of inference in law, I was desirous to ascertain what were the rules or principles of law by which the court ought to be guided in drawing that inference. I did not find that there were any. Neither in the very able argument we heard from the bar, nor in the judgment set out in these papers, nor in the cases that have been referred to, are any such rules or principles enunciated. I think it is laid down by the learned Lord Chief Baron that it is a mere question of opinion, depending entirely on the view which the judge may happen to take of the circumstances of each particular case. And upon a careful consideration of the decisions, it seems to me impossible to deduce any fixed and definite principle to guide and assist the judge in any case that may come before him. Chief Justice Tindal's rule seems almost the only one that can be resorted to; namely, that there must have existed a state of circumstances upon which a reasonable and discreet person would have acted. Now in the system to which I have already alluded it is thought that twelve reasonable and discreet men (as jurors are supposed to be) can judge of that matter for themselves, and that lawyers are not the only class of persons competent to determine whether the information was such as a reasonable and discreet man would have acted upon. For what is it that a judge would have to determine? He would have to determine whether the circumstances warranted a reasonable and discreet man to deal with the matter; that is to say, not what impression the circumstances would have made upon his own mind, he being a lawyer, but what impression they ought to have made on the mind of another person, probably not a lawyer. If I look to the circumstances of this case, as they are here disclosed, and put the question to myself, I come, I own, to the conclusion that in this case there was not a want of reasonable and probable cause, and consequently that the direction given was not, according to my view, a sound one."

Lord Westbury said: "My lords, I have very few words to add. The existence of 'reasonable and probable cause' is an inference of fact. It must be derived from all the circumstances of the case. I regret, therefore, to find the law to be that it is an inference to be drawn by the judge, and not by the jury. I think it ought to be the other way." And in the same case Lord Colonsay, said: "My lords, I have listened to this case with much interest, finding myself placed in what is to me the somewhat novel position of having to deal with the question of want of reasonable and probable cause as a question of law for the court, and not a question of fact for the jury. I have frequently had to deal with the cases of this kind in the other end of the island; but there this question of want of reasonable and probable cause is treated as an inference in fact to be deduced by the jury from the whole circumstances of the case, in like manner as the question of malice is left to the jury. If I had tried the case there I should have left this matter to the jury; and if the jury had found a verdict for the defendant, I should have approved of that verdict for reasons. I am about to explain. If, on the other hand, the jury had found for the plaintiff, still, being a matter so much within the province of the jury, and as it could not be said that they had gone decidedly wrong and contrary to evidence, I should have held that it was not a case for the court to interfere. But in England it is settled law that this is a matter for the court to deal with. The court deals with it as an inference to be drawn by the court from the facts, but whether an inference of law or an inference of fact does not, I think, appear from the reports. I do not see clearly whether it is called an inference of law merely because it is left to the court, or whether it is left to the court because it is really an inference of law. But, undoubtedly, it appears to be settled law in this country that want of reasonable and probable cause is matter for the court."

And in Sandell v. Sherman, 107 Cal. 391, 40 Pac. 493, citing the above authority, the court states that it has sometimes been regretted by the courts that probable cause is not by the law of England, as by that of Scotland, a question for the jury; but that considerations of public policy have hitherto, both in England and in this country, dictated the rule as enunciated by the weight of authority.

Language to the same effect is used in Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 189, 22 N. W. 300, where it is stated that, "while the question, what facts make out probable cause, is for the court, it is ordinarily, if not always, really a question of fact to be determined upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case."

In Caldwell v. Bennett, 22 S. C. 1, the court reviewing the authorities in that jurisdiction, said: "The next inquiry is that presented by the first and second grounds of appeal, for, as we understand these grounds, they practically raise the same question. We lay no stress upon the fact that the phraseology imputed to the circuit judge in the first ground differs from that actually used by him, as appears by that portion of his charge as reported by him, which we have copied above; for we think they may be construed as amounting substantially to the same thing. Construing these two grounds in the light of the argument submitted by the appellant, we understand that his complaint is that the circuit judge should have confined the jury to a single inquiry, whether the testimony adduced by the plaintiff was true, and should himself have determined whether the facts which they found to be established were sufficient in law to constitute probable cause, or the want of it. In other words, that he should have instructed the jury that if they believed the testimony adduced by the plaintiff, then such testimony did or did not constitute sufficient proof of a want of probable cause as matter of law, and that it was error on his part, after instructing them as matter of law what was probable cause, to leave it to the jury to say from the testimony whether such probable cause existed. Strictly speaking, the proper way to have raised the question would have been by a request to charge, which the appellant omitted to make; but waiving this, we will proceed to consider the question. It must be admitted that the exact boundary line between the province of the judge and that of the jury, in determining the existence or want of probable cause in actions for malicious prosecution, does not seem to be well defined by the authorities in this state. There is no doubt that, upon well-settled principles, it is the exclusive province of the jury to pass upon the truth of the facts and circumstances relied upon as establishing the presence or absence of probable cause; and it seems to be well settled that a fact occurring after the matter or transaction which gives rise to a prosecution, or a civil action, such as the finding of 'no bill' by the grand jury, the entry of a nolle prosequi by a prosecuting officer, the failure to prosecute, or the discontinuance of a civil action, will, as matter of law, be held insufficient to constitute even prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause. Lipford v. McCollum, 1 Hill, L. 82; Fulmer v. Harmon, 3 Strobb. L. 576; Ford v. Kelsey, 4 Rich. L. 365; Frederick v. Halberstadt, 14 Rich. L. 41. But when testimony is adduced as to alleged facts and circumstances attending the supposed commission of the offense charged, or relied upon as evidence to show that there was, or was not, any ground for the charge, there does not seem to be any clear and well-defined rule. It is true that there are several cases in this state which contain expressions going to support the position contended for by the appellant, but we do not think that the point is distinctly decided in any one of them. See Thomas v. Rouse, 2 Brev. 75; Nash v. Orr, 3 Brev. 94, 5 Am. Dec. 547; Paris v. Waddell, McMull. L. 358; Horn v. Boon, 3 Strobb. L. 307. On the other hand, we find other cases in which the course pursued by the circuit judge in this case received the sanction of the tribunal of last resort. Paris v. Waddell, McMull. L. 358; Sims v. McLendon, 3 Strobb. L. 557;

Frederick v. Halberstadt, 14 Rich. L. 41. The case of Hogg v. Pinckney, 16 S. C. 387, is relied upon by appellant; but we think that case, when properly understood, tends rather to support a contrary view. In that case the action was for a malicious arrest in a civil suit, charging fraud in the contracting of the debt for which the action was brought. The fraud alleged was that the goods were sold by the defendants to the plaintiff upon his promise to give a lien on his crop, which the plaintiff had failed and refused to give. The circuit judge instructed the jury that the plaintiff must show a want of probable cause for the charge of fraud: 'That the material points for them to consider was [sic] whether the plaintiff, at the time he agreed to give the lien to defendants, had no intention of giving the same, and that if they found he had no such intention, it would go far to show probable cause for the arrest; but, on the other hand, if they found that at the time he did intend to give it, it would go far to show a want of probable cause.' Then, after instructing them as to damages, he said, in speaking of the evidence adduced to assail or substantiate the statements contained in the complaint and affidavit upon which the order of arrest was obtained: 'If the evidence disproves these statements, then of course the probable cause is overthrown. If, on the contrary, the evidence supports these statements, or pointedly increases their strength, the probable cause is sustained. That if the jury, as reasonable men, under the circumstances proved, would have acted as the defendants did, then the jury might conclude the defendants had probable cause for their action; but, in view of the testimony, if the jury would not have acted as the defendants, then the jury might conclude the defendants did not have probable cause.' The plaintiff having obtained judgment, the defendants appealed upon the ground, inter alia, that the circuit judge had left the question of probable cause to the jury as a question of fact. This court, however, did not so understand the charge, but, on the contrary, construed it as amounting in effect to an instruction to the jury that if they believed the facts stated in the complaint and affidavit, then there was probable cause; but if, on the other hand, they did not believe the statements therein contained, then there was a want of probable cause. This part of the opinion, standing alone, might possibly give rise to the inference that it would have been error on the part of the circuit judge, after explaining what would, in law, constitute probable cause, to leave it to the jury to say whether, upon a consideration of all the facts and circumstances present to the mind of the defendants at the time they acted, the want of probable cause was, or was not, shown. But when considered in connection with what was said as to the fifth exception, it is manifest that such an inference would be altogether unwarranted. In reference to that exception the following language was used: 'The judge seems to have charged the jury that, if they, as reasonable men, under the circumstances proved, would have acted as the defendants did, then they might conclude the defendants had probable cause for their action; but in view of the testimony, if the jury would not have acted as the defendants, then the jury might conclude the defendants did not have probable cause. If the judge had confined the jury to the facts and circumstances which surrounded the defendants at the time they acted, then his charge would not have been objectionable. But he went further than this, and permitted them to consider all the facts developed on the trial, whether they were present before the defendants at the time of the arrest or not. This, we think, was error.' From this language it is quite clear that, if the jury had been instructed, as they were in this case now under consideration, that in considering whether the testimony showed the presence or absence of probable cause, as defined to them, they must confine their attention to such facts and circumstances as were present to the minds of the defendants at the time they obtained the order for arrest, the court would have held that the charge was unobjectionable. Under this state of the authorities here, we think that the question which we have been considering is still an open one in this state. If the rule contended for by the appellant should be adopted, it seems to us that it would lead to great complexity and confusion, and that it would, in many cases, be very difficult to apply it practically. Many prosecutions rest mainly, if not entirely, upon circumstantial evidence, and in such cases it would be very difficult, if not impossible, so to present alternative views of the testimony to the mind of the average juror as to enable him to reach an intelligent conclusion as to whether there was or was not a want of probable cause for the prosecution. The failure to establish to the satisfaction of the jury a single circumstance in the chain, although apparently quite insignificant in itself, or the proof of some other, apparently unimportant, fact, might very materially affect the conclusion which should be reached. So that if this is the rule, then the only safe course would be to require a special verdict in every case, and let the judge say whether the facts as found by the jury did or did not constitute probable cause. Indeed, the difficulty in applying such a rule seems to have been fully recognized, for in some of the strongest cases cited by the appellant it is conceded that the rule does not apply where the testimony is complicated or contradictory, and that it applies only where the testimony is undisputed. This concession demonstrates the impolicy of the rule, as it would be necessary to determine in each case what degree of complexity or contradiction would take the case out of the rule, or when the facts were so undisputed as to require its application. But there is another and more formidable objection to this rule, in that it invests the judge with power to determine a question of fact. For assuming the definition of probable cause, as given by the circuit judge in this case, to be the correct one, inasmuch as no exception is taken to it, after the jury have found what were the facts and circumstances present to the mind of prosecutor at the time he instituted the prosecution, another question of fact would still remain, i. e., whether such facts and circumstances would be sufficient to induce a reasonable man to believe that the offense charged had been committed, and this question of fact should be decided by the jury, and not by the judge; for the question is not whether such facts and circumstances would induce a well-educated lawyer, such as every judge is supposed to be, to believe that an offense had been committed (as is well illustrated by the remark of Judge O'Neill in the case of Lipford v. M'Collum, supra), but whether such facts and circumstances would be sufficient to induce an ordinarily reasonable and impartial man, a class which the jury is supposed to represent, to believe that the offense had been committed. Unless, therefore, we are compelled by authority, as we do not think we are, to adopt the rule contended for by the appellant, we are not inclined, for the reasons indicated, to do so. On the contrary, we think the true rule is that after the jury have been instructed as to what constitutes probable cause, as matter of law, it is for them to say, from a review of all the facts and circumstances proved to have been present to the mind of the prosecutor at the time he commenced the prosecution, or to the plaintiff at the time he commenced his civil action, whether there was or was not probable cause for such proceeding. This rule is, as we have seen, not without the support of authority, is easy of application, and is in analogy with the rule in cases of negligence, which, like probable cause, presents a mixed question of law and fact."

Section 2983 of the Georgia Code provides that "want of probable cause shall be a question for the jury, under the direction of the court, and shall exist when the circumstances are such as to satisfy a reasonable man that the accuser had no ground for proceeding but his desire to injure the accused." Coleman v. Allen, 79 Ga. 637, 11 Am. St. Rep. 449, 5 S. E. 204. In this case the court said: "It is contended that this is exhaustive of all possible cases of the absence of probable cause, that unless a reasonable man would not be satisfied by the circumstances that the accuser had no ground for proceeding but his desire to injure the accused, there would be the presence of probable cause. We think this construction a mistaken one. The section declares that the question shall be one for the jury, under the direction of the court; but it does not leave the whole range of the question to the jury. It undertakes to settle an instance in which the court and jury shall recognize the absence of probable cause. That instance is, when the circumstances are such that the prosecution must be attributed solely to a desire to injure the accused. Of course, want of probable cause exists where there is no ground but the desire to injure. That is the extreme case of legal malice. But it does not follow that if a man has no ground but the desire to benefit his grandmother, probable cause might not be absent in that instance. The absence of probable cause is to be found in every case where there is no inducement for the prosecution except the desire to injure the accused. But it does not follow that this is exhaustive of all the instances of the want of probable cause; for the desire that actuates the accuser may be one of selfish or benevolent affection, may be one of self-love or love for another, and wholly free from any independent wish to injure the accused, yet there may be absence of probable cause, and presence of legal malice. The phraseology of the Code was doubtless taken from an observation of Chief Justice Tindal in Willans v. Taylor, 6 Bing. 186, in which it was said: 'What shall amount to such a combination of malice and want of probable cause is so much a matter of fact in each individual case, as to render it impossible to lay down any general rule on the subject; but there ought to be enough to satisfy a reasonable man that the accuser had no ground for proceeding but his desire to injure the accused.' Some of the language I have quoted from the motion for a new trial may not be literally accurate, but construed in the light of the whole charge, there is no substantial error in it. It deals rather with what is probable cause than what is not; and of course the affirmative of the matter is open to consideration if the negative is. If it is proper for the jury to inquire what is not probable cause, in conducting that inquiry, it must be proper for them to consider what is probable cause."

In Anderson v. Keller, 67 Ga. 58, the court said: "The last question made by the record is as to the error of the judge in awarding a nonsuit. The testimony shows that the plaintiff was charged upon the affidavit of the defendant with cheating and swindling, that he was arrested under a criminal warrant, held for preliminary trial, was tried and discharged, the evidence showing that he was not the man who got the goods; the defendant testifying that the affidavit which he had made for the plaintiff's arrest was true, and making other statements as to the false representations of the plaintiff to him touching this transaction. It is true that it also appeared that the defendant had been advised by an attorney at law that the warrant would lie, but even if the whole proceeding had been without malice and with probable cause, in the opinion of the judge, yet he should have sent it to the jury for them to pass upon it, and by their verdict to say whether that was true or not."

In Stewart v. Mulligan, 11 Ga. App. 660, 75 S. E. 991, the trial judge having correctly left to the jury the determination of the question of the existence of probable cause for the suing out of a process, it was held not error to refuse to charge that if the defendant had certain information, which he contended had been given to him prior to the suing out of process, the jury should find that probable cause existed. Such an instruction would have been an expression of opinion upon the evidence, and in effect the direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the evidence was not of such a character as to justify such a direction.

In Stewart v. Mulligan, supra, the following instruction was held not erroneous for any reason assigned: "Probable cause is defined to be the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite the belief in a reasonable mind, acting on the facts within the knowledge of the prosecutor, that the person charged was guilty of the crime for which she was prosecuted." The report of this case does not disclose, however, what the objections were to this instruction.

In Stewart v. Mulligan, supra, it is held that the fact that the process complained of was sued out on advice of counsel was only one of the circumstances to be considered by the jury in passing upon the question of malice and want of probable cause.

It is held in Smith v. Clark, 37 Utah, 116, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 953, 106 Pac. 653, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1366, that whether defendant in making a complaint charging another with crime had, under all the circumstances of the case, probable cause for believing that accused had committed the offense, so as to justify his act, is a question for the jury. The court said: "Whether the appellant, under all the circumstances, had probable cause for believing that the plaintiff had committed the offense of grand larceny, was, upon the evidence adduced, a question for the jury. From the nature of the acts themselves upon which the charge was actuated, and upon all the surrounding circumstances shown in evidence under which they were committed, of all of which the appellant was cognizant and had personal knowledge when he made the complaint, a jury may say that he had not probable cause for believing that the plaintiff was guilty of larceny, or of any other criminal offense."

And in Johnston v. Meaghr, 14 Utah, 426, 47 Pac. 861, where plaintiffs complained of a prosecution against plaintiff Johnston by defendants, charging her with threatening to assault defendant Meaghr and others with deadly weapons, the court said: "If there was a substantial conflict in the evidence before the jury as to whether the defendants, or either of them, caused the prosecution mentioned in the complaint to be commenced, and as to whether the plaintiff Annie Johnston made the threats mentioned in the complaint upon which the warrant against her issued, and as to whether such defendants, or either of them, had a reasonable fear that the crime threatened would be committed, then the instruction excepted to was erroneous. Or, if reasonable men might differ as to the existence of those facts, the instruction was erroneous. Before finding against the defendants, or any of them, the jury were required to believe, from a preponderance of the evidence, that they caused the prosecution, and did not L.R.A.1915D.

have reasonable cause to believe that plaintiffs made the threats, or that they did not have a reasonable fear that the crime threatened would be committed. And if the evidence left room for a difference of opinion among reasonable men as to the existence of those facts, the court was bound to submit the evidence to the jury. Section 4790, 2 Comp. Laws (Utah) 1888, authorizes an information to be laid before a magistrate, that a person has threatened to commit an offense against the person or property of another. And § 4798, id., authorizes the magistrate to issue a warrant for the arrest of such person if it appears from the depositions that there is just reason to fear the commission of the crime threatened. Probable cause for a criminal prosecution is equivalent to reasonable cause, and consists of facts in the mind of the prosecutor sufficient to lead a person of ordinary caution to believe that the party to be prosecuted is guilty, or, as applied to this case, that the offense was threatened by Annie Johnston, as stated, and that there was just reason to fear that the crime threatened would be committed. Inasmuch as the court, in giving the charge excepted to, must have assumed that the evidence proved the threats charged probable cause, and the absence of malice, and that there was no substantial conflict in the evidence as to the existence of these facts, we are bound to consider the evidence, in order to determine whether the court announced in its charge the rule of law applicable to the evidence before the jury. While the 9th section of article 8 of the state Constitution declares that 'in cases at law the appeal shall be on questions of law alone,' this court will review the ruling of the court in the case, and will examine the evidence with respect to which it was made and to which it was applied. Without understanding such evidence, this court cannot decide whether the ruling was right or wrong."

In Lewton v. Hower, 35 Fla. 58, 16 So. 616, the court in sustaining an instruction that "both the questions of probable cause and malice, as well as the questions of the prosecution by the defendant and its termination in acquittal or discharge of the plaintiff, are questions for the jury to determine and find from the evidence," said: "The objection urged against this instruction is that the question of probable cause is one of law, or sometimes a mixed one of law and fact, but never a question of fact alone. It is contended that the circuit court, by this instruction, declares that probable cause was a question of fact for the jury to determine, or has constituted the jury the judges of the law as well as the triers of the facts in the case. If this charge had stood alone, and was considered upon its individual merits without reference to other portions of the charge of the court, it would undoubtedly be obnoxious to the objection made, and erroneous. It would be a practical direction to the jury to find the facts in the case, make their own definition of probable cause, and thus determine the facts and legal effect.

We have been unable to find any authority which holds that the question of probable cause in an action of this kind is one of fact, and to be determined by a jury. Some authorities maintain that the question of probable cause is wholly one of law, and for the court to determine. These cases all say that the question whether the facts as found by the jury constitute probable cause should be determined by the court, and not by the jury. Eastin v. Bank of Stockton, 66 Cal. 123, 56 Am. Rep. 77, 4 Pac. 1106; Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937; Landa v. Obert, 45 Tex. 539; Bulkeley v. Smith, 2 Duer, 261; Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545; Thomp. Trials, § 1613. The great and overwhelming weight of authority is that probable cause is a mixed question of law and of fact. Among other cases and text-books so holding are Greenwade v. Mills, 31 Miss. 464; Nash v. Orr, 3 Brev. 94, 5 Am. Dec. 547; Besson v. Southard, 10 N. Y. 236; Pangburn v. Bull, 1 Wend. 345; Schofield v. Ferrers, 47 Pa. 194, 86 Am. Dec. 532; McCormick v. Sisson, 7 Cow. 715; Fagnan v. Knox, 66 N. Y. 525; Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 510, 545, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Revised Rep. 269, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 765; Humphries v. Parker, 52 Me. 502; Sartwell v. Parker, 141 Mass. 405, 5 N. E. 807; Munns v. De Nemours, 3 Wash. C. C. 31, Fed. Cas. No. 9,926; Ramsey v. Arrott, 64 Tex. 320; Heyne v. Blair, 62 N. Y. 19; Lytton v. Baird, 95 Ind. 349; Ash v. Marlow, 20 Ohio, 119; McNulty v. Walker, 64 Miss. 198, 1 So. 55; 2 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 454, and authorities cited; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 49 et seq. and notes; Sharpe v. Johnston, 59 Mo. 557; Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192. It is the general principle, deducible from these authorities, that when the facts are undisputed, as upon demurrer, or are admitted or not disputed at the trial, the question is one of law, and the court declares the legal effect of such facts. When the facts are controverted, then the question becomes a mixed question of law and fact. It should not be submitted to the jury to determine the whole question. The court, confining itself to its proper sphere, should decide the law, and, confining the jury to its proper sphere, should direct them to find only the facts of the case. Ad questionem facti non respondent iudices ad questionem legis non respondent juratores. We do not think the charge subject to the objection made, for the reason that the court had also charged the jury as follows: 'Probable cause for a criminal prosecution is understood to be such conduct on the part of the accused as may induce the jury to infer that the prosecution was undertaken for public motives.' The court had given a definition of probable cause; had told the jury what constituted probable cause in the eyes of the law. The charge complained of therefore only directed the jury to find from the facts in the case whether there was such probable cause, within the meaning of the definition laid down by the court. The definition was L.R.A.1915D.

not the fullest and most complete which might have been given, yet it was one approved by courts of great respectability. Ulmer v. Leland, 1 Me. 135, 10 Am. Dec. 48; cases cited in note to Bell v. Graham, 9 Am. Dec. 691; Bitting v. Ten Eyck, 82 Ind. 421, 42 Am. Rep. 505. While the definition given is not perhaps the best and most accurate known to the law, yet no valid exception was taken to it in the court below; no better definition was proposed in its stead, and in this court no assignment of error is based upon it, and no argument made to demonstrate its incorrectness. If defendant was dissatisfied with the definition given, it was his duty to have proposed a better definition. The court having defined what constituted probable cause, the charge is not open to the objection made, that the court thereby constituted the jury the judges of the law and the facts."

And see Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Groves, 55 Fla. 436, 46 So. 294, holding that where there is no dispute as to the facts, the question of probable cause is one of law.

While Cochran v. Toher, 14 Minn. 385, Gil. 293, was an action for false imprisonment, it seems that since the considerations involved in the determination of the question of probable cause are the same in such actions as in actions for malicious prosecution, the case is of interest in this place. The trial court charged the jury orally: "That the question whether the plaintiff was kept an unreasonable time without taking him before a magistrate, or whether the defendants had reasonable cause for making the arrest, were questions for the jury to determine; the question as to what was reasonable time, or reasonable cause, being in either case a question of fact for the jury, but that if the defendants without any necessity put the plaintiff in irons, they would be liable, and the question as to whether such necessity existed was for the jury." The court said: "It is a familiar rule that all questions of law are to be determined by the court, and questions of fact are within the exclusive province of the jury. Ordinarily there is but little difficulty in ascertaining what questions are for the court and what for the jury; but there are cases in which it is somewhat difficult to determine whether the conclusion is one of fact or of law. This difficulty frequently arises, when the inquiry is as to questions of reasonable time, reasonable cause, due diligence, probable cause, and others of a like character. Abstractly, these are questions of law, just as the terms 'larceny,' 'robbery,' and 'assault and battery' are, for 'it is a question of legal judgment and discretion, to pronounce whether the facts, as found by a jury, do or do not satisfy the legal expression.' But the latter terms, and others of the same class, are absolutely defined and determined in the law by general rules applicable to all cases; so that upon the finding by the jury of the specific facts in each particular case, the law draws the conclusion that they do or do not constitute the particular offense charged. In all such cases, therefore, it is for the court to determine as a question of law, the sufficiency or insufficiency of the facts to constitute the offense; so, in some cases, the law determines what shall or shall not be reasonable time or cause, and the like. As in the case of a bill of exchange, where the law requires notice of dishonor to be given within a reasonable time, if it appears on the facts proved in evidence that the case is one falling within a rule by which the law itself prescribes and defines what shall be considered to be reasonable time, the question is a mere question of law, for the law itself, from the mere res gestæ, makes the inference that the time was reasonable. 1 Starke, Ev. 516. But in other instances questions of this character depend on such an infinite variety of circumstances that, by reason of the impracticability of prescribing any general rule applicable to the facts of each particular case, the inference in law follows the inference in fact, and in such cases, the time will be reasonable or the cause probable in point of law, according as the one or the other is reasonable or probable in point of fact. 'Hence it follows that the test for deciding whether such general inference as to reasonable time, probable cause, etc., be one of law or of fact, is this, if the court in the particular case can draw the conclusion by the application of any legal rules or principles, the conclusion is a legal one. . . . But if, on the other hand, the circumstances be so numerous and complicated as to exclude the application of any general principle, or definite rule of law, the further inference is necessarily one of mere fact, to be made by the jury. In other words, the rules of ordinary practice and convenience become the legal measure and standard of right.' Starkie, Ev. 514, 516, note 1, 517. Applying this rule to the case at bar, we find as to the question whether the defendants had reasonable cause to believe that a felony had been committed, and that the plaintiff had committed it, depends upon whether certain representations were made to them by the person representing himself as a sheriff in Wisconsin; whether they had reason to believe that this person was such officer, and that such representations were true; whether the communication from the sheriff of McHenry county, Illinois, was received by the defendants, conveying information of the escape of prisoners from the jail in that place; whether the description of one of the escaped prisoners contained in the handbill answered to the plaintiff; whether the photograph of the escaped prisoner bore such a resemblance to the plaintiff as would reasonably induce the belief that the latter was such prisoner, and a great variety of other circumstances, to which we need not advert. The inquiry in this case is not as to whether a felony was actually committed in Illinois, and that the plaintiff actually committed it, and escaped from the jail in that state, but whether the defendants had reasonable ground to believe that such were facts. The law does not, and could not, prescribe a L.R.A.1915D.

definite rule as to what particular facts shall constitute this reasonable ground of belief; the only rule which it can or does prescribe is that the facts in each case must be such as would reasonably produce such belief in the minds of ordinary men; but in such case it is for the jury to say not only what specific facts are established, but to determine their effect as a fact within the rule mentioned; and only upon such finding does the law pronounce its conclusion. It is manifest therefore in this case, that no finding of specific facts could be made by the jury, not embracing a conclusion as to the reasonable effect of the same in fact, from which, under any rule of law, the court could pronounce the conclusion as a legal inference, that they did or did not constitute reasonable cause. It was therefore for the jury to find as a conclusion of fact, whether there was probable cause, and the law follows this finding. It was therefore proper for the court to submit this question of fact to the jury, and this was in effect what was done in this instance. Davis v. Russell, 5 Bing. 354, 2 Moore & P. 590, 7 L. J. Mag. Cas. 52, 30 Revised Rep. 637; Beckwith v. Philby, 6 Barn. & C. 635; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 454; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 49, note 1. It would be proper in all such cases for the court to instruct the jury to the effect that they must draw their conclusion, not according to mere caprice or arbitrary opinion, but in the exercise of a sound judgment, and upon comparison of the facts with the ordinary rules of fair and honest conduct, and it does not appear that that was not done in this case."

V. Knowledge, belief, and conduct of defendant.

a. In general.

There are some reported cases which appear at first sight to have somewhat relaxed the application of the rule that it is a question for the jury whether the facts brought forward in the evidence be true or not, but that what is reasonable and probable cause is matter of law, by seeming to leave more than the mere question of the facts to be proved to the jury; but upon further examination it is found that, although there has been an apparent, there has been no real, departure from the rule. Thus, in some cases the reasonableness and probability of the ground for prosecution has depended not merely upon the proof of certain facts, but upon the question whether other facts, which furnished an answer to the prosecution, were known to the defendant at the time it was instituted. Again, in other cases, the question has turned upon the inquiry whether the facts stated to the defendant at the time, and which formed the ground of the prosecution, were believed by him or not. In other cases the inquiry has been whether, from the conduct of the defendant himself, the jury will infer that he was conscious he had no reasonable or probable cause. But in these and many other cases which might be suggested, it is obvious that the knowledge, the belief, and the conduct of the defendant, are really so many additional facts for the consideration of the jury, so that in effect nothing is left to the jury but the truth of the facts proved and the justice of the inferences to be drawn from such facts, both which investigations fall within the legitimate province of the jury whilst at the same time they have received the law from the judge, that, according as they find the facts proved or not proved, and the inferences warranted or not, there was reasonable and probable ground for the prosecution or the reverse. Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545; Hess v. Oregon German Baking Co. 31 Or. 503, 49 Pac. 803.

And in Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937, the court said: "Although the question of probable cause, as we have seen above, is a question of law, yet the belief of the defendant in a state of facts is itself a fact which it is proper to submit to the jury for its consideration; and whenever the good faith of the defendant, or his knowledge or belief in an existing state of facts, is an element in determining whether there was probable cause, the court should submit that question to the jury, as well as the other facts, which in its opinion bear upon that issue."

And Lord Denman, Ch. J., in Turner v. Ambler, 10 Q. B. 252, said: "The prevailing law of reasonable and probable cause is, that the jury are to ascertain certain facts, and the judge is to decide whether those facts amount to such cause. But among the facts to be ascertained is the knowledge of the defendant of the existence of those which tend to show reasonable and probable cause, because without knowing them he could not act upon them; and also the defendant's belief that the facts amounted to the offense which he charged, because otherwise he will have made them the pretext for prosecution, without even entertaining the opinion that he had a right to prosecute. In other words, the reasonable and probable cause must appear not only to be deducible in point of law from the facts, but to have existed in the defendant's mind at the time of his proceeding: and perhaps whether they did so or not is rather an independent question for the jury, to be decided on their view of all the particulars of the defendant's conduct, than for the judge, to whom the legal effect of the facts only is more properly referred."

b. Knowledge of defendant.

Where there is uncertainty in that regard, whether defendant knew certain facts is for the jury to decide. Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545; Hess v. Oregon German Baking Co. 31 Or. 503, 49 Pac. 803; Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174, 28 Pac. 937; McWilliams v. Hoban, 42

Md. 56; Cropley v. Givin, 30 Phila. Leg. Int. 160; Bradley v. Morris, 44 N. C. (Busbee, L.) 395; Weaver v. Page, 6 Cal. 681.

So, the jury, providing the evidence on the subject is conflicting, may be asked whether or not the defendant, at the time when he prosecuted, knew of the existence of those circumstances which tend to show probable cause, or believed that they amounted to the offense which he charged; and if they negative either of these facts, the judge will decide as a point of law, that the defendant had no probable cause for instituting the prosecution. McWilliams v. Hoban, 42 Md. 56.

And whether defendant knew from plaintiff's aspect that he was innocent of the crime charged is a question of fact for the jury. Cropley v. Givin, 30 Phila. Leg. Int. 160.

And in Bradley v. Morris, 44 N. C. (Busbee, L.) 395, the court held that the trial judge was undoubtedly correct in holding that, if the jury found that the defendant knew that he had no cause of action against the plaintiff, as the testimony tended to show, there was no probable cause for the arrest.

And in Weaver v. Page, 6 Cal. 681, the main question in the case was whether the defendants, at the time of commencing and prosecuting a suit against the plaintiff, and holding his property under attachment, knew that the bill of exchange which was the foundation of the action was paid. This, being a question of fact, was properly left to the jury, who found in favor of the plaintiff, upon evidence amply sufficient to sustain the verdict.

c. Belief of defendant.

That the belief of the defendant in the guilt of the plaintiff, or which is the same thing, in the truth of the charge made against that person in the prosecution complained of, is a material element in probable cause, seems to be clearly recognized, either expressly or impliedly, by all the definitions of that defense.

And the rule is well established that where that belief is in issue, what such belief was is a question of fact for the determination of the jury.

And see infra, VI., "Advice of counsel," for cases as to the good faith of defendant in seeking and acting upon such advice. And see also Pomeroy v. Golly, Ga. Dec. pt. 1, p. 26.

In Spear v. Hiles, 67 Wis. 350, 30 N. W. 506, the court said: "That a belief by defendant in the truth of the statements made to him by other persons as to the origin of the fire, and a belief that the plaintiff was guilty of setting the fire, are essential elements of good faith and integrity of purpose on the part of the defendant, cannot be doubted. Considered most favorably for the defendant, there is much evidence and many facts in the case bearing upon the question of the good faith of the defendant, and that question is to be determined mainly by the inferences to be drawn therefrom. It is for the jury to do this."

Where the evidence tended to show that defendant was informed by a person that plaintiff did the malicious mischief to defendant's property for which she was arrested and prosecuted by defendant, but that before defendant had commenced proceedings for such arrest, defendant's informant acknowledged in his presence that he had made a false statement about the mischief, and that instead of the plaintiff having done it, he, the informant himself, did it, and offered to settle the matter, it was held in Foot v. Milbier, 46 How. Pr. 38, that a nonsuit was improper, as it was a question for the jury, whether the defendant, when he made the complaint, actually credited the statement the informant first made, and commenced the prosecution in good faith.

In Seibert v. Price, 5 Watts & S. 438, 40 Am. Dec. 525, it was held that the question of probable cause should be submitted to the jury upon the defendant's belief in the guilt or innocence of the plaintiff, and not upon the fact of the guilt or innocence.

In Schofield v. Ferrers, 47 Pa. 194, 86 Am. Dec. 532, the court said: "That, to maintain an action on the case for a malicious prosecution, both want of probable cause for the prosecution and malice in the defendant must be affirmatively shown, is familiar doctrine. Whether there was probable cause is a mixed question, partly for the court and partly for the jury. The court must determine what it is, but the jury must find the facts which are material to the question. When the facts are controverted, and in some cases where the actual belief of the prosecutor enters into the consideration of the question, a court can do no more than define what constitutes probable cause, and submit to the jury to find whether the constituents of it have been proved, or rather whether it has been shown that those facts were wanting which the law declares to be essential to justify a prosecution. This course appears to have been pursued in the present case. The jury were instructed what the law declares probable cause to be, and instructed rightly; and then they were directed to inquire whether the defendant had such cause for instituting the prosecution of which the plaintiff complained. Certainly, under the evidence as it is certified to us, it was not for the court to say there was probable cause for the prosecution."

And to the same effect, see Delany v. Lindsay, 46 Pa. Super. Ct. 26; Keener v. Jeffries, 54 Pa. Super. Ct. 553; Heide v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 590.

In Alward v. Sharp, 12 N. B. 286, it was objected that the trial judge misdirected the jury in failing to tell them that there was evidence of probable cause. The court said: "The judge declined to decide this question, because he thought from the fact of both parties claiming a right to the possession of the land, and the circumstances under which the poles were taken by the plaintiff, that there were certain inferences which might be drawn from the facts, and which must be determined by the jury; and whether the defendant had or had not probable cause depended on the fact whether the plaintiff stole the poles, or on the defendant's believing and having reasonable ground for believing that he did so. His motive in making the charge was not a question of law, but a fact to be determined by the jury. Taylor v. Willans, 2 Barn. & Ad. 857, 1 L. J. K. B. N. S. 17; Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 194, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545. The judge told the jury what would or would not be probable cause, according to the inference they might draw from the facts, of the defendant's motives and belief in making the charge; and we think this question was properly left to the jury."

Where there was a conflict in the evidence in action for an alleged malicious prosecution for assault, the court held that the questions whether an assault was committed, or, if not committed, whether the defendant had probable cause to think that it had been, whether the defendant made a fair and full disclosure to his advisers (counsel and magistrate), and whether, after receiving the advice, he acted in good faith, believing that the crime had been committed, or that there was probable cause for thinking it had, were all for the jury. Healey v. Aspinwall, 195 Mass. 453, 81 N. E. 236.

So, it is held that whether the plaintiff in the alleged malicious action believed that he had probable cause is a question of fact for the jury, if the evidence is not conclusive in his favor on that point. Kolka v. Jones, 6 N. D. 461, 66 Am. St. Rep. 615, 71 N. W. 558; Hamilton v. Cousineau, 19 Ont. App. Rep. 203.

And in Haddrick v. Heslop, 12 Q. B. 267, 12 Jur. 600, 17 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 313, it was held that the jury was properly asked whether the defendant believed that he had reasonable and probable cause.

In Douglas v. Corbett, 2 Jur. N. S. 1247, the action was for a malicious prosecution for sheep stealing. A sheep claimed by defendant was found in plaintiff's possession, and plaintiff was tried and acquitted. In this action for malicious prosecution the trial judge said that the question of reasonable and probable cause was for him, but he asked the jury to say whether the sheep was so like those which the defendant had lost that he might reasonably suppose that it was his. The jury found that the defendant believed that the sheep was his, and that he had reasonable ground for so believing. The trial judge ruled that under the circumstances there was reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, and directed a verdict to be entered for the defendant. This was affirmed on appeal. Coleridge, J., said: "I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. Cases of this sort are extremely important, and sometimes full of practical difficulty. The case of Panton v. Williams, in error 2 Q. B. 169, 1 Gale & D. 504, 10 L. J. Exch. N. S. 545, is right in theory, and we are bound by it. But no judge has sat long on the bench without feeling a difficulty in applying the rule laid down in that case to the jury. I think that rule has been properly acted upon in this case, and therefore there has been no misdirection. The rule laid down in Panton v. Williams is that, though the question of reasonable and probable cause may depend upon numerous and complicated facts and inferences, it is for the judge to leave to the jury to find the facts, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, and to determine according to their finding whether there was reasonable and probable cause for instituting the prosecution. In this case there were many conflicting facts, but one fact found by the jury was that the defendant did believe the sheep to be his. That fact, however, is not enough; it is not enough that the defendant, blindly and inconsiderately believed,—there must be reasonable ground for his entertaining that belief; and then, under some circumstances, that may decide whether there was reasonable and probable cause for instituting the prosecution. Here the circumstances were L.R.A.1915D.

such that those two things only were wanted to found a reasonable and probable cause. The judge assumed that the plaintiff really believed the sheep to belong to him. Then he asked the jury whether, under all the circumstances, the defendant had reasonable ground for believing that the sheep did belong to him. If he had drawn the attention of the jury to one or two facts only in the cause, he would have done wrong, because he might have drawn their attention away from material facts." Crompton, J., said: "I do not see my way to say that the learned judge was wrong. The fact of the defendant having reasonable ground for believing that the sheep was his is not decisive whether there was reasonable and probable cause. But if he had reasonable ground for believing that the sheep was his property, there would arise sufficient to justify the ruling in question; but it must be reasonable ground to the defendant's own mind. The jury thought that he had reasonable ground for believing that the sheep was his; and that being so, under all the circumstances, I think there was reasonable and probable cause for instituting the prosecution."

In Hicks v. Faulkner, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 167, Mr. Justice Hawkins said: "Now, I should define reasonable and probable cause to be an honest belief in the guilt of the accused, based upon a full conviction, founded upon reasonable grounds, of the existence of a state of circumstances which, assuming them to be true, would reasonably lead any ordinarily prudent and cautious man placed in the position of the accuser, to the conclusion that the person charged was probably guilty of the crime imputed. There must be: First, an honest belief of the accuser in the guilt of the accused; secondly, such belief must be based on an honest conviction of the existence of the circumstances which led the accuser to that conclusion; thirdly, such secondly mentioned belief must be based upon reasonable grounds; by this I mean such grounds as would lead any fairly cautious man in the defendant's situation so to believe; fourthly, the circumstances so believed and relied on by the accuser must be such as to amount to reasonable ground for belief in the guilt of the accused. The belief of the accuser in the guilt of the accused; his belief in the existence of the facts on which he acted, and the reasonableness of such last mentioned belief, are questions of fact for the jury, whose findings upon them become so many facts from which the judge is to draw the inference, and determine whether they do or do not amount to reasonable and probable cause. This also is an inference of fact, not of law, as is sometimes erroneously supposed; and the judge is to draw it from all the circumstances of the case. Lister v. Perryman, L. R. 4 H. L. 535, 39 L. J. Exch. N. S. 177, 23 L. T. N. S. 269, 19 Week. Rep. 9, per Lords Chelmsford and Westbury."

This language is quoted and approved in Young v. Nichol, 9 Ont. Rep. 347. And to the same effect see Erickson v. Brand, 14 Ont. App. Rep. 614.

But Middleton, J., in Longdon v. Bilsky, 22 Ont. L. Rep. 4, quoting this language, says that it "cannot, in view of the opinions given in the later cases, be regarded as now correctly stating the law. It assigns too much to the jury, and leaves too little to the judge."

In Fowlkes v. Lewis, 10 Ala. App. 543, 65 So. 724, the court said: "It being undisputed that the defendant instituted the alleged prosecution, and that it had been terminated by the acquittal of the plaintiff before this suit was brought, the defendant could not have been entitled to the general affirmative charge in his favor, unless the uncontroverted evidence showed that when he instituted the prosecution he had an honest belief, supported by reasonable grounds, of the plaintiff's guilt of the offense with which he was charged. Steed v. Knowles, 79 Ala. 446; Long v. Rodgers, 19 Ala. 321; 26 Cyc. 29. Whatever belief he had of the plaintiff's guilt of having committed a trespass after warning was founded, not on his own knowledge of what the plaintiff had done or omitted to do, but upon information imparted to him by his agent Smith. Whether one really believed a thing of which he did not have personal knowledge, and whether such belief was supported by reasonable grounds, depend upon the credibility of the information upon which the belief is claimed to have been based. When the information is the statement of another, the personality of the informant is a factor in the inquiry as to whether or not the information was, or reasonably could have been, relied on as worthy of credit. Smith was before the jury as a witness. It was for them to pass upon his credibility, and to determine whether or not the defendant believed his report of the plaintiff's conduct, and whether or not such report constituted a reasonable ground for the defendant's belief in the guilt of the plaintiff. As was said in the opinion in the case of Jordan v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 81 Ala. 220, 8 So. 191: 'No certain rule can be laid down for believing or not believing information received.' Plainly it is to be inferred from what was said in that opinion that the questions of a party's belief in information imparted by third persons, and of the reasonableness or lack of reasonableness of the grounds for such a belief, are for the jury, and that on such a state of facts as that disclosed in the case at bar, the court is not warranted in assuming either that the information was or that it was not credible, or that it was or was not actually believed by the party who acted on it. It follows that the court was not in error in refusing to give a charge which involved such an assumption."

In Siefke v. Siefke, 6 App. Div. 472, 39 N. Y. Supp. 601, the court said, per Williams, J.: "The two elements of probable cause, so far as we are interested in the question here, were an honest belief of guilt, and reasonable grounds for such belief. These two elements must have concurred in order to have afforded justification. Farnam v. Feeley, 56 N. Y. 451. The burden was not, however, upon the defendant to establish such justification. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show there was no justification, and therefore a want of probable cause. This distinction must be kept in mind. It disposes of one contention made by the appellant, that the defendant's belief was a question for the jury, and defendant's testimony that such belief existed did not avoid the necessity of submitting the question to the jury. If the defendant had had the burden of proof, then his testimony that such belief existed would not have been sufficient to take the case from the jury, because, being a party, his credibility was for the jury. They had a right to disbelieve his evidence, and to find that the belief did not exist. But the discrediting of his evidence as to this question could have no other or greater effect than to blot his evidence from the case, and in the absence of such evidence the question would still remain whether the plaintiff had established that he (defendant) did not honestly believe in the plaintiff's guilt. We come back then to the question whether, upon all the evidence in the case on both sides, the jury would have been justified in drawing the inference and finding the fact either that the defendant did not believe the plaintiff guilty, or, if he did so believe, still that he had no reasonable grounds for such belief; and in considering this question, the evidence of the defendant as to what his honest belief was should be disregarded, because the jury had a right to disbelieve him, and to pass upon the question, regardless of what he testified to upon the subject. The evidence relied upon by the plaintiff to establish the absence of belief by defendant of plaintiff's guilt, or if he did so believe, then the absence of reasonable grounds therefore, was mainly circumstantial. These parties were cousins, and were not on friendly terms. This prosecution for perjury was commenced April 13, 1893, it being alleged that the perjury was committed September 25, 1890 or 1891, in a proceeding between the Metropolitan Elevated Railroad Company and the defendant, and that the perjury consisted in the plaintiff's testifying that one Parke had said of defendant that he was a dirty, lying, perjuring son of ———, etc. Between the time it was alleged the perjury was committed, and the time the complaint was made, there had been several litigations between the parties, and the ill-feeling between them had materially increased. The only direct information the defendant had received that the evidence given by the plaintiff was false was the statement of Parke that he never made, with reference to the defendant, the statement sworn to by the plaintiff. There was evidence as to one lawyer having advised defendant not to commence the prosecution, and another having advised him in favor of the prosecution, and evidence was given as to the statements to, and knowledge of, the two lawyers upon which such advice was given. There was evidence tending to show express malice in commencing the prosecution; indeed, express malice was practically conceded. The evidence as to all these things, and as to other matters not here referred to in detail, was more or less conflicting. It cannot be said in this case, and in this condition of evidence, that the facts were undisputed, and that therefore the question of want of probable cause was one for the court. The real question here is whether from all the evidence, circumstantial and otherwise, the jury would have been justified in drawing the inference and finding affirmatively the fact that the defendant did not honestly believe the plaintiff's guilt, or, if he did, that such belief was not based upon reasonable grounds. There was a very bad condition of feeling between the parties, and there was a long delay after the evidence was given, alleged to have constituted the perjury, before the prosecution therefor was begun. In the meantime other litigations had been had between the parties, in which the defendant had been more or less unsuccessful, and finally this prosecution was commenced. There was some considerable conflict in the evidence given. The defendant himself was a witness, and his somewhat extended examination was before the jury. The jury had an opportunity to observe his demeanor, and to see what sort of a man he was. The question of the credibility of the witnesses, and especially of the defendant himself, was for the jury. The question whether the defendant really and honestly believed the plaintiff guilty, and what facts and circumstances were proved, and whether these, established to the satisfaction of the jury, were such as to induce in a reasonable mind the belief of guilt, were questions for the jury, and in view of these suggestions the question of want of probable cause could only be taken from the jury and decided by the court, if, upon the condition of things developed in the evidence, and which could have been found by the jury most favorably to the plaintiff, the jury would not have been justified in finding the defendant really believed plaintiff guilty, or if he did so believe that there were no reasonable grounds for such belief. We do not think in view of the province of the jury, and the right of a party to their verdict rather than the decision of the court as to the facts, that this question was one that could be taken from the jury and decided by the court. Whatever may be said as to the circumstances being fairly sufficient to induce a reasonable man to believe in guilt, the question still remained, whether the defendant really and honestly believed plaintiff guilty, or whether this action was the result of his malice, ill-feeling, and desire to injure the plaintiff. This was to be determined by the jury upon a consideration of all the evidence, including defendant's knowledge of and relationship to the plaintiff, and we cannot say the jury may not have been satisfied that there was the absence of an honest belief in guilt, and if so, that the evidence would not have sustained such verdict. Our conclusion is that the complaint was improperly dismissed, and that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs of the appeal to appellant to abide the event."

In Bruff v. Kendrick, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 468, the court said: "When the facts established by the evidence do not in themselves constitute the offense, as the mere failure by a servant to pay over the money at a particular time where the charge is embezzlement, or the offense is a continuing one and may not be established by proof of one injurious act, as in an indictment for nuisance, the honest belief of the prosecutor, based upon reasonable grounds, may become involved in the consideration of the existence of probable cause, and the existence of that belief is a fact for the jury. Ritter v. Ewing, 174 Pa. 341, 34 Atl. 584; Fry v. Wolf, 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 468. Whether certain facts constitute probable cause must be determined by the court, but whether such alleged facts exist is for the jury to find. Where the facts are in controversy the subject must be submitted to the jury, in which event it is the duty of the court to instruct them what facts will constitute probable cause, and submit to them only the question of such facts. If the admitted facts amount to probable cause, the court should direct a verdict for the defendant. McCarthy v. DeArmit, 99 Pa. 64; Brobst v. Ruff, 100 Pa. 91, 45 Am. Rep. 358; Walbridge v. Pruden, 102 Pa. 1; Beihof v. Loeffert, 159 Pa. 374, 28 Atl. 216. When a prosecutor establishes that the accused was his servant, that by virtue of the employment he had received money belonging to his employer, and had converted the same to his own use, such evidence not only establishes probable cause for the prosecution, but would in the criminal proceeding make out a prima facie case against the accused, and in the absence of explanation would be sufficient to sustain a conviction. The instruction of the court below that, even if these facts were established by evidence, they did not constitute probable cause, was erroneous."

In Anderson v. Columbia Finance & T. Co. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1790, 50 S. W. 40, the action was for the malicious suing out of an attachment. It was insisted for the appellee that the question whether probable cause is proved is wholly a question of law for the court, and the case of Meyer v. Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. 98 Ky. 365, 33 S. W. 98, was referred to as sustaining this conclusion. The court said: "There is a class of cases to which this rule applies, where from the proof the court can say, as a matter of law, that probable cause is shown. But this case does not belong to that class. On the evidence here the question should have been submitted to the jury whether the defense of probable cause was made out. The court should have instructed the jury that there was probable cause if appellee's agent, swearing out the attachment, believed, and had such grounds as would induce a man of ordinary prudence to believe, either (1) that appellant had no property in the state subject to execution, or not enough thereof to satisfy appellee's demand, and that its collection would be endangered by delay in obtaining judgment and return of 'no property found;' or (2) that appellant had left the county of his residence to avoid the service of a summons; or (3) that he so concealed himself that service could not be had on him." And see to somewhat the same effect, Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 114 Ky. 754, 71 S. W. 921; Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. v. Johnson, 115 Ky. 84, 72 S. W. 754; Keiner v. Collins, 161 Ky. 696, 171 S. W. 399; Heslop v. Chapman, 18 Jur. 348.

A requested instruction was properly refused where the jury might have concluded from it that they would be justified in finding against the plaintiff if there had been anything in his conduct which could have afforded to anyone a reasonable basis for a belief in his guilt, though they found from the evidence that, at the time the prosecution was instituted, the defendant did not believe that he was guilty of the offense for which he was prosecuted. Fowlkes v. Lewis, 10 Ala. App. 543, 65 So. 724.

And in Hinton v. Heather, 14 Mees. & W. 131, 15 L. J. Exch. N. S. 39, it is held that whether the defendant must have been conscious that he was in the wrong at the time of preferring the indictment against plaintiff is a question for the jury under the court's instruction that if they find in the affirmative there was a want of probable cause. Routhier v. McLaurin, 18 Ont. Rep. 112, is to the same effect.

But where there is no dispute in the evidence as to the belief of the defendant, the question what that belief was should not be submitted to the jury. Bernar v. Dunlap, 94 Pa. 329; Robitzek v. Daum, 220 Pa. 61, 69 Atl. 96; Blachford v. Dod, 2 Barn. & Ad. 179, 9 L. J. K. B. 196; Ford v. Canadian Exp. Co. 21 Ont. L. Rep. 585; Archibald v. McLaren, 21 Can. S. C. 588; Still v. Hastings, 13 Ont. L. Rep. 322.

Thus, where the testimony is undisputed, the court is justified in holding that under the established facts defendant acted under an honest belief that the plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged. Robitzek v. Daum, 220 Pa. 61, 69 Atl. 96.

And where the evidence was uncontradicted as to defendant's belief of a statement made to him that plaintiff had possession of his property, for the alleged larceny of which he prosecuted the plaintiff, it was held in Bernar v. Dunlap, 94 Pa. 329, that the trial court was fully justified in entering a nonsuit.

So, if there is no testimony that the accused committed the crime for which he was prosecuted, or that the prosecutor had been informed or knew of any fact inducing a belief that he had, the law itself pronounces that there was no probable cause, and leaves nothing to be submitted to the jury. Taylor v. Godfrey, 36 Me. 525.

d. Conduct of defendant.

In Taylor v. Willans, 2 Barn. & Ad. 845, the finding of the jury as to the motives of the defendant in not appearing to give testimony in support of the complaint he had instituted, was made, by the judge's instructions, the vital fact upon which the question of probable cause was to turn. The court, sustaining this charge, said: "It was left for the jury to determine whether Taylor's nonappearance arose from a consciousness that he had no evidence to give which would support the indictment, or from any other cause. Now, the exception ultimately taken is not that the evidence was not sufficient for the jury to draw any conclusion, but that the judge ought to have drawn it himself. It has been carried further in the argument to-day, for it has been urged that the nonappearance of the prosecutor does not necessarily induce the conclusion of a consciousness at that time that when the prosecution was originally instituted, he could have given no evidence to support it. That may be so. But the conduct of a party in a late period of a cause is a material circumstance, from which his motives at an earlier period may be inferred. Why might not the forbearance of Taylor to appear to give evidence at the trial, under the very peculiar circumstances of this case, raise an inference that his motive was a consciousness that he had no probable cause for instituting the prosecution? The motives of parties can only be ascertained by inference drawn from facts. The want of probable cause is in some degree a negative, and the plaintiff can only be called upon to give some, as Mr. J. le Blanc, a most accurate judge, says, slight evidence of such want. As, then, slight evidence will do, why might not the circumstances of this case be left to the jury as grounds for a conclusion of fact? What conclusion they would draw is another thing. The question of probable cause is, indeed, a mixed question of fact and of law; and the rule, as expressed in Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 T. R. 545, 1 Bro. P. C. 76, 1 Revised Rep. 269, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 766, is correct. The judge is to give his opinion on the law, and to leave the jury to determine the facts, which include the motives of the parties; and where he tells them that if they think the prosecutor had a certain motive for his conduct, then there was probable cause; but if he had not that motive, then there was no probable cause, I think such a summing up does properly separate the law from the fact, and is conformable to the rule."

And likewise whether the nonproduction by the plaintiff of his own testimony, and that of the agent who had denied the giving of the order which plaintiff had been prosecuted for forging, was caused by a consciousness on the part of the plaintiff that they could not testify without showing probable cause, was a question for the jury. Pullen v. Glidden, 68 Me. 559.

Where there is nothing from which a want of belief in guilt can be legitimately inferred, as well as nothing to indicate bad faith on the part of the defendant, the court should not permit the jury to find it (bad faith) by submitting the question to them. And permitting the jury to pass upon the question in such case is reversible error. Harris v. Woodford, 98 Mich. 147, 57 N. W. 96.

If the facts are in dispute, it seems that it is for the jury to say whether the defendant acted in good faith in laying the information. Still v. Hastings, 13 Ont. L. Rep. 322. And see L. Bucki & Son Lumber Co. v. Atlantic Lumber Co. 57 C. C. A. 469, 121 Fed. 233, rehearing denied in 57 C. C. A. 679, 121 Fed. 1019, in the same connection.

Where a criminal prosecution is instituted and continued without any legal authority or justification, the question of good faith and probable cause cannot be disposed of as matters of law by the court, but should be submitted to the jury. Long Island Bottlers' Union v. Seitz, 180 N. Y. 243, 73 N. E. 20, reversing 86 App. Div. 632, 83 N. Y. Supp. 1110.

And see infra, VI., "Advice of counsel," for cases as to the good faith of defendant in seeking and acting upon such advice.

VI. Advice of counsel.

a. In general.

As to advice of counsel as defense to action of malicious prosecution, see notes in 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49, and 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 207.

It very frequently happens, as in SIMMONS v. GARDNER, that the advice of counsel learned in the law, sought and acted on in good faith after a full and fair disclosure of all the material facts, is relied on as constituting probable cause; and while this note is concerned in the main only with the abstract question whether probable cause is a question for the court or jury, and not at all with the question what facts and circumstances amount to probable cause, it has been thought well to consider briefly in this place the province of the court and jury when such is the situation. For substantial reasons, however, no attempt has been made to exhaust the cases on this phase of the subject.

As has been said, one of the most efficient ways of negating a prima facie showing of want of probable cause, and establishing affirmatively probable cause, is to prove that the prosecution was commenced under advice of counsel, particularly of the proper prosecuting officer, after a full statement to him of all the facts known to the defendant. It makes no difference in L.R.A.1915D.

such case whether the facts supposed to exist do so or not; if there is an honest belief in such existence and the supposed facts are fully and fairly stated to counsel to obtain proper guidance in the matter, and upon his advice as to the sufficiency of the same the prosecution is in good faith commenced, that is enough. Such circumstances, when fully established, show, as a matter of law, absence of malice and presence of probable cause, precluding any liability for malicious prosecution. Brinsley v. Schulz, 124 Wis. 426, 102 N. W. 918. And see Genevey v. Edwards, 55 Minn. 88, 56 N. W. 578.

The authorities, however, are not agreed as to the ground upon which the holding that it is a complete defense to a suit for malicious prosecution that the defendant actually submitted to his counsel all the facts, and bona fide acted upon his advice, proceeds. Some hold that advice of counsel tends to establish probable cause, and also to negative malice. Some that it tends to negative malice. Others hold that it tends to establish probable cause. And the court in Adkin v. Pillen, 136 Mich. 682, 100 N. W. 176, in this connection, said: "On whatever ground the defense of advice of counsel rests, it affords the defendant a defense which otherwise he does not have. We think it would not be unfair to say that it often, if not always, affords a new defense when the defense of probable cause and of absence of malice have failed. To illustrate: Cases may arise—indeed, this is one—in which if this advice of counsel were lacking, this court would not hesitate to say as a matter of law that there was no probable cause . . . and we would also say that from this want of probable cause the jury could infer malice." And see Downing v. Stone, 152 N. C. 527, 136 Am. St. Rep. 841, 68 S. E. 9, 21 Ann. Cas. 763, and Martin v. Hutchinson, 21 Ont. Rep. 388.

But the general rule is, it seems, that, when one takes the advice of counsel learned in the law before commencing a prosecution, and places before such counsel all the facts, and acts upon his opinion in good faith, proof of the fact makes out a case of probable cause, provided the disclosure appears to have been full and fair, and not to have withheld any of the material facts. While the advice of counsel honestly obtained and acted upon in good faith tends to rebut the charge of malice in instituting the prosecution, it does so principally for the reason that it overcomes the inference of malice that might follow from the want of probable cause. But such advice, when acted upon in good faith, is held to amount to a complete defense to the action, chiefly on the ground that it has the effect of establishing the existence of probable cause. Noyer v. Bugher, 19 Wyo. 463, 120 Pac. 171. SIMMONS v. GARDNER is in accord with this.

And as the question of probable cause is one for the court to determine when the facts are undisputed, a verdict, it seems, may properly be directed for the defendant, where, upon the undisputed facts, it appears that he made a full and fair statement of the facts to counsel, believing them to be true, and acted in good faith upon the advice of such counsel in instituting the prosecution. Noyer v. Bugher, supra; Baldwin v. Capitol Steam Laundry Co. 109 Minn. 38, 122 N. W. 460; Henderson v. McGruder, 49 Ind. App. 682, 98 N. E. 137; LeClear v. Perkins, 103 Mich. 131, 26 L.R.A. 627, 61 N. W. 357; Smith v. Tolan, 158 Mich. 89, 122 N. W. 513; Davis v. McLaulin, 122 Mich. 393, 81 N. W. 257; Fletcher v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 109 Mich. 363, 67 N. W. 330; Perry v. Sulier, 92 Mich. 72, 52 N. W. 801; Huntington v. Gault, 81 Mich. 144, 45 N. W. 970; Allen v. Codman, 139 Mass. 136, 29 N. E. 537; Anderson v. Friend, 85 Ill. 135; SIMMONS v. GARDNER; King v. Apple River Power Co. 131 Wis. 575, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1063, 111 N. W. 668, 11 Ann. Cas. 951; Krause v. Bishop, 18 S. D. 298, 100 N. W. 434; Topolewski v. Plankinton Packing Co. 143 Wis. 52, 126 N. W. 554.

So the court, in Cooper v. Flemming, 114 Tenn. 52, 68 L.R.A. 849, 84 S. W. 804, was of the opinion that while it is true the advice of counsel may properly be considered by the jury as tending to rebut the existence of malice, the weight of authority is that its fundamental purpose is to establish the existence of probable cause, and that when said advice has been honestly sought, and all the material facts relating to the case, ascertained or ascertainable by the exercise of due diligence, have been presented to counsel, and a prosecution is commenced in pursuance of such advice, then it is the province of the court to charge the jury, as a matter of law, that such advice of counsel entitles the party sued to complete immunity from damages.

In that case the charge of the trial judge was attacked upon the ground that he instructed the jury that whether the opinion of the district attorney general, whose advice was sought, was justified by the law, was a question to be determined by them. The court said: "The court was clearly in error in giving this instruction. The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show it are true and existed is a matter of fact, but whether, supposing them to be true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law. It is the duty of the court, when evidence has been given to prove or disprove the existence of a probable cause, to submit to the jury its credibility and what facts it proves, with instructions that the facts found amount to probable cause, or that they do not." Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 116. This is the established rule in this state. Memphis Gayoso Gas Co. v. Williamson, 9 Heisk. 342. In the latter case it was held, while the facts from which probable cause is to be deduced are to be tried by the jury, the deduction as matter of law must be made by the court. This L.R.A.1915D.

must be done in one of two modes: Either the court must state hypothetically to the jury the facts relied on by both sides, and whether or not they will, if established, satisfy the allegations in the pleadings, or the jury must find the facts specially, and from such special verdict the court must determine whether a reasonable man would have instituted a suit on them."

In Longdon v. Bilsby, 22 Ont. L. Rep. 4, the court, per Middleton, J., held that "the opinion of counsel honestly obtained, after a full disclosure of the facts known to the defendant and honestly acted upon, constitutes reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, and is not merely evidence either of reasonable and probable cause or in answer to the charge of malice; and [that] in a case where a lawyer of experience and standing is called and shows that he advised the proceedings, and that the facts were fully known to him at the time the advice was given, and the defendant shows that he acted in good faith upon the advice so given, the trial judge, in the absence of any contradictory evidence, is only discharging his judicial functions when he finds that there was reasonable and probable cause, and enters judgment for the defendant."

In Levy v. Fleischner, 12 Wash. 15, 40 Pac. 384, it is held that "it is the well-established law that probable cause is a question of the law, in this far, at least, that probable cause will be presumed when the action has been commenced by the advice of attorneys to whom have been submitted all the facts in the case."

An ordinarily prudent man is expected to take the advice of a person learned in the law and a reputable member of the profession before instituting a criminal prosecution, and if he does so, placing all the facts before his counsel, and acts honestly upon his opinion, such facts constitute probable cause as a matter of law; and when it clearly appears that defendant honestly sought the advice of counsel upon a full and fair statement of facts, it is error to leave the matter to the jury. King v. Apple River Power Co. 131 Wis. 575, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1063, 111 N. W. 668, 11 Ann. Cas. 951.

So, it was not error to refuse to instruct the jury that if they believed from the evidence that defendant fairly stated all the facts and circumstances of the case to his counsel, who advised the prosecution, then such facts constitute, in law, probable cause for plaintiff's arrest, although this matter was put in issue by the pleadings, if there was no testimony at the trial tending to prove the facts pertaining to that issue. Glaze v. Whitley, 5 Or. 164.

But in Nigh v. Keifer, 5 Ohio C. C. 1, 3 Ohio C. D. 1, the good faith with which defendant sought and acted upon advice of counsel was held to be a question for the jury, although the evidence in that regard was uncontradicted. The court said that the jury, under the rule in Ohio, had the right, and the exclusive right, to pass upon the credibility of the evidence, and to say whether the defendant was actuated by proper motives, and acted in good faith.

In Brown v. McBride, 24 Misc. 235, 52 N. Y. Supp. 620, "The court charged the jury that even though the defendant may have stated all of the facts to his counsel, and acted upon his advice, that did not make a case of probable cause, and thus entitle the defendant to a verdict. This is a subject upon which there has been much of inadvertence, it being often said that advice of counsel that the plaintiff was guilty of the offense, given upon all of the facts, is a complete defense; but that this is not the rule is no longer open to discussion with us. Hazzard v. Flury, 120 N. Y. 223, 24 N. E. 194. Where the undisputed facts make the question of probable cause for the court, advice of counsel is of no weight on that head. Where the question is for the jury, advice of counsel is material, and no doubt of much weight in respect of whether there was probable cause; viz., whether the facts and appearances were such as would lead a reasonably careful person to believe that the plaintiff was guilty of the offense. It is also material, even though lack of probable cause be found, on the question of the existence of that degree of malice which is a necessary ingredient to the cause of action, and also on the question of whether the defendant had that higher degree of malice for which smart money may be given." And see to the same effect, Parr v. Loder, 97 App. Div. 213, 89 N. Y. Supp. 823, appeal dismissed in 180 N. Y. 531, 72 N. E. 1146, and 182 N. Y. 509, 74 N. E. 1121.

b. Where there is a dispute.

1. —in general.

It is proper for the court to submit the question to the jury as to whether defendant obtained advice of counsel. Lancaster v. Langston, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 299, 36 S. W. 521.

And where it is necessary for the defendant to exercise reasonable diligence to learn what the facts were when he laid the matter before his counsel, whether he exercised such diligence is, it seems, a question for the jury if it is questioned. Gatz v. Harris, 134 Ky. 550, 121 S. W. 462.

And the time the advice of counsel was given, when such advice is relied upon as defense, is a question for the jury, apparently. Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Henby, 178 Ind. 239, 97 N. E. 313.

2. —as to disclosure of facts.

But if there is any dispute or uncertainty as to whether defendant made a full and fair statement of the facts to his legal adviser, that is a question of fact for the jury to determine. Miller v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 41 Fed. 898; Staples v. Johnson, 25 App. D. C. 155; Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 194, 29 Pac. 31; Seabridge v. McAdam, 108 Cal. 345, 41 Pac. 409; Boyer v. Bugher, 19 Wyo. 463, 120 Pac. 171; L.R.A.1915D.

Healey v. Aspinwall, 195 Mass. 446, 81 N. E. 256; Anderson v. Friend, 71 Ill. 475; Schattgen v. Holmback, 149 Ill. 646, 36 N. E. 969; Chicago Forge & Bolt Co. v. Rose, 69 Ill. App. 123; Mundal v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 92 Minn. 26, 99 N. W. 273, 100 N. W. 363; Nelson v. International Harvester Co. 117 Minn. 298, 135 N. W. 808; Shea v. Cloquet Lumber Co. 92 Minn. 348, 100 N. W. 111, 1 Ann. Cas. 930; Jackson v. Bell, 5 S. D. 257, 58 N. W. 671; Krause v. Bishop, 18 S. D. 298, 100 N. W. 434; Tandy v. Riley, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 98, 80 S. W. 770; Gatz v. Harris, 134 Ky. 550, 121 S. W. 462; Hardin v. Hight, 106 Ark. 190, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 368, 153 S. W. 99; Govaski v. Downey, 100 Mich. 429, 59 N. W. 167; Thompson v. Price, 100 Mich. 558, 59 N. W. 253; LeClear v. Perkins, 103 Mich. 131, 26 L.R.A. 627, 61 N. W. 357; Thurkettle v. Frost, 137 Mich. 115, 100 N. W. 283, 4 Ann. Cas. 836; Phiscator v. Rice, 147 Mich. 411, 110 N. W. 1095; DeBoer v. Adams, 159 Mich. 560, 124 N. W. 540; Kelley v. Paulsen, 162 Mich. 169, 127 N. W. 13; McNamee v. Nesbitt, 24 Nev. 400, 5 Pac. 37; Evans v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 105 Va. 72, 53 S. E. 3; Drake v. Vickery, 81 Kan. 519, 106 Pac. 290; Roby v. Smith, 40 Okla. 280, 138 Pac. 141; Pinson v. Campbell, 124 Mo. App. 260, 101 S. W. 621; March v. Vandiver, 181 Mo. App. 281, 168 S. W. 824; Noblett v. Bartsch, 31 Wash. 24, 96 Am. St. Rep. 886, 71 Pac. 551; Voss v. Bender, 32 Wash. 566, 73 Pac. 697; Spear v. Hiles, 67 Wis. 350, 30 N. W. 506; Fellows v. Hutchison, 12 U. C. Q. B. 633.

And it is error in such case to take the case from the jury and direct a verdict for the defendant. Drake v. Vickery, 81 Kan. 519, 106 Pac. 290.

In Voss v. Bender, 32 Wash. 566, 73 Pac. 697, which was an action upon an attachment bond to recover damages for alleged wrongful, oppressive, and malicious suing out of an attachment, the court said: "It is next argued that appellants' motion for a judgment should have been granted because appellant Bender had reasonable and probable cause to believe the grounds upon which the attachment issued. One of appellants' attorneys testified substantially that Bender stated the facts to him, and produced certain other witnesses, who were examined by the attorney, and that he thereupon advised the attachment. It is argued that, because of this advice, probable cause for the attachment will be presumed. It was said by this court in Levy v. Fleischner, 12 Wash. 15, 40 Pac. 384: '... it is the well-established law that probable cause is a question of law, in this far, at least, that probable cause will be presumed when the action has been commenced by the advice of attorneys to whom has been submitted all the facts in the case.' That was a case where there was no controversy as to the question whether the action was brought by the advice of counsel familiar with all the facts. In this case the question was not disputed that one of the attorneys advised the attachment, but it was disputed that all the facts in the case had been submitted to him, and it was claimed by respondent that the evidence of appellant Bender shows that he had stated to his attorney as facts things which he knew were untrue, and had no reason to believe. Where the attorney is falsely informed as to the facts, and is not put in possession of all of the facts, the advice of the attorney is not conclusive. The question of probable cause must then be left to the jury. In Levy v. Fleischer, this court quoted approvingly from Burton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 189, 22 N. W. 300, as follows: "What facts, and whether particular facts, constitute a probable cause, is a question exclusively for the court. What facts exist in a particular case, where there is a dispute in reference to them, is a question exclusively for the jury. When the facts are in controversy, the subject of probable cause should be submitted to the jury, either for specific findings of the facts, or with instructions from the court as to what facts will constitute probable cause. "These rules," says the court, "involve an apparent anomaly, and yet few, if any, rules of the common law, rest upon a greater unanimity or strength of authority;" citing many authorities.' The trial court in this case fully and fairly instructed the jury, in substance, that if they found that appellant Bender in good faith related to his attorney all the facts in the case, and that the attorney in good faith investigated the facts, and thereupon advised the attachment, respondent could not recover. But, if they found that Bender did not truthfully state the facts to his attorney, and made statements which were false, and upon such statements the advice was given, such advice would not constitute a defense to the action. These instructions were proper, and the finding of the jury upon the facts is conclusive now."

And in Anderson v. Seattle Lighting Co. 71 Wash. 155, 127 Pac. 1108, it is held that if the agent of a gas company communicated to the company's attorneys and to the prosecuting attorney all facts and circumstances in his knowledge, then the existence or nonexistence of probable cause was a judicial question for the court; but if, on the other hand, any issue of fact existed under all the evidence as to whether he did truthfully and fully communicate all the facts to the attorneys, then such issue of fact should have been submitted to the jury with proper instructions as to what facts would, and what facts would not, constitute probable cause.

Where it is neither admitted nor proved beyond controversy, that the defendant fully and truthfully communicated all the facts within his knowledge to the prosecuting attorney bearing upon the question of the plaintiff's guilt, but, on the contrary, there is ample evidence to warrant a jury in believing that the defendant withheld from such counsel, without excuse, material facts which would have shown plaintiff's innocence, the question of reasonable cause cannot be determined by the court, as a matter of law, because that question depends upon facts in dispute, and is therefore for the jury's determination under proper instructions. Baer v. Chambers, 67 Wash. 357, 121 Pac. 843, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 559.

In Walker v. Culman, 9 Kan. App. 691, 59 Pac. 606, the trial court instructed the jury as follows: "It is a good defense to an action for malicious prosecution that the defendant, before commencing the alleged malicious prosecution, presented the matter to the county attorney, fairly stating to him all the facts, and then in good faith following the advice of the county attorney. Such a thing completely rebuts the allegation of the plaintiff that there was want of probable cause. So in this case, if you should be satisfied from the preponderance of the evidence that the defendant J. A. Mathews, before the commencement of the prosecution complained of, did, in good faith, lay the whole matter before the county attorney, fairly stating to him all the facts, and that after so doing the county attorney instituted the prosecution complained of, or advised the said defendant Mathews to so institute the same, then and in such case the plaintiff cannot recover in this action against the said defendants, or either of them." The court said: "The testimony of Mathews and the county attorney, which is undisputed upon this point, clearly shows that the matter was fairly, fully, and in good faith stated to the county attorney, and that he found the statements to have been true, and Mathews acted thereon in good faith. This instruction correctly states the law (Dolbe v. Norton, 22 Kan. 101), and was clearly ignored by the jury."

In Lansky v. Prettyman, 140 Mich. 40, 103 N. W. 538, it was held improper to permit defendant to testify that he stated all the facts to the prosecuting attorney, but that he should state what facts he told the attorney, that the jury might determine whether all the facts were so stated. Jonasen v. Kennedy, 39 Neb. 313, 58 N. W. 122, is to the same effect.

3. — as to good faith of defendant.

And so, where the good faith in which defendant sought and acted on advice of counsel learned in the law is questioned, that is a question of fact to be determined by the jury. Staples v. Johnson, 25 App. D. C. 155; Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 218; Boyer v. Bugher, 19 Wyo. 463, 120 Pac. 171; Hidy v. Murray, 101 Iowa, 65, 69 N. W. 1138; Schattgen v. Holnback, 149 Ill. 646; 36 N. E. 969; Chicago Forge & Bolt Co. v. Rose, 69 Ill. App. 123; Cole v. Andrews, 70 Minn. 230, 73 N. W. 3; Mundal v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 92 Minn. 26, 99 N. W. 273, 100 N. W. 363; Nelson v. International Harvester Co. 117 Minn. 298, 135 N. W. 808; Turner v. O'Brien, 5 Neb. 542, and see subsequent appeal, 11 Neb. 108, 7 S. W. 850; Jackson v. Bell, 5 S. D. 257, 58 N. W. 671; Lancaster v. Langston, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 299, 36 S. W. 521; McNamee v. Nesbitt, 24 Nev. 400, 56 Pac. 37; Bilingsley v. Maas, 93 Wis. 176, 67 N. W. 49; Healey v. Aspinwall, 195 Mass. 453, 81 N. E. 256; Fellows v. Hutchison, 12 U. C. Q. B. 633. And see Stone v. Stevens, 12 Conn. 219, 30 Am. Dec. 611.

It is a question for the jury to determine whether or not a defendant acted in good faith upon the legal advice given him, and brought the suit or made the accusation fully believing that he had a good cause of action against the plaintiff, or that the latter was guilty of the offense with which he was charged. Thompson v. Lunley, 50 How. Pr. 105.

"If a party lays the facts of his case fully and fairly before counsel, and acts in good faith upon the opinion given him by such counsel (however erroneous that opinion may be), it is sufficient evidence of a probable cause, and is a good defense to an action for a malicious prosecution, or for a malicious arrest. But in such a case it is properly a question for the jury whether such party acted bona fide on the opinion given him by his professional adviser, believing that the plaintiff was guilty of the crime of which he was accused, or that he had a good cause of action against the plaintiff. Ravenga v. Mackintosh, 2 Barn. & C. 693, 4 Dowl. & R. 107, 1 Car. & P. 204, 16 Eng. Rul. Cas. 742." Hall v. Suydam, 6 Barb. 83.

And it is for the jury to say whether the attorney consulted acted impartially, or whether he was in collusion with defendants, and advised the commencement of the prosecution from some ulterior motive rather than from a purpose to vindicate the law and prevent a breach of the peace. See Shea v. Cloquet Lumber Co. 92 Minn. 348, 100 N. W. 111, 1 Ann. Cas. 930, for this.

In Bilingsley v. Maas, 93 Wis. 176, 67 N. W. 49, the court said: "It is said that the court should have set aside the verdict as against the evidence, upon the ground that 'probable cause' was conclusively established. This is based upon the evidence to the effect that the defendants made a full and complete statement of the facts to their attorney, that on such statement they were advised by such attorney that plaintiff was guilty, and that they honestly believed and acted upon such advice, in good faith, in instituting the prosecution. Such facts, established to the satisfaction of the jury, or appearing conclusively from the evidence, are fatal to a recovery. Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 212; Sutton v. McConnell, 46 Wis. 269, 50 N. W. 414; Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 116. But while the defendants testified that they made a full and complete statement of the facts to their attorney, and this was corroborated by such attorney, and that they acted upon his advice and in good faith, whether they did act in good faith, in fact, was a material question to be determined, and was disputed. Therefore, though the direct evidence was to the effect that they made a full statement to counsel, received his advice, and acted in accordance therewith, still the fact of whether they acted honestly and in good faith, without any ulterior motive, was for the jury, if, on the whole case, as made by the evidence, persons of different minds might reasonably draw different inferences therefrom in respect to such question. Stewart v. Sonneborn, supra. That such was the condition of the case was the conclusion of the trial judge, and we are unable to say wherein he was wrong, or that there was an abuse of discretion in refusing to set the verdict aside and grant a new trial on the ground that it is against the weight of evidence in respect to the facts constituting plaintiff's right to recover."

In Leyenberger v. Paul, 40 Ill. App. 516, whether defendant believed in the advice of counsel is held to be a question for the jury.

And see Kehl v. Hope Oil Mill & Compress Co. 77 Miss. 762, 27 So. 641, holding that uncontroverted evidence that defendant took advice of reputable counsel does not entitle him to a peremptory instruction where there is evidence tending to show a want of probable cause and that he did not act in good faith upon such advice, as the question of the good faith of defendant is one for the decision of the jury.

VII. Conclusion.

The rule that the question of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution is for the court, and not for the jury, although undoubtedly anomalous in that it substitutes the judgment of the court for that of the jury as to the reasonableness of the defendant's conduct in the light of the admitted or established facts and beliefs, is nevertheless, except in a few jurisdictions, established by the overwhelming weight of authority. The rule in its origin is probably traceable to the apprehension of the courts that if the question of probable cause were left to juries, they might not sufficiently safeguard the rights of defendants, and so discourage the performance of a public duty of laying informations against persons believed to have committed offenses, and hamper the administration of the criminal law. These practical considerations seem to have prevailed over the theoretical objections against invading the province of the jury and withdrawing from them what is essentially an inference of fact rather than of law; namely, whether defendant acted as a reasonably prudent man would have acted in the circumstances.

It will be observed, however, that the rule withdraws from the jury only the inference as to the ultimate question whether the defendant, in view of the facts known to him and the beliefs entertained by him,—facts and beliefs established by undisputed evidence, or found by the jury upon disputed evidence,—acted as a reasonably prudent man. The rule leaves for the determination of the jury all questions as to the credibility of witnesses, and the weighing and balancing of conflicting evidence on disputed points of fact, and the final determination of all facts and inferences, including the inference as to the belief entertained by defendant in respect of the plaintiff's guilt, save only the ultimate inference as to whether his belief and conduct were those of an ordinarily prudent man in view of all the circumstances. In other words, there is no invasion of the province of the jury so far as concerns the belief and conduct of the defendant, but only so far as concerns the characterization of that belief and conduct as reasonable or unreasonable.

While there is considerable apparent conflict or confusion in the cases as to the practical consequences and effect of the adoption of the rule, they seem to be reconcilable when proper allowance is made for differences in local practice. In some cases statements are to be found to the effect that the question of probable cause, is for the court when the facts are undisputed, and for the jury when they are in dispute. That form of statement is obviously incorrect, or at least misleading. Assuming in accordance with the general rule that the question of probable cause, i. e., the inference as to whether the defendant acted as a reasonably prudent man, in view of the facts and circumstances of the case, is for the court, it is equally so whether the facts and circumstances are established by undisputed or by disputed evidence. The difference, theoretically, at least, is only one of practice. If the facts and circumstances are admitted or established by undisputed evidence, the court, according to the local practice and the state of the case, either enters a nonsuit, or directs a verdict, or submits the case on other issues.

Upon the other hand, if there is a dispute in the evidence, the case must be submitted to the jury for the determination of the facts and circumstances, and the inferences of fact, with binding hypothetical instructions by the court as to the conclusion in respect of probable cause, covering all possible combinations of facts and inferences which the jury would be justified in finding from the evidence. Theoretically, at least, the jury in the latter event no more than in the former exercise an independent judgment as to whether the defendant's belief and conduct were those of an ordinarily prudent man; that is, whether the facts and circumstances as found by them constitute reasonable cause; but, after determining the facts and circumstances and finding warrantable inferences, merely register mechanically the results of the binding instructions given by the court. The practical aspect corresponds with the theoretical when the jury are required to return a special verdict registering their findings as to the facts and circumstances and the inferences within their province. In the absence of a special verdict, however, it may be questioned whether the practical results always correspond with the theory, since in such case there is no means of determining upon what findings of fact the general verdict was based. There is, of course, a presumption in aid of the general verdict that the jury followed the instructions of the court, but it is quite possible, contrary to the presumption, that a jury, either because of a misunderstanding of the instructions, or failure to recall the particular instructions pertinent to the facts actually found by them, or because of a natural reluctance to surrender their own judgment as to the conduct of a reasonably prudent man in the circumstances, may render a verdict for the plaintiff notwithstanding that they were convinced of facts bearing on the question of probable cause which, under the hypothetical instructions of the court, required a verdict for defendant at their hands.

The courts in some instances may not have been unwilling to mitigate the rigor of a questionable, or at least an anomalous, rule by overlooking the possibility contrary to the presumption, that the jury's findings as to the facts bearing on the question of probable cause may not have been consistent with their general verdict. The suggestion occurs that the failure to require a special verdict in such a case tends to put a premium upon the introduction of sufficient evidence to raise a dispute, even though not sufficient to seriously affect the finding of the jury, as to the facts bearing on the question of probable cause, since it may practically, though of course not theoretically, enable the party introducing it to have the judgment of the jury, rather than that of the court, on the ultimate question of probable cause. The comparative infrequency of special verdicts in such cases is doubtless in a measure accounted for by the difficulty apprehended in framing special questions covering every possible phase of the evidence bearing on the subject of reasonable cause. This, however, is no more difficult than the task of framing hypothetical instruction covering every such phase of the evidence, which is imposed upon the court by the general rule that the question of probable cause is for the court. If the framing of such questions or instructions is indeed impracticable, that would not seem to furnish an argument against the rule itself. Certainly the rule does not work equal justice to all suitors if in practical effect it refers the question of probable cause to the court upon a given state of facts when there happens to be no dispute in the evidence as to such facts, and refers the question to the jury on precisely the same state of facts as found by the jury, if there happens to be a sufficient dispute in the evidence to require the submission of facts to the jury. Yet, the possibility of such an anomalous result cannot be avoided consistently with adherence to the general rule which makes the question of probable cause one for the court, unless it is possible and practicable to frame special questions or hypothetical instructions which will cover every possible combination of facts and circumstances which the jury may find bearing on the question of probable cause.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN, & SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

GEORGE W. BELLAMY et al.

(113 Ark. 384, 169 S. W. 322.)

Railroad — power of Commission to change location of depot.

1. A Railroad Commission has authority to change the location of depots formerly established, under statutory power to hear petitions for the establishment, enlargement, equipment, and discontinuance of depots, and determine the character of construction, equipment, change or enlargement of depots which shall be supplied.

Note. — Power to compel change of location of railroad station.

As the title indicates, this note deals with the power to compel railroads to change the location of stations contrary to their will.

The question of power to require establishment of union station is covered in the note to Railroad Commission v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. post, 98.

As to railroad's right to change location of station, see note to Louisville & Interurban R. Co. v. Callahan, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 419.

Generally as to power to compel establishment of stations or the stopping of trains at stations, see note to Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 821. That note so far as concerns the stoppage of trains is supplemented by the note to St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Langer, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 478.

As to whether railroad companies may be required to establish or maintain a station that will not pay expenses, see note to Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Nebraska State R. Commission, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 444.

As to delegation by legislature of power to regulate carriers, including the establishment of stations and stopping trains at stations, see note to State v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 650.

Generally.

There can be little doubt as to the power of the legislature, in the absence of a constitutional prohibition, to compel a change of location of railroad stations, or of its right to delegate the determination of the necessity for a change and the selection of a new site to a Commission. This right to compel such a change, however, is subject to the limitation that a reasonable necessity for the change exists, and that the change ordered is, under the circumstances, a reasonable one.

In Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 137 Ala. 439, 34 So. 401, the court said it was hardly to be questioned but that it was entirely within the legislative competency to empower the Railroad Commission Same — following petition.

2. The Railroad Commission, in locating a railroad depot, is not bound to adopt the exact location set forth in the petition therefor, where the statute does not require the petition to define the place of location or require the Commission to adopt the spot which may be designated by petition.

Same — change of location — taking of property.

3. Requiring the rebuilding of a railroad depot which has been destroyed by fire, upon a new location the title to which must be acquired and which will require an abandonment of the old location, is not an unconstitutional taking of property if the difference in cost of the establishment and maintenance of the depot upon the respective locations is not unreasonable.

to order the location of stations and the building of depots, and to apply to the courts for the enforcement of the order.

And in State ex rel. North Carolina Corp. Commission v. Southern R. Co. 151 N. C. 447, 66 S. E. 427, the court in considering the right to remove the case to the inferior Federal courts said that it was manifest that an order of the Railroad Commissioners requiring a railroad to move and enlarge its freight depot did not impinge upon any Federal law, but was a valid exercise of the police power of the state.

And it was held that an allegation that it would cost the railroad over $2,000 to move and enlarge its freight station as ordered by the Commissioners, did not per se make the regulation an infraction of the 14th Amendment, and did not give the inferior Federal tribunals any jurisdiction to pass on the propriety of such order. Ibid.

In Re Railroad Comrs. 79 Vt. 266, 65 Atl. 82, the court said that by an amendment of § 3989, Vt. Stat. in 1902, the Railroad Commissioners were given power, among other things, to order a change in the location of stations and station houses. The question at issue in this case, however, was as to the board's power to order the establishment of a station at a point where none existed, and it did not involve the power to change the location.

In State v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. — Ala. —, 39 So. 984, it was held that the act of February 28, 1903, Gen. Acts 1903, p. 95, amending chap. 96 of the Code of 1896, did not give the Railroad Commission of Alabama authority to order a change in the locations of stations.

And in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 137 Ala. 439, 34 So. 401, it was held that no authority was conferred upon the Railroad Commission to compel a railroad to change the location of a station, or upon a court of equity to enforce such an order by § 3451 of the Code of 1890, requiring railroads when ordered by the Railroad Commission to maintain at each of its passenger stations sufficient sitting or waiting rooms for passengers; or by § 3452, providing for the manner of serving notice of Same — location upon curve — effect.

4. Locating a depot at a place where the main line of the railroad will be upon a curve and a branch line upon a grade is not so unreasonable and arbitrary as to make the order of location void where the curve is not greater than that upon which other depots are located, and the railway company owns land sufficient to enable it to straighten the tracks for several hundred feet at the place of location.

(June 15, 1914.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Pulaski County Chancery Court in defendants' favor in a suit to enjoin them from enforcing an order of the Railroad Commission requiring plaintiff to build a new depot building at a point between where the depot had been located and a location asked by its patrons. Affirmed.

Statement by Wood, J.:

More than fifteen citizens of the town of Benton, Saline county, Arkansas, presented a petition to the Railroad Commission of Arkansas, in which they stated that they were shippers and patrons of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company, and that the depot of said company at Benton had been recently destroyed by fire; that the company was preparing to build a new depot on the old site, which was on the extreme edge of the city, and not accessible to travelers without passing a distance of 1,500 or 1,700 feet along the right of way of the company, and between its tracks where travel was made extremely the order of the Commission requiring compliance with the preceding section; or § 3453, providing for the enforcement of the orders of the Railroad Commissioners by proceedings in chancery upon refusal of the railroads to comply therewith.

And it was further held that such authority was not conferred by § 3490, giving the Commissioners general supervision over all railroads of the state, and directing that they should, from time to time, examine the railroads and keep themselves informed as to their condition and the manner in which they were operated with reference to the security and accommodations of the public, and should recommend to the railroads the adoption of such measures as the Commissioners might deem conducive to the public safety and interests; or by § 3494, giving the Commissioners authority to notify the railroads of what they deemed necessary changes. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, supra.

Reasonableness of change ordered.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Miller, 31 Okla. 801, 123 Pac. 1047, it was held that L.R.A.1915D.

dangerous by the passage of trains on the main line and switches of the railway. They urged the Commission to require the railway company to build its depot at a point immediately south of where its line known as the Little Rock & Hot Springs Western was intersected by East street and Main street. The Commission took the petition under consideration, visited the town of Benton, examined the location mentioned in the petition, heard many witnesses, and concluded that it would be unwise to require the railway company to build its new depot at the point named in the petition. But it issued an order requiring the railway company to build its new depot building at a point between where its depot had been located and the location asked by the petitioners, which it described in the order as follows:

"Commence on the east line of East street between tracks of the Iron Mountain main line and tracks of the Hot Springs Western branch of the Iron Mountain Railway, with the platform, run thence east with platform 340 feet, and build passenger station according to plans, which show length of new station to be 188 feet, then continue eastward with the platform 340 feet on the east or north side of the depot."

The company was ordered to begin construction work on its new depot building on or before July 15, 1913.

The appellant, St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company (hereafter, for convenience, called company) instituted this suit against the appellees to enjoin them from enforcing the above order, set-an order of the Corporation Commission requiring a railroad to change the location of its stock pens, and fixing a place of location, was not only legislative, but also administrative, in its character; and that such order when entered was presumed to be reasonable and just, and would not be disturbed on an appeal to the supreme court when the evidence did not show that it was unreasonable.

And in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levick, 38 Okla. 746, 134 Pac. 874, the presumption that an order of the Corporation Commission requiring a railroad company to remove its station from its location north of the platted part of a town to a point south of the main street of the town, to be agreed upon by the railroad and citizens, or upon their being unable to so agree by the Commission, was prima facie just, reasonable, and correct, was held not overcome by certain evidence relating to the cost of moving the station and tracks, adequacy of room for relocation, etc.

And in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. State, 28 Okla. 372, 111 Pac. 396, 114 Pac. 1096, an order of the Corporation Commission requiring the removal of stock pens

ting up that the Railroad Commission (hereafter called Commission) did not have authority under the act of May 17, 1907 (under which it claimed to be acting) to make the order; that no petition asking that the passenger depot be located at the point designated by the Commission was filed as the statute requires; that the location designated in the petition that was filed was several hundred feet west of the location selected by the Commission; that the order was void because it imposed an unnecessary and unreasonable burden and expense upon the company in requiring it to remove its station from a point where it had acquired station grounds which were adequate for all purposes, and which had been fully prepared for depot purposes at great expense, and that to place the depot at the point designated by the Commission would require the company to obtain and improve other lands, to readjust and change its numerous tracks, to cut down the grade of its line at various points at an enormous expense, and thereby deprive the company of its property without due process of law and in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law; that the order was unreasonable and void for the reason that it required the company to place its depot at a point where its lines passing same would be upon a curve and upon a grade, making it exceedingly dangerous to operate its trains at said station; that the order was in violation of § 22 of article 2 of the Constitution of Arkansas, which provides that "the right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and private property shall not be taken, appropriated, or damaged for public use, without just compensation therefor;" that the order was in violation of § 9, article 2, of the Constitution of Arkansas, which prohibits the imposition of cruel and unusual punishment and excessive fines.

The appellees answered, denying that the order was void, as set up in the allegations of the complaint, and that the order imposed any unreasonable burden upon the company, or that the company would be irreparably injured by the enforcement of the order. They further set up, as reasons why the company should be required to obey the order of the Commission, the following:

"That the site at which plaintiff desires to build its new depot is way off at one side of the city, has no streets leading to or from it; that it is located between the tracks of the defendant company, same being the main line of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company on the south, and the Little Rock & Hot Springs Western Railway on the north; that said tracks are located about 100 feet apart, where plaintiff has maintained its depot, and about 200 feet apart at the point where said tracks are crossed by Main street; that from Main street to the site where plaintiff maintains its depot is a distance of more than one fourth of a mile; from one location and re-establishment at some convenient point was affirmed, it appearing that the old pens were not accessible except by driving stock through the business or residential section of a city which had grown up since the pens were first located.

But in State ex rel. Great Northern R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 60 Wash. 218, 110 Pac. 1075, an order of the Railroad Commission requiring the removal of a station to a point 500 feet from its old location was held unreasonable where it appeared that it was situated in a town of about seventy-five people, and was within 500 or 600 feet of the point upon the railway nearest the business center of the town; that there was no other good reason for moving it than to bring it that much nearer the business center; that there was nothing in the lay of the ground rendering it difficult of access; and that the original location was prompted by a desire in accordance with a rule of the railroad to keep the station 150 feet or more away from other buildings on account of fire.

In State v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 87 Miss. 679, 40 So. 263, where § 4309 of L.R.A.1915D.

the Code of 1892 authorized the Railroad Commission to designate the site or location of any new building or station house which might be ordered erected in cases where the site selected by the railroad officials was inconvenient or inaccessible, but provided that "every depot must be located with due regard to the interest of the railroad and the public convenience," the Railroad Commission was held to have no power to order a railroad which had passenger and freight depots in a small town, although not conveniently situated, to build a passenger station within 400 feet of a designated crossing north of its track, and authorizing it to cease stopping its trains at its old depot, except so far as might be required for freight; it not appearing that the railroad had property at the point designated for the new station, or that it could procure it upon reasonable terms, and it appearing that there was a "stop station" at the point selected for the new location; since the order in effect required the maintenance of two depots, and did not have due regard to the interest of the railroad and the public convenience.

that practically all of the travel from the city to said station is by way of Main and East streets, until the line of the Little Rock & Hot Springs Western Railroad is crossed, and then between the tracks to said station; that in going from Main and East streets to said station it is not only necessary to cross the railroad track of the Little Rock & Hot Springs Western Railway, but also to travel for a distance of 1,500 feet from Main street and 1,200 feet from East street between the said tracks of the plaintiff company, and also to cross a connecting track that connects the Little Rock & Hot Springs Western Railroad track to that of the main line of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company; that the land lying between the tracks, and over which it is necessary for the public to travel, belongs to the plaintiff company; that the city owns no street which approaches said station nearer than approximately 1,200 feet; that because of the location of said station at the place where plaintiff now contends that same remain located, it is very dangerous and inconvenient for people of Benton and vicinity to go to and from said depot," etc.

The answer then proceeds to enumerate at length the causes and conditions existing at the place where the company proposes to build the new depot that would make the same dangerous and inconvenient for the people of Benton. Appellees averred that for twenty-six years and until about the year 1901, the plaintiff company operated its depot at a point between Main and Market streets, on a curve much greater than that at the point designated by the Commission; that it was only after the building of the Little Rock & Hot Springs Western Railway and the acquirement by gift from the people of Benton of the 40-acre tract of land which now lies immediately north of the site where said depot was burned that plaintiff moved its depot to the site where it now claims the same should be permanently located; that neither the curve nor grade at the point designated by the Commission for said depot is such as to make it more dangerous or hazardous for the plaintiff company to operate its trains than it would be with the station located at the point contended for by said company; that it is necessary for the convenience and safety of the public, who are patrons of the plaintiff, using its depot at Benton, that said depot be moved to a point as far west as that designated by the Commission.

An intervention was filed by various citizens, adopting the allegations of appellant's complaint, protesting against the removal of the depot to the place designated by the L.R.A.1915D.

Commission, and setting up that they were engaged in business near the location of the site selected by the railway company, and that the change in the location of the depot would render their property of little or no value, that their property was acquired with the understanding that the depot would remain where located, and that if they had not understood that the depot would remain there, they would not have invested their money in the property. They joined in the prayer for an injunction against the enforcement of the order of the Commission.

The chancery court, after hearing the evidence, which was adduced ore tenus and taken down by a stenographer and afterwards transcribed and made a part of the record of the chancery court, found that the Commission had authority to make the order; that the petition presented by more than fifteen citizens was sufficient to authorize the Commission to make the order of which appellant complains; "that the old location where the depot was burned is a better location for the depot building than the location mentioned in the order of the Railroad Commission;" but the court was of the opinion that it had no authority to set aside the order made by the Commission unless there was no reason therefor, and the court was of the opinion that there was a reason for the Commission to make the order, and therefore entered a decree dismissing appellant's complaint for want of equity. Other facts stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. R. Donham for appellees.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant contends:

First. That the statutes did not empower the Railroad Commission to relocate stations. The statute provides:

"Section 1. That the Board of Railroad Commission of the State of Arkansas be and the same is hereby authorized, empowered, and required to hear and consider all petitions for train service, depots, stations, spurs, side tracks, platforms, and the establishment, enlargement, equipment, and discontinuance of the same along and upon the right of way of any railroad in this state; provided, said petition shall be signed by at least fifteen bona fide citizens residing in the territory sought to be affected by said petitioners.

"Sec. 2. The said Board of Railroad Commissioners shall, within thirty days after the filing of such said petition, proceed to make a personal inspection of the conditions complained of and investigate the objects sought to be accomplished by such said petitioners, and shall have the right and power to summon and swear witnesses, which summons shall be served by any sheriff, constable, or deputy having legal jurisdiction; whereupon, the said Board of Railroad Commissioners shall determine the amount, degree, and character of construction, equipment, changes, enlargements of stations and depots which should be supplied by such railroad, railroad company, its lessee, or operator, and shall have the power and authority to require a reasonable train service for each and every such railroad station and depot within the state of Arkansas, and their findings shall be binding.

ing upon all such railroads within the state of Arkansas."

Laws 1907, p. 357.

The power conferred upon the Commission by the above statute to hear and consider petitions for "depots, stations, spurs, side tracks," etc., and "to determine the amount, degree, and character of construction, equipment, changes, enlargement of stations and depots," is sufficiently comprehensive to enable the Commission to establish a depot or station in the first place, or to change the location of depots that have been formerly established. The act, in express terms, gives the Commission power to hear and consider petitions for the "discontinuance" of depots, stations, spurs, etc., "as well as for their establishment." While the word "relocate" is not used, yet the terms employed in the act are broad enough to include the relocation of a depot or station. A discontinuance of a depot or station at one location and the establishment of it at another is but a relocation. Therefore, the power to "discontinue" and to make "changes" of stations and depots necessarily includes the power to relocate.

Second. Under the statute, a petition for the establishment of depots, stations, etc., or the discontinuance of the same at one point and a relocation and establishment thereof at another, is necessary to give the Commission jurisdiction of the subject-matter. But, while a petition "signed by at least fifteen bona fide citizens residing in the territory sought to be affected by said petition" is essential to give the Commission jurisdiction, the Commission, in the matter of locating or establishing a depot or station, is not required to order the same built or established upon the exact spot designated in the petition. The statute does not require that the petition shall designate the precise point where the depot shall be established, and if the petitioners do define the place for the location of the depot, the Commission is not bound to establish the same upon the exact spot and according to the limits set forth in the petition. The Commission is only required to consider "the territory sought to be affected," and, of course, would be precluded from establishing a depot beyond the territory sought to be affected. But, as we have stated, there is nothing in the act requiring the exact location to be defined, nor circumscribing the authority of the Commission to those precise limits where they have been set forth in the petition. A petition emanating from at least fifteen bona fide citizens residing in the territory sought to be affected, setting forth that they desire the establishment of a depot or station, or a discontinuance thereof at one point and a relocation of same along and upon the right of way of any railway in this state, is sufficient to give the Commission jurisdiction to act in the premises, whether the exact point for the location or establishment, or relocation, of the depot or station is precisely designated and defined or not. Here "the territory sought to be affected" was the city of Benton, and the petition was signed by more than the requisite number of bona fide citizens of that territory. This was such a petition as the statute contemplates, and it gives the Commission jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and it was then within the power of the Commission to discontinue the old station and establish the new depot along the line of appellant's railroad at any point "within the territory to be affected," which was found to be most conducive to the public welfare, taking into consideration, of course, the interests of the railway company and also the convenience of the general public that was to be subserved by the granting of the petition. It cannot be said that because the Commission did not direct the establishment of the new depot at the exact point described in the petition, it acted without a petition, and therefore had no authority to make the order. There was a petition signed by more than the prescribed number of bona fide citizens, and it was requested at the hearing that if the Commission did not see fit to locate the new depot at the site designated in the petition, that it be placed as near that site as practical. Every requirement of the law was met in the matter of the petition.

Third. Appellant contends that the order under review is unreasonable and invalid because taking its property without due process of law. Appellant, in this connection, says: "The effect of the order is to destroy the value of the property owned by it and to compel it to acquire and improve other property at great and unnecessary expense, without any proportionately compensative advantage to the public."

Appellant was given an opportunity to be heard before the Commission, and was heard. The Commission had before it the testimony adduced by the appellant, showing the difference between the cost of rebuilding the new depot and the necessary houses and the arrangement of the tracks at the place designated by the Commission, and the cost of rebuilding and rearranging the tracks, freight houses, etc., at the place of the old station. These were questions of fact addressed to the Commission, and it could serve no useful purpose to set out in detail and discuss the evidence bearing upon these issues. The difference in the expense of establishing and maintaining a station at the point designated by the Commission is greater, as shown by the testimony of witnesses for appellant, than the expense of building a new depot and maintaining the station at its present location, but it cannot be said that this difference is so great as to amount to a confiscation of appellant's property. The difference in the cost of the establishment and maintenance between the two locations is not so great as to make the order of the Commission unreasonable and arbitrary. This was a matter addressed primarily to the Commission, and, after a careful consideration of the evidence bearing upon this issue, we are of the opinion that the order of the Commission was not arbitrary and unreasonable.

However much we may differ from the finding of the Commission, upon the evidence in this record, as to the wisdom and expediency of its order, on account of the increased cost to the appellant in making the necessary expenditures to comply with its order, nevertheless a fair consideration of all the testimony adduced on this issue does not convince us that the order was arbitrary and unreasonable. The order of the Commission, under the act, and the facts adduced by this record, was not a taking of property without due process of law. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. State, 99 Ark. 1, 136 S. W. 938.

Fourth. It is next contended that the order was unreasonable in requiring the appellant to locate its depot at a place where its main line will be upon a curve and its branch line upon a grade.

In Louisiana & A. R. Co. v. State, 85 Ark. 12, 106 S. W. 960, we said: "When the legislature passes a special act requiring the doing of a certain thing, such as the establishment and maintenance of a station at a given place by a railroad corporation, there may be a judicial question presented whether or not a real necessity exists for the doing of the thing in order to reasonably serve the public convenience. It is a question primarily for legislative determination, and that determination should not be disturbed by the court unless the power has been exercised arbitrarily and without reason. In other words, the legislative determination should be and is conclusive unless it is arbitrary and without any foundation in reason and justice. There may be cases where the power is exercised so arbitrarily and unreasonably that the court should declare, as a matter of law, that the legislature exceeded its power, and that the legislative determination should be disregarded."

We further said: "The utmost force must be given to the legislative determination of the necessity for a station and the reasonableness of requiring the company to erect and maintain one."

And in St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. State, 97 Ark. 473, 134 S. W. 970, we held (quoting syllabus): "The legislature has primarily the right to determine whether the public necessity and convenience require the establishment of a railway depot at a given point, and the courts will not disturb that determination unless it is clearly shown that such requirement is unreasonable and arbitrary."

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. State, supra, the court had under consideration the power of the Railroad Commission, under this statute, to order the construction of a spur track, and we said: "The legislature had the right to require the construction of this spur track, and, having it, could delegate the power to the Railroad Commission, as it has done by said act of 1907. . . . If it had made the requirement directly by statute, instead of conferring the power upon the Railroad Commission to make it, its action would have been subject to judicial review only as being so arbitrary and unreasonable as to cause it to be void for want of power. . . . The order of the Railroad Commission, made under the authority delegated to it, is subject to like review for the same cause."

These principles doubtless were in the mind of the chancery court when passing upon the facts on the issue as to whether or not the order of the Commission was so arbitrary and unreasonable as to render the same void. The court was correct in its conclusion. It cannot be said that the order of the Commission was "arbitrary and without any foundation in reason and justice."

Appellant contends that the order was unreasonable because the testimony adduced by it showed that the location of the station under the order of the Commission was on a curve on the main line; that, being on a curve, there was difficulty in starting trains, in coupling the cars, and in seeing signals, all of which rendered the operation of trains far more difficult and dangerous than it would be on a straight track, like the one at the old station or place at which the appellant proposed to erect its new depot building. The undisputed testimony showed that the station under the order of the Commission would be located on a curve on the track of appellant's main line that was $1\frac{1}{2}$ degrees. There was much testimony on behalf of appellant tending to show that the difficulty, as well as the hazards, of operating the trains on this curve would be greatly increased; that if the station was located, according to the order of the Commission, on the branch line the engine would stand upon a 1 per cent grade, which would make it very difficult to handle long, heavy trains, whereas at the old station there was a straight track on the main line, and the grade of the branch line was of sufficient distance to permit the proper handling of trains. The testimony also tended to show that if the appellant undertook to straighten the curvature at the station under the order of the Commission, and to reduce the grade on the branch line so as to enable it to properly handle the trains, it would cost about \$55,000. It was shown that a larger number of passenger trains passed through Benton than any other town in the state except Little Rock. This was because of the numerous passengers to Hot Springs. It was shown that an effort was once before made before the Railroad Commission for the removal of the depot from its present location, which was unsuccessful, and likewise an unsuccessful effort was made to have the legislature pass a special act requiring the removal of the depot from its present location. On the other hand, there was testimony tending to show that the site where the station is now located and the site where it would be located under the order of the Commission were so nearly identical that either would make a good location; that the curve at the station of the Rock Island Railroad at Benton was greater than would be the curve at the station under the Commission's order; that a curve is objectionable if sharp, that is, if over 4 degrees; that while it is preferable always to have the stations located on a straight track, nevertheless appellant had quite a number of stations located on curves of $1\frac{1}{2}$ degrees. It was shown that the appellant owned sufficient land between the two tracks to make a straight track south for 500 or 600 feet; that it had room to straighten its tracks without getting off its right of way; that from the old station it had 522 feet of straight track; that it had plenty of room to carry the straight track 522 feet south of the new location. It was shown that the cost of erecting the depot building at the station ordered by the Commission and at the old station where the depot building had been burned would be approximately the same; and there was evidence tending to show that the convenience to the people of Benton as a whole would be far greater at the station ordered by the Commission than at the old station, and that the danger and difficulty in operating trains at the station as ordered by the Commission would be no greater than at the old location.

point and a relocation of same along and upon the right of way of any railway in this state, is sufficient to give the Commission jurisdiction to act in the premises, whether the exact point for the location or establishment, or relocation, of the depot or station is precisely designated and defined or not. Here "the territory sought to be affected" was the city of Benton, and the petition was signed by more than the requisite number of bona fide citizens of that territory. This was such a petition as the statute contemplates, and it gives the Commission jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and it was then within the power of the Commission to discontinue the old station and establish the new depot along the line of appellant's railroad at any point "within the territory to be affected," which was found to be most conducive to the public welfare, taking into consideration, of course, the interests of the railway company and also the convenience of the general public that was to be subserved by the granting of the petition. It cannot be said that because the Commission did not direct the establishment of the new depot at the exact point described in the petition, it acted without a petition, and therefore had no authority to make the order. There was a petition signed by more than the prescribed number of bona fide citizens, and it was requested at the hearing that if the Commission did not see fit to locate the new depot at the site designated in the petition, that it be placed as near that site as practical. Every requirement of the law was met in the matter of the petition.

Third. Appellant contends that the order under review is unreasonable and invalid because taking its property without due process of law. Appellant, in this connection, says: "The effect of the order is to destroy the value of the property owned by it and to compel it to acquire and improve other property at great and unnecessary expense, without any proportionately compensative advantage to the public."

These principles doubtless were in the mind of the chancery court when passing upon the facts on the issue as to whether or not the order of the Commission was so arbitrary and unreasonable as to render the same void. The court was correct in its conclusion. It cannot be said that the order of the Commission was "arbitrary and without any foundation in reason and justice."

Without going into further detail concerning the facts, it suffices to say that it was shown that a majority of the Commission visited the location, heard the testimony pro and con, and, after making a thorough investigation and giving the parties full opportunity to be heard, made the order now challenged by the appellant. Under the principles already announced by this court as to the power delegated by the legislature to the Commission, we are of the opinion that the court was correct in holding that the order of the Commission, under the facts adduced, was not arbitrary and unreasonable.

The decree, therefore, dismissing the appellant's complaint for want of equity, is in all things affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF ALABAMA, Appt.,

v.

ALABAMA GREAT SOUTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

(185 Ala. 354, 64 So. 13.)

Public service commission — order — effect in court.

1. An order of a Railroad Commission requiring construction of a union railroad station under authority of a statute requiring railroads to maintain such stations when the necessities of the case demand it, commensurate with the business and revenues of the company, will be accepted by the court, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, as a finding that the situation justifies it.

Same — presumption in support of ruling.

2. The court will, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, presume, in support of an order by a Railroad Commission directing railroad companies to procure land within certain limits and construct thereon a union station, that such land for that purpose can be obtained within the prescribed limits at a reasonable price.

Carrier — union station — power to require.

3. Authority to require the abandonment of present facilities is included in a grant of power to a Railroad Commission to require railroad companies to maintain a union station.

Same — union station — police power.

4. The police power extends to requiring railroad companies entering a particular city jointly to acquire the necessary property and construct and maintain a union passenger station.

Legislature — delegation of authority — arbitrary power.

5. Arbitrary power is not conferred upon a Railroad Commission by granting it authority to require railroad companies within a particular city to construct and maintain union stations when the necessities of Note. — Power to require establishment of union station.

As to power to compel change of location of railroad station, see note to St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Bellamy, ante, 91.

Power of court to determine location.

The determination of the location of a union station has in one case been held within the jurisdiction of the supreme court.

Thus, in Concord & M. R. Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 67 N. H. 464, 41 Atl. 263, where all parties desired the erection of a union station, and conceded that the public good required it, but were unable to agree upon a location, in the absence of express legislation conferring the power of determining the question, it was held that the supreme court had common-law jurisdiction to determine the location.

Power of legislature to direct construction of union stations.

In Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 109 Mass. 103, the act of 1871, chap. 343, providing that several railroads should unite in a union passenger station to be located on one of two designated sites, the precise location to be selected by commissioners appointed by the supreme court, and further.

providing that, on completion of the union station, two of the railroads should discontinue their old locations, was held to be a reasonable exercise of the power reserved by the legislature to alter, repeal, or amend the charters of the corporations. And this right to alter or amend was held absolute, and it was accordingly held immaterial whether or not the railroads consented to the act. As all the railroads concerned in Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. supra, had a terminus in the city, where they were ordered to unite in a union station, the court stated that it was unnecessary to consider the contention that the act implied a power in the legislature to require a railroad corporation to extend its track to the state line in any direction.

Power of legislature to authorize Commission to direct construction of union depots.

Generally as to delegation by legislature of power to regulate carriers, see note to State v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 639.

It has been held that an act providing that where two or more railroads reach a city or town it shall be the duty of the Railroad Commission to ascertain whether it is practicable and feasible for such rail-the case, in its judgment, require it, so as to make the statute unconstitutional.

Carrier — provision for union station — effect of receivership.

6. That a railroad company is in possession of receivers does not take it out of the operation of a statute providing that railroad companies may be required, under penalty, to construct and maintain union stations, although the order must be executed by the receivers, and the statute is not made expressly applicable to them, where, by statute, a railroad company includes any person operating a railroad.

Receiver — obeying state laws — constructing union depot.

7. A requirement under statutory authority that a union depot be constructed by several railroads, one of which is in possession of receivers, is within the operation of the Federal statute requiring receivers appointed by Federal courts to obey the valid laws of the states in which the property under their control is located.

Same — suit — previous leave of court — necessity.

8. Previous leave of court is not necessary to the maintenance of a mandamus proceeding to compel receivers of a railroad to obey an order requiring it to join with other roads in the construction and maintenance of a union depot, in view of the Federal statute providing that every receiver appointed by a Federal court may be sued in respect of any act or transaction of his in carrying on the business connected with the property in his care, without previous leave of court.

roads to use a union station, and that if the Commission finds, upon investigation, that it is practicable for them to join in the construction and use of such a station, to give notice, and after investigation and public hearing require them to construct and maintain such a station, but providing that it must appear to the Commission that the construction and maintenance of such a station is just and reasonable to the railroad companies, and demanded by the public interest,—does not delegate to the Commission power to enact a law requiring railroads to build union depots, but merely leaves to the Commission the determination of the existence of facts upon which the law becomes applicable. State v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 165 S. W. 491; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. State, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 192.

And such act is not invalid on the ground that it deprives the railroads of their property without due process of law, or that it denies them the equal protection of the law, since, before any action can be taken by the Commission after determining that it is practicable for the companies to use a joint station, it is made incumbent upon it to give notice to the companies, after which an investigation and public hearing follow. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. State, supra.

Carrier — union station — order fixing locality — definiteness.

9. An order of a Railroad Commission requiring the construction and maintenance of a union depot by several railroad companies is not invalid in not fixing the exact spot where it is to be located, if the general location is designated.

Same — plans and specifications — necessity of.

10. An order of a Railroad Commission requiring the construction of a union depot is not invalid because it does not furnish the plans and specifications.

A PPEAL by the Commission from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham sustaining a demurrer to a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to unite in the construction of a union passenger station. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Estes, Jones, & Welch, for appellant:

Acts in pari materia are to be construed and read together as one act.

Territory ex rel. Hawkins v. Wingfield, 2 Ariz. 305, 15 Pac. 139; People ex rel. Frick v. Jackson, 30 Cal. 427; Chandler v. Lee, 1 Idaho, 349; Nazareth Literary & Ben. Inst. v. Com. 14 B. Mon. 266.

And it has been held within the legislative power to enact a statute directing a Corporation Commission to require, when practicable and when the necessities of the case in the judgment of the Commission demand it, any two or more railroads entering a city or town to have a common or union station, and to unite in the joint expense of erecting, constructing, and maintaining such union station, and conferring the power of eminent domain on railroads ordered to construct such depots, but providing that the act should not be construed as authorizing the Commission to require the construction of union depots where the companies have separate depots which, in the opinion of the Commission, are adequate and convenient, and offer suitable accommodation for the traveling public. *Dewey v. Southern R. Co. 173 Ala. 231, 55 So. 531, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 685.

Receivers appointed by any United States court, or by the terms of the statutory laws of this state as to the regulation of transportation companies, are delivered into the hands and control of the Railroad Commission of the state; and as such, are bound to comply with all reasonable orders, regulations, and directions of the Railroad Commission.

and building of passenger and freight depots," and the legislature had passed statutes requiring railroads on the order of the Railroad Commission, to provide, construct, and maintain adequate depots, and also authorizing the Commission to order the construction and maintenance of union stations when necessary, the court said: "It may be that the Constitution does not in words mention a union depot or provide for the relocation of depots, but the right to locate means the right to relocate or change an existing location to meet the necessities or exigencies of business development, or changes in the tide and course of travel or business centers. The right to locate also carries the right to locate a passenger depot for different roads at the same place or point, if the public convenience requires it; the facilities required being in keeping with the financial ability of the road to maintain them, so that the same is not an unreasonable burden upon the railroads affected thereby. Certainly the statutes in question are not only sanctioned by the Constitution, but would no doubt be within the legislative province, if not expressly authorized by the Constitution, as the Constitution does not prohibit the exercise of police regulation over public carriers, and the legislature can do all things not prohibited by state or Federal Constitutions."

In Railroad Commission v. Alabama Northern R. Co. supra, it was held that a part of a section authorizing railroad commissioners to apportion the cost of erecting upon passenger stations between the different roads, and to compel a joint ownership of the property regardless of the wishes of the roads, might be stricken out as unconstitutional, and still leave the remainder of the section, authorizing the commissioners to require the erection of union depots when practicable, valid.

Powers of commissioners generally.

The legal presumption is that the orders of a board created for the purpose of carrying a law into execution are reasonable, and that they were made upon proper evidence and are valid; and it will accordingly be presumed that an order of a Railroad Commission directing several railroads to acquire a site and erect a union station is based on a finding by the Commission that the situation was such as to justify the making of the order. Railroad Commission v. Alabama Northern R. Co. 182 Ala. 357, 62 So. 749.

In determining the reasonableness of an order of the Railroad Commission requiring several railroads to construct a union station, the needs and accommodations of the public and the effect it will have upon the property rights of the railroads, while not the sole, are the paramount, questions for consideration. Ibid.

Statutes granting railroad commissioners power to require railroads to build union depots carry with them by implication every power necessary to the accomplishment of the object, including the power to select sites for union depots where the railroads fail or refuse to do so, and to make such changes in their lines and routes as are necessary to accomplish the purpose designed, etc. Dewey v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 142 N. C. 392, 55 S. E. 292; Griffin v. Southern R. Co. 150 N. C. 312, 64 S. E. 16; Missouri, O. & G. R. Co. v. State, 29 Okla. 640, 119 Pac. 117; State v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 105 S. W. 491.

In Railroad Commission v. Alabama Northern R. Co. 182 Ala. 357, 62 So. 749, it was held, under § 5543, of the Code of 1907, authorizing the commissioners to require railroads to maintain adequate depots and adequate buildings for the accommodation of passengers, that the commissioners had the power to designate the location of stations, and the right to say to different railroads entering a town that they should use the same point for their passenger stations, it being held that although union depots were not mentioned, yet the act authorized the Commission to require the maintenance of "adequate" depots, and depots not properly located would not be adequate.

In Dewey v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 142 N. C. 392, 55 S. E. 292, it was held that the position that the Commission was only empowered by statute to order the use of union stations when the railroads could connect on the right of way as already laid out was too restricted, and, the remedy was held to apply to all the towns and cities in the state where, in the legal discretion of the commissioners, the move was practicable, the convenience of the traveling public required it, and the existing facilities, in the judgment of the commissioners, were inadequate.

Under a statute conferring authority on the Railroad Commission to order and require the establishment of a union station, by railroads entering a city, they impliedly have the power to do everything reasonably necessary to execute the order.

Griffin v. Southern R. Co. 150 N. C. 312, 64 S. E. 16; Speed v. Cooke, 57 Ala. 209.

The question involved in North Carolina ex rel. Corporation Commission v. Seaboard Air Line & S. R. Co. 161 N. C. 270, was as to the admissibility of certain evidence. It appears in that case, however, that a statute was in force empowering the Corporation Commission to direct the establishment of union stations when practicable and the necessities of the case required it, and the court stated that railroads might be compelled to unite in erecting and maintaining such stations commensurate with the business and revenues of the companies, and on such terms as the Commission should prescribe, where the establishment of such a station was found practicable and necessary by the Commission.

The power of the Corporation Commission to designate the location of a union station which would do away with a former station was apparently recognized in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. State, 38 Okla. 401, 133 Pac. 35, subject, however, to its being reasonable. The location selected by the Commission in that case was held unreasonable on the ground that the evidence showed that it would increase the hazard to life and limb of employees and patrons of the railroad, the court holding that this was a paramount consideration in selecting a location.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. State, supra, it was held that the finding of the Commission that the old depot at the city in question was entirely inadequate, and that the population of the city, its importance as a business center, and the passenger business of the roads, and their receipts at that point, justified a union depot of the character required by the commission's order, was sustained by the evidence.

Under the common law it was not the duty of a common carrier to furnish depots for its patrons. Therefore, any laws which may be passed respecting the building of depots would be in derogation of the common law, and must be strictly construed.

Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 137 Ala. 439, 34 So. 401; Page v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 129 Ala. 232, 29 So. 676.

The right to use and occupy a depot which is already built is as much a property right as the title to the ground on which the depot is built; and any law which would deprive a railroad company of such railroad companies whose tracks enter Mobile to provide for the location and construction of a union passenger station, and giving the Railroad Commission power to order the exact location and construction of the union station, and prescribe the rules, charges, etc., upon which the companies should use it, in the event of their failure to agree, and further directing all railroads entering the city to stop their passenger trains at the union depot, it has been held that the only authority granted to the Commission was to order a union station to be constructed by all the railroads entering the city; and consequently that an order of the Commission placing the burden of sharing the expense of maintaining a union station constructed by a private company upon but three of the four railroads entering the city was invalid and a violation of the 14th Amendment. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 191 Fed. 757.

Effect of loss of old site.

It has been held that so long as a railroad Commission acted within the power conferred upon it by statute authorizing it to require two or more railroads entering a town to erect a union station when practicable, its orders in exercising the police power of the state were not violative of the provisions of the state or Federal Constitution relating to the taking of property without due process of law, although a railroad might lose the use of its old building, or the use of a lot as a location for its passenger depot, since it was held that the company acquired the lot and erected the building with full knowledge of, and subject to, the police power of the state. Railroad Commission v. Alabama Northern R. Co. supra.

In Missouri, O & G. R. Co. v. State, 29 Okla. 640, 119 Pac. 117, it was held that neither article 5 of the Constitution of the United States nor §§ 23 and 24 of the Constitution of Oklahoma, which deny the right of anyone to take private property for private or public use without just compensation, nor § 1 of article 14, which provides that no state shall make or enforce property without any compensation whatever would be unconstitutional and void, in that it would be denying the railroads the constitutional right of due process of law and the equal protection of the law.

The Railroad Commission has no authority to add anything to § 5545 of the Code, or to extend the provisions of that statute so as to make it cover things which the language of the statute itself does not cover.

any law denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law, were violated by an act of the legislature requiring railroads to make such physical connections, etc., as ordered by the Corporation Commission, and making it the duty of such Commission to investigate all complaints in reference to physical connections, and require railroads to establish and maintain union depots; nor by an order of the Commission, in pursuance of the power conferred upon it, requiring three railroads to unite in operating a union station at a specified point, where it appeared that the railroad company objecting to the validity of such order was incorporated under the laws of the state prior to the passage of the act. And this was held to be true although the railroad had acquired a right of way in the town, and certain citizens had agreed to give it a bonus of $10,000 to build a station on a site other than that designated for the location of the union station, and it had purchased the site so agreed upon, and although the order would compel the abandonment of its right of way and station grounds, and the running of the road through two elevators, and the grading of an additional roadbed, and necessitate a curve in its track so acute as to cause a delay in handling trains, all at a cost of not less than $50,000, which it appeared, however, would be partly compensated for by the fact that the expense of the company in maintaining its part of the union depot would be less than that of maintaining an independent depot. It was held that such act and the order in pursuance thereof were just and reasonable and valid, either as an exercise of the police power, or as a reasonable exercise of the reserve power of the legislature to amend or repeal the corporation's charter.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Not only would it be arbitrary and unreasonable to compel the defendants, or either of them, having adequate facilities the complainant operated a railroad over intervening states; that it had a passenger station in the city of Mobile, and operated through that city more passenger trains than the other three roads combined; that it was under contract to transport the mails; that much the greater number of passengers on its trains were through passengers, and there was little exchange of passengers between complainant and the other roads entering the city, due to the fact that the other roads terminated there; that the change would require it to diverge from its main line about 2,800 feet; that its trains would be required to operate over the lines of another company around curves, necessitating a delay of over 30 or 40 minutes, or it would be required, at an expense of $50,000, to build a track across the yards of another railroad, which would result in rendering the schedule uncertain.

In Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 109 Mass. 103, it was held no objection to an act directing several railroads to construct a union station that it required the railroads to extend their tracks, and to exercise the right of eminent domain, and incur additional expense.

Matters open to objection by railroads.

A railroad which is merely ordered to enter and use a union station after it is erected by another road cannot, in an action to enjoin the enforcement of the Commission's order, avail itself of an objection that a part of a street is included in the location selected, since this is a matter between the company ordered to construct the station and the public. Railroad Commission v. Alabama Northern R. Co. 182 Ala. 357, 62 So. 749.

Neither can a railroad complain that a statute is unconstitutional on the ground that it authorizes the Railroad Commission to require a joint ownership of union depots, where the Commission's order affecting it merely instructs it, together with for the transaction of its business and the accommodation of the traveling public in a city where the local revenues were small, to unite in the construction of a passenger station to be used jointly, but it would be in violation of the United States constitutional provision against deprivation of property without due process of law.

de Graffenried, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

We quote the following propositions which, in our opinion, exert a controlling influence upon the questions presented by this record:

A. "Whenever the validity of an act is challenged upon the ground that it is other companies, jointly or severally, to proceed to acquire a certain site for a union station, and, in the event of a failure to agree upon the purchase and erection of the station within a stated time, directing one of the roads, other than the complainant, to acquire the site and erect a station, and ordering the complainant company to enter and use such station on terms agreed upon between it and the constructing road, and in the event of their failure to reach an agreement, upon terms prescribed by the Commission, since the only thing imperative upon the complainant under the order is that it enter the station when one is completed. Ibid.

The court in this case, however, stated that they did not mean to hold that the Commission could not compel a joint construction and ownership of a union depot, but merely held that it was not necessary for them to determine the point. Ibid.

Miscellaneous.

Where an act directed four named railroads to unite in a union station, it was held unnecessary to give lessees or assignees of such roads, or others whose interests were merely subordinate, notice of the hearings by the Commission concerning the location of the station. Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. supra.

In North Carolina ex rel. Corporation Commission v. Seaboard Air Line & S. R. Co. 161 N. C. 270, 76 S. E. 554, in view of the statute governing appeals from the Corporation Commission, and providing that they should be tried under the same rules as are prescribed for the trial of other civil cases, it was held that on an appeal from a finding requiring the erection of a union depot, neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants were confined to the testimony submitted to the Commission, but that any competent evidence was admissible.

1. In this case the Railroad Commission made an order requiring the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company, and the Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad Company, and S. L. Schoonmaker and H. M. Atkinson, receivers of said Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad Company, to procure sufficient grounds within a certain specified territory in the city of Bessemer for a union passenger station for said railroads, and upon such ground to erect, within a given period, for the use of said roads, at said city, a union passenger station. The order was made on February 5, 1912, and required said parties to "proceed to the procurement of sufficient grounds within the boundaries above set out, and proceed with the construction of an adequate passenger station thereon, to be used jointly by the above set out railroad companies, and that work on the construction of said building shall commence within ninety (90) days, and shall be completed within six (6) months."

The above order of the Railroad Commission was made pursuant to § 5545 of the Code of 1907, which is as follows: "Any two or more railroads which enter any city or town may be required, when practicable, or when the necessities of the case in the judgment of the Railroad Commission demands it, to have and maintain one common or union passenger station for the security, accommodation, and convenience of the traveling public, and to unite in the joint undertaking and expense of erecting, constructing, and maintaining such union passenger station commensurate with the business and revenue of such railroad companies or corporations, on such terms, regulations, provisions, and conditions as the Railroad Commission may prescribe; and any company failing to comply with the orders of the Railroad Commission shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, for every six months in default, to be recovered by the state."

Under the above provision of the Code we presume that the Railroad Commission, before making the above order, informed itself as to the necessities of the situation, and we accept the order as tantamount to a declaration that the reasonable necessities of the traveling public demand a conveniently located union passenger station in the city of Bessemer, to be used by the named railroad companies for the reception and discharge of their passengers at that point, and that the building of such station will not amount to an unreasonable burden upon the railroad companies, taking into consideration the volume of their passenger business at that point and the cost, to the railroads, of such union passenger station. In other words, we accept, in the present state of the record, the making of the order by the Railroad Commission as a finding by the Railroad Commission that the situation at Bessemer is such as to justify the making of the order. See above subdivision E of this opinion, and the authorities there cited.

2. It is argued by the railroad companies that the above order is void because it does not appear from the order or the petition by mandamus that the companies have it within their power to comply with the order, in that it does not appear that they own or can obtain at reasonable figures sufficient land within the prescribed limits upon which to build the union passenger station.

Unless the contrary is clearly shown, we will presume not only that the place prescribed is suitable, but that sufficient ground can be obtained, either by private purchase, or by condemnation proceedings, at reasonable figures, for such station. Through the power of eminent domain which the law has conferred upon the railroad companies, they possess all the power which is necessary to acquire the needed lands at their fair value; and, under the present state of the record, we must presume that the Railroad Commission has placed no unreasonable burden upon the railroad companies in so far as the acquisition of the needed ground for the station is concerned. See above subdivision E of this opinion, and authorities cited.

3. It is also contended by the railroad companies that "the order of the Railroad Commission is void in that the order of the Railroad Commission requires each railroad company to abandon presently occupied depot facilities in the city of Bessemer, and to build, in conjunction with others, a union depot, whereas the act authorizing the Railroad Commission to require the construction of a union depot does not authorize the Commission to compel the abandonment of depot and depot facilities already erected and in use." This argument was, of course, applicable to the facts presented by the record in Railroad Commission v. Alabama Northern R. Co. 182 Ala. 357, 62 So. 749, but in that case this court held that it is competent, when the reasonable necessities of the public require it, and the needed improvement will not place an unreasonable burden upon the railroads, for the Railroad Commission to order two or more railroads maintaining separate passenger stations in the same city or town to unite in one passenger station. Conditions which a few years ago were amply sufficient to meet the public needs are now found to be altogether inadequate, and in this day, when quick transportation is a necessity, the public demands better and more convenient passenger stations than were formerly needed, and the statute which we have above quoted was passed to meet this new necessity of the public. It is out of respect to the reasonable public needs, and the power of the state to require those who serve the public to meet such reasonable needs, that statutes similar to the one now under consideration have in other states been held to be violative of no principle of constitutional law. Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 109 Mass. 103; North Carolina Corp. Commission v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 139 N. C. 126, 51 S. E. 793; Industrial Siding Case, 140 N. C. 239, 52 S. E. 941; Dewey v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 142 N. C. 392, 55 S. E. 292; Griffin v. Southern R. Co. 150 N. C. 312, 64 S. E. 16.

4. Authorized as we are, in this state of the record, to presume that the Railroad Commission, when it made the order complained of, had by personal investigation on the part of its members, and by other proper evidence, arrived at the just conclusion that the city of Bessemer has reached that stage in its growth and development when the public travel to and from that city renders the location and maintenance of a union passenger station at that point a not unreasonable burden upon the named railroads, and that the passenger stations of said railroads at said city are so located, with reference to each other that the necessities of the traveling public require that said railroads shall receive and discharge their passengers at the same point, the Railroad Commission, under the authority conferred upon it by the laws of this state, certainly had the authority to order said railroads to unite in one passenger station at said city. Railroad Commission v. Alabama Northern R. Co. supra.

It is not the policy of the state to place the safety and convenience of the traveling public solely within the arbitrary control of those who manage railroad companies, nor is it the policy of the state to place the manner in which railroads shall conduct themselves, in the conduct of their business, in the uncontrolled discretion or judgment of the Railroad Commission. When, however, the Railroad Commission makes an order which is within the purview of the powers which the legislature has conferred upon the Commission, when this body of men selected, presumably, for its intelligence and fitness, and charged by the law with the performance of its duties, makes an order in furtherance of the laws of the state which it is required to administer with equal justice to all interests, then, unless there is something on the face of the record, or evidence aliunde the record, showing the illegality or the unreasonableness or injustice of the order, the order will be upheld. See subdivision E of this opinion, and authorities there cited.

Under the opinion of this court in Railroad Commission v. Alabama Northern R. Co. supra, there is therefore but one question going to the validity of the order of the Commission, in the instant case, on constitutional grounds, left for our consideration, and that is whether so much of said § 5545 of the Code of 1907 as authorizes the Railroad Commission to require two or more railroads to jointly purchase or condemn lands for a union depot and to jointly erect a union depot thereon is within the power of the legislature.

The question as to whether the Railroad Commission can compel two or more railroads to jointly purchase or condemn lands needed for a union depot, and to construct thereon a union passenger station, was left, in the above case, an open one; but in that case there is an intimation that the court was inclined to the opinion that the Commission possessed such power, and that this court would probably so hold when the question was properly presented. In that case this court said: "We do not mean to hold, however, that any part of said § 5545 is unconstitutional, or that the Commission cannot compel a joint construction and ownership of a union depot," and cited, in that connection, the case of State ex rel. Railroad & W. Commission v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 80 Minn. 191, 89 Am. St. Rep. 514, 83 N. W. 60; s. c., 186 U. S. 257, 46 L. ed. 1151, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900. While the Supreme Court of the United States did not, in the above case, in terms determine this question, the entire argument of the court in that case, in support of the conclusions to which it actually arrived, is strongly persuasive that the court was of the opinion that the states possess the power which, in this case, the Railroad Commission has seen fit to exercise. In that case the court said: "It is insisted that it is beyond the constitutional power of the legislature to compel companies to enter into involuntary, unreasonable, and unprofitable contracts with other companies at the instance of third parties, or to fix terms and conditions upon which such contracts shall be performed. This argument in its various applications is one which has been addressed to and considered by this court in nearly every case in which the power of the state to regulate railway charges has been called in question, and the answer made to it in those cases is equally pertinent here. Indeed, it is impossible for the state to exercise this power of regulation without interfering to some extent with the power of a railway to contract either with its customers or connecting lines. The power is one which was said, in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, to have been customarily exercised in England from time immemorial, and in this country from its first colonization, for the regulation of ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, and innkeepers; and the whole object of this class of legislation is to curtail the power to contract by limiting the exactions of those engaged in these occupations, and providing that the rendition of such services shall not raise an implied promise to pay more than a certain fixed sum. This legislation may be justified by the fact that these various occupations are necessarily to a certain extent monopolistic in their nature, and that in dealing with customers the parties do not stand upon an equality; the latter being practically compelled to submit to such terms as the former may choose to exact, unless the state shall, acting in the interest of the public, elect to interfere and prescribe a maximum of charges."

The above opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States was delivered in a case which was appealed from the supreme court of Minnesota, and in this same case the supreme court of Minnesota said: "If the state is to have any voice, therefore, in the establishment of reasonable rates, it must have a voice in some degree and some manner in the business of the carrier. Where a single carrier is being dealt with, this can be accomplished by determining what the operating expenses ought reasonably to be; the reasonable value of the capital invested; what return, under all the circumstances of the case, would be fair; and then, by adjusting the rate, an economical management is secured. But in a case like the one at bar, where each may plead its inability to make the necessary agreement with the other, the state must have the power to arbitrate between them, and, within proper limitations, compel the acceptance of its award.' If the state is powerless to decide as between carriers, we have, as said by counsel for the Commission, the following absurdity, namely: '(a) The state may regulate rates; (b) the rate must be reasonable; (c) it must afford the carrier compensation over and above operating expenses; (d) the method of operating and consequent expenses is beyond the state control.' But this question has heretofore been considered and disposed of in this state adversely to defendant's contention, in Jacobson v. Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. 71 Minn. 519, 40 L.R.A. 389, 70 Am. St. Rep. 358, 74 N. W. 893, now in the United States Supreme Court on a writ of error. It was there held that the act of 1895 did not, under the facts of that case, contravene the Federal or the state Constitution when conferring upon the Commission the power to compel the transfer and interchange of loaded cars, and the making of joint rates for through shipments, where the haul was in part on one, and in part on the other, of two connecting roads. There are no facts here which take this case out of the operation of the rule thus established, and we must abide by it as perfectly legitimate, until the Federal court declares that an error has been committed. We hold, therefore, that Laws 1895, chap. 91, violates no provision of the state or Federal Constitution, and under it the Railroad and Warehouse Commission of this state has the power to compel the enforcement of joint through rates between points within this state by the connecting carriers affected by the order." State ex rel. Railroad & W. Commission v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 80 Minn. 191, 196, 197, 89 Am. St. Rep. 514, 83 N. W. 60, 62. See further, on this subject, Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. v. Jacobson, 179 U. S. 287, 45 L. ed. 194, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 115; Jacobson v. Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. supra.

On the 5th day of September, 1903, the legislature passed an act (Local Acts 1903, p. 771) entitled, "An Act to Locate and Require the Railroad Companies Whose Railroads Enter the City of Mobile to Provide for the Construction of an Union Passenger Depot," etc. The act required the railroad companies, whose tracks enter the city of Mobile, to provide for the location and construction of a union passenger station in said city, and to commence work thereon within eight months. The act also authorized said railroad companies or any one or more of them to condemn to public use all lands necessary to the construction of said depot, and also all lands needed for rights of way into and out of said depot. It also lodged in the Railroad Commission full authority to enforce the provisions of the act. The act clearly contemplated that, if the railroad companies did not themselves, by a voluntary, joint arrangement, acquire the needed lands and construct the station, the Railroad Commission should have the authority to require such railroad companies, if that was necessary, to jointly purchase, or, by condemnation proceedings, to jointly acquire, the needed lands, and to jointly construct the station in accordance L.R.A.1915D.

with the plans and specifications to be furnished by such Commission. Speaking of this act, Jones, District Judge, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission (C. C.) 191 Fed. 757, said: "The general right of a state to compel railroads entering a city or town to receive and deliver passengers at a union or common depot very properly is not questioned in this case. The state may so direct by a statute giving specific regulations covering the whole matter, or leave the question and its details to the determination of an administrative body or commission." In another place in the opinion in this case, Judge Jones says: "The right which the state undertakes to exercise in the present case is its inherent right to regulate public carriers for the promotion of the public convenience." Of course the power to which we refer must be, taking into consideration the necessities of the situation and the public interests to be subserved, reasonably exercised, but the state possesses, under the state and Federal Constitutions, all needed authority to so regulate public service corporations as to meet all the reasonable requirements of public convenience. Ibid.

It would, however, create a strange anomaly for the courts to hold that a state has the authority to require all railroad companies operating railroads within a city, whenever the reasonable needs of the traveling public are such as to demand a union passenger station at that point, to use a union passenger station in said city, and at the same time deny to the state the power to require such companies to jointly acquire, by purchase or by condemnation proceedings, sufficient land upon which to maintain the building and to jointly construct the necessary building. The two positions are inconsistent and cannot co-exist. If the state has the power to which we have referred, and that power seems to be conceded, then it has the corresponding authority to put that power into exercise. In fact, we conceive of no more equitable basis for the apportionment of the expense in the construction of such a building and in the acquirement of sufficient lands therefor than the apportionment of the total cost among the railroad companies, based upon the relative amount of the passenger traffic of each respective railroad company at the particular point. Such an apportionment treats each railroad company with exact fairness and determines the exact extent of the ownership of each railroad in the joint property. Neither are we able to discover a fairer basis for the apportionment of the cost of maintaining such a station than that which is fixed by the actual amount of the yearly use, by each.

It seems to us, therefore, that the legislature had the constitutional power to vest in the Railroad Commission the authority which it conferred upon it in the above-quoted § 5545 of the Code of 1907, and that no part of said section is violative of any clause of the state or Federal Constitution. State v. McCarty, 5 Ala. 212, 59 So. 543; Whaley v. State, 168 Ala. 152, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 499, 52 So. 941; Ingram v. State, 39 Ala. 247, 84 Am. Dec. 782; Dorman v. Railroad Commission,—supra.

Said § 5545, it is true, says the Commission, shall possess the authority to make such order "when practicable or when the necessities of the case in the judgment of the Railroad Commission demands it." The words which we have italicized in the quoted portion of § 5545 must be read in the light of the decisions of this court which existed at the time the statute was enacted; and, when so read, those words do not place the matter of making such orders within the arbitrary and uncontrollable judgment of the Commission. Those words, when so read, require that the judgment of the Commission shall be reasonable, and when so read offend no provision of the state or Federal Constitution. When such an order is made, however, the presumption is that the order was reasonable unless the contrary is shown either by the record itself or by evidence aliunde. Authorities, supra.

5. In the present case the order of the Railroad Commission was as follows: "In the above cause, the defendant railroads, having failed to report to the Commission of any agreement as to location or the proportionate cost to each for such location, or for the cost of construction, operation, and maintenance thereof, as provided in a supplemental order of this Commission, dated October 2, 1911, the Commission of this date, after having given notice to the defendant railroads, proceeded to fix the location of said station, and apportion the proportionate cost to each defendant railroad in the location and construction of the building, and the operation and maintenance thereof, as follows: The location of said station to be between Alabama avenue and Second avenue, and Nineteenth street and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. The proportionate part of each, in cost of site and construction, shall be proportioned to the receipts of each from passenger business, based upon passenger receipts for the past twelve months. The proportionate cost of operation and maintenance shall be on a wheelage basis. Therefore it is hereby ordered that the said Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, the Southern Railway Company, the Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad Company, and S. L. Schoonmaker and H. M. Atkinson, receivers, or either of them, proceed to the procurement of sufficient grounds within the boundaries above set out, and proceed with the construction of an adequate passenger station thereon, to be used jointly by the above set out railroad companies, and that work on the construction of said building shall commence within ninety (90) days, and shall be completed within six (6) months."

Schoonmaker and Atkinson are the receivers of the Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad Company, and we direct attention to the fact that said Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad Company is made a party to this proceeding as well as its said receivers. The first section of the above-quoted order shows plainly that this proceeding was directed against "the defendant railroads," and that Schoonmaker and Atkinson were brought into the case simply because of their relation to one of the defendant railroad companies as its receivers. The order which we have quoted was made because "the defendant railroads, having failed to report to the Commission of any agreement as to location or the proportionate cost to each for such location, or for the cost of construction, operation, and maintenance thereof," and for no other reason. In other words, this entire proceeding, from its inception, shows that the Railroad Commission had in mind, at all times, and was proceeding against, at all times, the railroads which maintain depots for the reception and discharge of passengers at Bessemer, and that the names of Schoonmaker and Atkinson, as receivers, were brought into this proceeding because it is through them, as such receivers, that the particular railroad is now being operated. We deem it well, also, at this point to say that the words "or either of them," which we have italicized in the above-quoted order, where they appear, evidently refer to Schoonmaker and Atkinson only. The order, as we understand it, is an order operating jointly upon all the railroad companies, and the words "and S. L. Schoonmaker and H. M. Atkinson, receivers, or either of them," simply mean that the Railroad Commission ordered that Schoonmaker and Atkinson, or either one of them, should, on the part of the railroad of which they were the receivers, comply with the order.

It is contended by appellees, and in this contention they seem to have been upheld by the court below, that said § 5545 of the Code is highly penal, and that, as said § 5545 does not in terms include receivers of railroads within its provisions, the order requiring the Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad Company and Atkinson and Schoonmaker, its receivers, to join in the acquisition of the land needed for the station, and to join in the construction of the union passenger station, is void, and that therefore the order of the Commission requiring the construction of the station by appellees is altogether invalid.

In order that the contention of appellees on this subject may be well understood, we quote the following from one of the briefs of counsel for appellees: "This order of the Railroad Commission attempts to put this burden upon the receivers of the Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad, regardless of the statute, and absolutely ignoring the words and terms of the statute. This statute cannot be extended or stretched by the Railroad Commission of the state, or by the courts of the state, so as to include the receivers in the order. In fact, the very principle for which we contend, in this case, on this point, has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. United States v. Harris, 177 U. S. 305, 44 L. ed. 780, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609. In that case the court had under consideration the construction of §§ 4386-4388, and 4389 of the Revised Statutes. These statutes impose certain penalties upon any company, owner, or custodian of cattle who fails to feed, water, and rest the cattle as provided by the statutes. The question arose as to whether or not the statutes included receivers. Receivers are not mentioned in the statutes, and the court held that inasmuch as the statutes are penal, and receivers are not specially mentioned, the courts could not stretch the statutes and by implication include receivers. This case is a very thorough discussion of the subject and quotes at some length from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 5 L. ed. 37."

The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Harris, above cited, expresses the views of this court as to the manner in which penal statutes should be construed. In that case the court held, and we think properly, that a receiver could not be held to the payment of a penalty under the terms of an act which provided, for its violation, only a penalty against a railroad company. The court, however, pointed out that the construction which was placed upon the act did not defeat the purpose of the act, even when a railroad is in the hands of a receiver, for, said the court, "it does not, therefore, follow that the statute in question would be without operation where railroads are in the hands of receivers. The owners and custodians of the stock would still remain subject to the punishment prescribed." In concluding its opinion in said case, the court reaffirmed, as the true rule which should always govern the construction of penal statutes, the following, taken from the language of Chief Justice Marshall in United States v. Wiltberger, supra: "The rule that penal laws are to be construed strictly is perhaps not much less old than construction itself. It is founded on the tenderness of the law for the rights of individuals; and on the plain principle that the power of punishment is vested in the legislative, not in the judicial, department. It is the legislature, not the court, which is to define a crime and ordain its punishment. It is said that, notwithstanding this rule, the intention of the lawmaker must govern in the construction of penal as well as other statutes. . . . But this is not a new, independent rule which subverts the old. It is a modification of the ancient maxim and amounts to this: That, though penal laws are to be construed strictly, they are not to be construed so strictly, as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. The maxim is not to be so applied as to narrow the words of the statute to the exclusion of cases which those words, in their ordinary acceptance, or in that sense in which the legislature has obviously used them, would comprehend. The intention of the legislature is to be collected from the words they employ. Where there is no ambiguity in the words, there is no room for construction.

The case must be a strong one, indeed, which would justify a court in departing from the plain meaning of words, especially in a penal act, in search of an intention which the words themselves did not suggest."

The rule in this state is that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, but not so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. Reese v. State, 73 Ala. 18; Scott v. State, 152 Ala. 63, 44 So. 544. The plainly indicated intention of the legislature, in passing that part of the act approved February 23, 1907 (Gen. Acts 1907, pp. 117-129, inclusive), and which is now § 5545 of the Code, is expressed in its first few lines as follows: "Any two or more railroads which enter any city or town may be required, when practicable, or when the necessities of the case in the judgment of the Railroad Commission demands it, to have and maintain one common or union passenger station for the security, accommodation, and convenience of the traveling public." We direct attention also to the fact that said § 5545 is a section included in chapter 129 of the Code of 1907, and § 5507 of the Code, which is also a part of the same chapter, provides that "unless clearly otherwise apparent from the context, the term 'railroad company' as used in this chapter, includes any person or corporation owning or operating a railroad." It seems clear, therefore, that not only does § 5545 of the Code show, by its very terms, the legislative purpose, but also when read in connection with said § 5507, the language of which we have quoted and in places italicized, that receivers of railroad companies are brought directly within the letter of said § 5545. Acts which are in pari materia must be read and construed together, and § 5545 of the Code, read and construed in connection with said § 5507 of the Code, clearly embraces, within its terms, in truth, within its letter, the receivers of railroad companies as well as railroad corporations or companies not in the hands of receivers. Powell v. Sherwood, 162 Mo. 605, 63 S. W. 485; Peirce v. Van Dusen, 69 L.R.A. 705, 24 C. C. A. 280, 47 U. S. App. 339, 78 Fed. 693.

In fact, the above interpretation of said § 5545 of the Code appears to be the only one which can be reasonably given to it. As was said by Harlan, Circuit Judge, in Peirce v. Van Dusen, supra, in an opinion which was concurred in by Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges: "The appointment of a receiver of a railroad does not change the title to the property nor work a dissolution of the corporation. Although the creature of the court, and acting under its orders, the receiver, for most purposes, stands in the place of the corporation, exercising its general powers, asserting its rights, controlling its property, carrying out the objects for which it was created, discharging the public duties resting upon it, and representing the interests as well of those who own the railroad as of those who have claims against the corporation or its property. The corporation remains in existence notwithstanding a provisional receivership established by an order of court; and for the purpose of effectuating the will of the state, as manifested by the act of 1890, an action against the receiver, arising out of his management of the property, may be regarded as one against the corporation 'in the hands of' or 'in the possession of' the receiver." See further, on this subject, Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 12; Hornaby v. Eddy, 5 C. C. A. 560, 12 U. S. App. 404, 56 Fed. 461; Indianapolis, C. & L. R. Co. v. Ray, 51 Ind. 269.

6. Section 5545 of the Code of 1907 is therefore, in our opinion, in all of its parts a valid general law of this state, and is operative upon all railroad companies, whether those companies are in the hands of receivers or not. As the legislature cannot remain in continuous session and thus determine for itself when that section shall become operative in our various cities and towns, it has, under the legal limitations to which we have above referred, conferred that power upon the Railroad Commission, which, in the administration of this law, is an arm of the state government. The authority of the Railroad Commission does not extend to the making of a law for the city of Bessemer, but it does validly extend to the determination of the question as to when an already existing law shall go into operation at that particular point. Whaley v. State, 108 Ala. 152, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 499, 52 So. 941; State v. McCarty, 5 Ala. App. 212, 59 So. 543; Locke's Appeal, 72 Pa. 491, 13 Am. Rep. 716; Isenhour v. State, 157 Ind. 517, 87 Am. St. Rep. 228, 62 N. E. 40; Pierce v. Doolittle, 130 Iowa, 333, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 143, 106 N. W. 751.

Conceding, therefore, as upon this appeal we must, that the order of the Railroad Commission to the appellees to build a union passenger station at Bessemer was based upon a proper finding of fact and that it was regularly made, then, when that order was made, said § 5545 of the Code went into operation at Bessemer and became as much the law of this state as applied to the city of Bessemer as if, by a special act, the legislature of Alabama had passed a valid special local law requiring a union passenger station to be built at Bessemer by all of the railroads entering that city. Authorities above cited. It is not merely by virtue of the will of the Railroad Commission that a union passenger station must be built at Bessemer, "but because of the legislative will duly expressed in a statute evidencing that will." Said § 5545 of the Code of 1907 has therefore, in the manner provided by the legislature, been placed in operation at the city of Bessemer, and said section is a general law of this state. It is the duty of all persons who receive protection at the hands of the law to obey it. Recognizing the binding necessity of this truism, the Congress of the United States has expressly declared that "whenever, in any cause pending in any court of the United States, there shall be a receiver or manager in possession of any property, such receiver or manager shall manage and operate such property, according to the requirements of the valid laws of the state in which such property shall be situated, in the same manner that the owner or possessor thereof would be bound to do if in possession thereof." 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. p. 386, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 1047. If, therefore, the receivers of the Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad Company are acting under the appointment and supervision of a Federal court, they are bound, under the express mandates of a Federal statute which provides a penalty for its nonobservance, to obey the valid laws of this state. In fact, we discard from consideration the suggestion that any court would even permit one of its servants or officers, over whose acts it has plenary control, to merely neglect to obey, much less to openly violate, the terms of a valid law.

The courts of this union, state and Federal, have one common purpose in view, viz., the due, open, honest, and impartial administration of the law, and there can be no conflict when the law itself is plain. Felton v. Ackerman, 9 C. C. A. 457, 22 U. S. App. 154, 61 Fed. 228.

7. This proceeding in no way involves the actual custody or control of the receivers of the Atlanta, Birmingham, & Atlantic Railroad Company over the property of said railroad company. It undertakes to take no property from them whatsoever. It simply undertakes to compel the receivers, in their operation of the railroad of which they are receivers, to obey a valid law of this state. The Congress of the United States has declared that "every receiver or manager of any property, appointed by any court of the United States, may be sued in respect of any act or transaction of his in carrying on the business connected with such property, without the L.R.A.1915D.

previous leave of the court in which such receiver or manager was appointed" (see Fed. Stat. Anno. vol. 4, p. 387, and authorities cited in the notes to that section); and under this section it is generally held that previous leave of the court in which the receiver was appointed, to sue a receiver, is necessary only when the suit involves the actual custody or control by the receiver of the property, or a part of the property, of which he is in possession or control as such receiver. High, Receivers, 4th ed. p. 542, § 395b.

The appellees, in support of their contention that the application for the writ of mandamus in this case is defective because of its failure to allege that previous leave of the court in which the receiver was appointed, to the institution of this suit, was obtained, refer us to the cases of Morse v. Tackaberry, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 273, which was a suit for the recovery of land from a receiver; Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Pennefather, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 126 S. W. 951, which was a suit upon a cause of action which arose before the receiver was appointed; Bennett v. Northern P. R. Co. 17 Wash. 534, 50 Pac. 496, which was an action to quiet the title to lands; Smith v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 151 Mo. 397, 48 L.R.A. 368, 52 S. W. 378, which was a suit upon a cause of action which arose before the appointment of the receiver; McNulta v. Lochridge, 141 U. S. 327, 35 L. ed. 796, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 11, in which it was determined that a receiver was suable on a cause of action which arose through the act of a prior receiver; Buckhannon & N. R. Co. v. Davis, 68 C. C. A. 345, 135 Fed. 707, in which the court held that lands in the hands of a receiver could not be condemned without leave of the court in which the receiver was appointed; Central Trust Co. v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. (C. C.) 59 Fed. 523, and to Central Trust Co. v. Third Ave. R. Co. (C. C.) 181 Fed. 282, in which cases it was held that funds in the hands of a receiver could not be reached by process of garnishment without leave of the court in which the receiver was appointed. An extensive examination of those cases and of other authorities referred to by appellees in their briefs convinces us that they have no applicability to the instant case. The present suit was instituted for the purpose of compelling receivers, in the administration of the affairs of a corporation in this state, to obey laws which they are neglecting to obey, and for which neglect they are liable to a penalty. In the case of Ft. Dodge v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 87 Iowa, 389, 54 N. W. 243, the supreme court of Iowa, by a writ of mandamus, required the receivers of a railway company to construct a street crossing over its tracks, and on that subject said: "It may be conceded that all the property of the company in the hands of the receiver, including the revenues derived from its use, is held in trust for the benefit of the creditors of the company. But it does not follow that they can control the expenditures of money and the use of the property in all cases. It is for the general benefit of all the parties in interest that the railway of the company be operated, and that its tracks and appurtenances be kept in a proper condition for that purpose."

This proceeding, in so far as the insolvent railroad company is concerned, as already stated, grows out of the neglect of its receivers to obey one of the general laws of this state, which law has become operative in the city of Bessemer by virtue of the order of the Railroad Commission. For their neglect or refusal to obey or carry out the terms of this law, these receivers, or the railroad company of which they are receivers, are liable to a penalty fixed by the act. For the collection of this penalty, undoubtedly an action, without first obtaining leave of the court in which the receivers were appointed, would lie. High on Receivers, 4th ed. p. 542, § 395b, and authorities cited. And as this proceeding is to confer action on the part of the receivers in a matter growing out of their management of the property as receivers, and required of them by the law of this state, we can see no reason why the above-quoted Federal statute does not apply to this case. High, Receivers, 4th ed. supra.

The above Federal act authorizing suits against receivers without the leave of the court in which they were appointed provides that such suits "shall be subject to the general equity jurisdiction of the court in which such receiver or manager was appointed, so far as the same shall be necessary to the ends of justice;" and, as this is true, the act, being remedial in its nature and at the same time preserving in the court in which the receivers were appointed that general equity jurisdiction over all suits brought against them "necessary to the ends of justice," should be given, not a narrow, but a liberal, interpretation in order that the purpose of Congress, in passing the act, may be given effect. The real purpose of the act is shown by § 2 thereof, which in effect places all receivers of corporations, who are appointed in Federal courts, and all such corporations, upon the same footing with reference to valid state laws as similar corporations not in the hands of receivers; subject, however, at all times, to "the general equity jurisdiction of the court in which such receiver or manager was appointed, so far as the same shall be necessary to the ends of justice." In other words, the purpose of Congress in passing the act was to advance the remedy for the enforcement of a right, and the act should receive an interpretation at the hands of the court as liberal as was the purpose of Congress when it passed the act. A remedial statute is entitled to receive an enlightened and liberal construction.

8. We are not inclined to the view that the order under consideration is void because it does not fix the exact spot upon which the station is to be built. The territory within which the station is to be located is fixed with definiteness, and the appellees should not complain because they are allowed reasonable latitude as to the exact spot upon which the station is to be located. It seems to us, that the order, with sufficient definiteness, apportions the cost of the proposed station among the various railroads. The books of the various railroads necessarily show the amount of the passenger business of each railroad at Bessemer during the twelve months next preceding the date of the order.

Neither are we of the opinion that the order is invalid or not final because of its failure to require the building to be erected according to plans and specifications furnished by the Commission. The order requires the appellees to build an "adequate passenger station," and, when that order is met, the appellees will have complied with the letter of the order. The appellees, managed as they are by practical railroad men, know how many passenger trains enter and leave Bessemer each day, and they can, when they proceed to comply with the order, be presumed to know how to construct a passenger station sufficient to meet the requirements of the order. The mere fact that the order has left certain details, in complying with the terms of the order, to the reasonable discretion of appellees, should in no way affect the validity of the positive command that appellees construct, for their joint use, an adequate union passenger station at Bessemer.

It follows from what we have above said that we are of the opinion that the petition of appellant was not subject to the demurrer which was interposed to it by the appellees. The judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded to the court below for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views above expressed.

Petition for rehearing denied December 18, 1913.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

DENVER & RIO GRANDE RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MARY M. DOYLE.

(— Colo. — 145 Pac. 688.)

Carrier — loss of baggage — delay in claiming — inability to procure sleeping car accommodations.

A passenger who does not claim his baggage at destination until forty-eight hours after its arrival cannot hold the carrier liable as insurer for loss of the baggage twenty-four hours before by burglary, although he failed to reach destination earlier because of inability to procure sleeping car accommodations, if he did not notify the carrier that he would not accompany the baggage.

(January 4, 1915.)

ERROR to the Mesa County Court to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure of defendant to deliver a suit case when called for, which was received by it as baggage for transportation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. N. Clark and G. P. Steele, for plaintiff in error:

A passenger should demand his baggage within a reasonable time after it has arrived at destination; failing in that, the liability of the carrier as an insurer changes to that of a warehouseman, and negligence on its part must be shown.

Mr. R. G. Lucas also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Henry R. Rhone and J. H. Burkhardt for defendant in error.

Garrigues, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action for damages is on account of the failure of the railroad company to produce and deliver a suit case when it was called for, which it, as a common carrier, had received as baggage for transportation.

1. The facts are admitted, and there is no conflict in the testimony. Mary M. Doyle came to Denver August 9, 1911, from her home in Clifton, Colorado, where she had purchased a round-trip ticket over the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad. She started to return on the evening of the 14th, and upon arriving at the Union Depot first checked her suit case to Clifton, and then went to the Pullman office to secure a sleeper berth, which she was unable to do, for the reason that they were all sold. Feeling that she was physically unable to travel at night without Pullman accommodations, she remained in Denver without informing the company that she did not intend to travel on the same train with her baggage, and the next morning, the 15th, went to Colorado Springs, where she endeavored to secure a berth on the night train, and was again informed that they were all sold. She remained at Colorado Springs until the morning of the 16th, secured a sleeper, and left that night, arriving at Clifton on the afternoon of the 17th, where she called for her baggage, which the company failed to deliver, and later she was informed by the agent that the depot had been burglarized the night before and her suit case stolen. In the court below, plaintiff tried the case upon the theory that under these facts the company was accountable as a common carrier and insurer of the baggage, without proof of negligence, and rested without attempting to prove negligence. Defendant then interposed a motion for a nonsuit upon the ground that it was not liable as an insurer or common carrier; that it was only accountable to the plaintiff as a bailee or warehouseman, and, no negligence having been shown, plaintiff could not recover. This motion was overruled. Defendant then introduced its evidence from which it appeared that Clifton was a small day station, the agent remaining on duty from 8 A. M. to 8 P. M.; that the suit case in question arrived on the afternoon of the 15th, and, being unclaimed, it was stored in the baggage room used for that purpose; that on the night of the 16th the depot was burglarized and the suit case, with other property, stolen; that the depot was a substantial building with doors and windows equipped with ordinary locks and fastenings; that when the agent left at 8 o'clock on the night of the 16th, the doors and windows were securely locked and fastened; that the next morning it was discovered that an entrance had been forced through a window and the building burglarized.

The court, in its instructions, after stating the issues, told the jury that they should determine from the evidence and circumstances whether plaintiff called for her baggage within a reasonable time after it arrived at Clifton; that what constituted a reasonable time for her to remove it after it arrived was a question of fact which should be determined by the jury; and in that connection that they might consider whether her failure to demand her baggage sooner was because of the inability or failure of the company to furnish her proper and suitable accommodations for travel, considering her state of health at the time; that the liability of the company terminated as a common carrier after her baggage arrived at Clifton and a reasonable time had elapsed to remove it; that if she failed to remove her suit case after a reasonable time after it arrived, the liability of the company shifted or changed from that of a common carrier to that of a warehouseman; that as a warehouseman, the company was only bound to use that degree of care and attention which a man of ordinary prudence and diligence would use in reference to the goods, under the circumstances, if they were his own; and if the company used such reasonable diligence in storing and caring for the goods, it would not be liable in case of loss by burglary; L.R.A.1915D.

that as a warehouseman, it was its duty to store the baggage in a room reasonably safe and secure, used for that purpose; that where a railroad company places uncalled-for baggage in its storeroom where it is its custom to place uncalled-for baggage, and such room appears to be reasonably secure for its safekeeping, the railroad company will not be liable unless guilty of negligence which caused the loss; and if they found for plaintiff, the measure of damages would be the value, for use by the plaintiff, of the property lost, at the time and place of its loss, together with legal interest thereon from that date, all damages having been waived except those coming within the above rule.

2. The undisputed testimony shows: August 14, 1911, plaintiff, at the Denver Union Depot, checked her suit case to Clifton, where it arrived August 15th, at 1:45 P. M.; it was uncalled for on its arrival, and the agent placed it in the baggage room of the depot; during the night of August 16th, the depot was burglarized, and the suit case, with other articles, stolen; August 17th plaintiff arrived at Clifton at 1:10 P. M., and called for the baggage, which the company failed to deliver, because it had been stolen; that the station was a substantial building, and no negligence was shown in caring for the baggage, which occasioned its loss. Plaintiff tried the case upon the theory of the company's liability as a common carrier and insurer. The theory of the defendant was that its liability as a common carrier terminated long before plaintiff called for the baggage, and had changed or shifted to that of a bailee or warehouseman before the property was stolen, and that it was only liable as a warehouseman upon proof of negligence which caused the loss.

3. Plaintiff's railroad fare covered transportation for herself and baggage to Clifton, and ordinarily it is presumed that baggage and passenger will go by the same train, and that the baggage will be called for within a reasonable time after the arrival at its destination. Marshall v. Pontiac, O. & N. R. Co. 126 Mich. 45, 55 L.R.A. 650, 85 N. W. 242; Blumenthal v. Maine C. R. Co. 79 Me. 550, 11 Atl. 605; Wilson v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 56 Me. 60, 96 Am. Dec. 435.

4. While the company had charge of the baggage as a common carrier, it was an insurer of the property, and must pay for its value if it failed to deliver it while held in this capacity.

It was the duty of the company to have the baggage ready for delivery within a reasonable time after it reached its destination, and it was the duty of the plaintiff to take it away within a reasonable time. If the baggage remained uncalled for, it was the duty of the defendant to store it in the baggage room at the station or in some other suitable place, and if plaintiff failed to take it away within a reasonable time after its arrival, the liability of the company as a common carrier and insurer changed or shifted to that of a bailee or warehouseman. It then held the property in storage; its liability as an insurer or common carrier no longer existed, and in case of its loss, plaintiff could only recover against the company as a warehouseman, upon proof that its negligence caused the loss. 4 Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 1659; 3 Hutchinson, Carr. 3d ed. §§ 1285 et seq.; 2 Redf. Railroads, § 171; 6 Cyc. 672.

5. A reasonable time means sufficient time within reason to remove baggage after it, not the passenger, arrives. Where the facts are not disputed, what constitutes a reasonable time for a passenger to remove his baggage after arriving at its destination is a question of law which the court must determine. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Peterson, 30 Colo. 77-87, 97 Am. St. Rep. 76, 69 Pac. 578; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Boyce, 73 Ill. 510, 24 Am. Rep. 268; Schnitzmeyer v. Illinois C. R. Co. 147 Ill. App. 101; Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Patten, 3 Kan. App. 338, 45 Pac. 108; Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Mahan, 8 Bush, 184; Graves v. Fitchburg R. Co. 29 App. Div. 591, 51 N. Y. Supp. 636; Ouimit v. Henshaw, 35 Vt. 605, 84 Am. Dec. 646; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Addisoat, 17 Ill. App. 632; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Smith, 81 Tex. 479, 17 S. W. 133; Kahn v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. 115 N. C. 638, 20 S. E. 169; George F. Ditman Boot & Shoe Co. v. Keokuk & W. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 416, 51 Am. St. Rep. 352, 59 N. W. 257.

6. The court left the jury to determine from all the admitted facts and circumstances whether plaintiff called for her baggage within a reasonable time, and whether the liability of the company had shifted from that of a common carrier to that of a warehouseman. This was error. Plaintiff's baggage arrived at 1:45 P. M., on the 15th, and remained in the baggage room until the night of the 16th without being called for, and it was the duty of the court to have held, as a matter of law, that the baggage was not demanded within a reasonable time after it arrived.

Plaintiff could not recover against the company as a common carrier or insurer of the baggage as a matter of law. She did not demand or take it away within a reasonable time after it arrived, and she could not recover against the company as a warehouseman, because there was no proof of negligence.

7. Plaintiff attempted to show, as a special circumstance excusing her from removing the baggage on the afternoon of the day it arrived, that she endeavored to, but could not, get a sleeper until the night of the 16th, and did not feel able to travel without one. In this way she sought to extend the reasonable time to remove the baggage after it arrived at Clifton. If plaintiff had used ordinary care, thoughtfulness, and prudence, it must have occurred to her that if she waited until a few minutes before train time, she might have difficulty, at that season of the year, in securing a berth. Without making any inquiry or knowing whether or not she could procure a berth, she first went to the baggage room and checked her suit case, expecting and intending to take the same train upon which it would go. Learning, upon inquiry, that she could not get a berth, she decided not to take that train, but to wait until she could secure sleeper accommodations. She allowed her baggage to go on, and it reached its destination two days in advance of her arrival, when she could easily have checked it for the train on which she was to travel. Under such circumstances, all the company could do was to store it in its baggage room on its arrival. There was no delinquency on the part of the company in transporting either plaintiff or her baggage which would excuse her for not calling for and removing it without delay upon its arrival, or which would extend the reasonable time for its removal after it arrived. It was the fault of the passenger that the baggage was not called for and delivered upon its arrival.

By motion for a nonsuit, by requested instructions, by a request for a directed verdict, and by motion for a new trial, the court was given ample opportunity to have disposed of the case according to law. It not having done so, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the action.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

E. H. JENNINGS, Respt.,

v.

IDAHO RAILWAY, LIGHT, & POWER COMPANY et al., Appts.

(26 Idaho, 703, 146 Pac. 101.)

Attachment — foreign corporation — effect of compliance with local laws.
A statute giving foreign corporations which comply with the local laws all the rights and privileges of like domestic corporations, and subjecting them to the laws of the state applicable to like domestic corporations, does not exempt them from the operation of the statute authorizing an attachment in actions against defendants not residing in the state.

(January 20, 1915.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Ada County refusing to dissolve an attachment alleged to have been improperly issued on certain property of the defendant railway company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cavanah, Blake, & MacLane, for appellants:

No attachment can be issued against a domestic corporation in an action on a secured debt, and therefore, if foreign corporations have the same rights and privileges, and are subject to like laws, no attachment can be issued against them in such cases.

Messrs. Richards & Haga and McKeen F. Morrow, for respondent:

The domicile, residence, and citizenship of a corporation are in the state where it is created, and, where the corporation is not domesticated, it can have but one domicile, one residence, and one citizenship, and that is in the state issuing its charter and maintaining supervision and control over the corporation.

App. 70, 101 Pac. 41; Note to Stonega Coke & Coal Co. v. Southern Steel Co. 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 278.

Budge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 6th of November, 1911, the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Maine, made, executed, and delivered its promissory note to one E. H. Jennings for $180,000, payable two years after date, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from July 6, 1912. In order to secure the payment of the above obligation, the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company deposited with the said Jennings as collateral security 1,200 shares of the preferred stock and 2,884 shares of the common stock of the Boise Railroad Company, Limited. After the loan had been negotiated and the stock of the Boise Railroad Company pledged, as aforesaid, the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company, being then the owner of all of the stock of the Boise Railroad Company, elected its employees or officers as directors and officers of the Boise Railroad Company, and immediately thereafter caused said officers to convey by proper con-

Note. — Liability of foreign corporation which has complied with conditions of doing business in state to attachment as nonresident.

The earlier cases upon the above question are gathered in the note accompanying Stonega Coke & Coal Co. v. Southern Steel Co. 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 278, and the present note includes only the decisions since the writing of that note.

In Burr v. Co-operative Constr. Co. 162 Ill. App. 512, under an attachment act making nonresidence, and not noncitizenship, the ground of attachment, it was held that a foreign corporation licensed to do business in the state was a resident, and not a nonresident, within the meaning of the act. The court stated that it agreed with the court in Hackettstown Bank v. Mitchell, 28 N. J. L. 516, that the word "resident" as used in the attachment laws has a peculiar meaning, and that the writ of attachment is an extraordinary mode of procuring the appearance of a defendant, and is not to be resorted to when the ordinary process of the law can be used, though the legal domicile of the defendant may be out of the state.

In Edwards Mfg. Co. v. Ashland Sheet Mill Co. 31 Ohio C. C. 414, it was held that an affidavit for attachment upon the ground that the defendant is a foreign corporation must affirmatively show that such corporation is not within the exceptions contained in subdiv. 1, § 5521, Rev. Stat. (which apparently exempts foreign corporations which have complied with the requirements for doing business in the state from attachment as nonresidents), and a sworn averment stating that the defendant was doing business at a certain place in another state was held not to aid the affidavit, since such statement did not exclude the fact that the corporation might also be doing business in Ohio and owning or using a part of its capital or plant in that state.

J. T. W.

veyance all of the property, assets, franchises, and privileges of the Boise Railroad Company to the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company. This being done, the necessity for the existence of the Boise Railroad Company as a corporation ceased, and thereafter the annual license tax of said company was not paid to the state by either the Boise Railroad Company or the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company, and on the 1st of December, 1913, the charter of the said Boise Railroad Company was forfeited to the state.

At the date of the commencement of this action in the trial court, the capital stock of the Boise Railroad Company, which had theretofore been pledged as collateral security for the payment of the respondent's note, was the stock of a corporation which had forfeited its charter and conveyed all of its physical properties, rights, assets, and franchises to the appellant corporation herein. The Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company, by its officers, executed a mortgage or deed of trust to the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, securing an issue of bonds aggregating $30,000,000, which said mortgage or deed of trust covered all the property then owned by the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company which it might thereafter acquire, and under which bonds of said company of the par value of about $9,095,000 had been actually issued. The property transferred to the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company, which had previously constituted the security as represented by the stock pledged to Jennings, was now claimed by the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company as owner, and by the Guaranty Trust Company of New York as trustee, under the $30,000,000 mortgage above referred to.

On December 23, 1913, a receiver for the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company was duly appointed by an order of the United States court for the district of Idaho, southern division.

The answer of the appellant admits the indebtedness of $180,000 to the respondent, and also admits the appointment of a receiver by an order of the United States district court, and the insolvency of the appellant corporation.

This is a brief statement of what appears to be the facts in this case.

As the time of the issuance of summons in this action, the respondent, upon affidavit and sufficient bond, secured a writ of attachment and caused to be attached all of the properties, assets, and franchises of the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company. On May 28, 1914, appellant, by its counsel, moved in the trial court to discharge the attachment theretofore issued, L.R.A.1915D.

for the following reasons, to wit: (1) That the affidavit of attachment shows upon its face that the debt, upon which action is brought, was secured by pledge of stock of the Boise Railroad Company, and fails to show that such security has become valueless. (2) That the defendant Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company is not a nonresident of the state of Idaho, within the meaning of the attachment law, but is a foreign corporation that has complied with the Constitution and all the laws of Idaho respecting foreign corporations, and, as such, by the terms of such statutes is entitled to all the rights and privileges, and subject to the laws applicable to domestic corporations. (3) That the undertaking for attachment is insufficient.

It was conceded, upon the argument of this cause, that the appellant corporation had fully complied with the Constitution and laws of this state respecting foreign corporations. That being true, the appellant insists that it is exempt from attachment, under the laws of this state authorizing the attachment of the property of nonresidents.

Section 4302, Rev. Codes, as amended by Sess. Laws 1913, p. 160, provides that "the plaintiff at the time of the issuing of summons, or at any time afterwards may have the property of the defendant attached, as security for the satisfaction of any judgment that may be recovered, unless the defendant gives security to pay such judgment as in this chapter provided in the following cases: . . . 2. In an action upon a judgment, or upon contract, express or implied, or for the collection of any penalty provided by any statute of this state, against a defendant not residing in this state."

Section 2792, Rev. Codes, provides, among other things: "That foreign corporations complying with the provisions of this section shall have all the rights and privileges of like domestic corporations, including the right to exercise the right of eminent domain, and shall be subject to the laws of the state applicable to like domestic corporations."

The pertinent question for our consideration, therefore, is: Do the provisions of our statute exempt foreign corporations from attachment, within the meaning of § 4302 and subdivision 2, supra, for the reason that said nonresident corporation has fully complied with the Constitution and all of the laws of the state affecting foreign corporations? In other words, when foreign corporations comply with the Constitution and laws of our state, do they occupy the same position, with reference to our attachment laws, that domestic corporations do, or is their property liable to attachment, irrespective of their compliance with the Constitution and laws affecting nonresidents?

Should this court reach the conclusion that a foreign corporation is not exempt from attachment by reason of having complied with the Constitution and laws of this state affecting foreign corporations, it would be unnecessary to discuss or determine any other question involved in this case.

It is conceded that the appellant is a foreign corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the state of Maine; and unless when it applied to the state of Idaho for admission to do business within this state, and by a full compliance with the Constitution and laws of this state, affecting foreign corporations, it thereby became a resident corporation, within the meaning of the attachment law, and thereby became exempt from attachment, within the meaning of the statutes above cited, it could at this time be considered in no other light than a nonresident.

In the case of Boyer v. Northern P. R. Co. 8 Idaho, 74, 70 L.R.A. 691, 66 Pac. 826, the court says: "Both upon principle and authority private corporations are residents of the state in which they are created. They have and can have but one domicile—that the state of their birth, and which is fixed by the charter of incorporation. They may migrate into other countries and jurisdictions for the purpose of business, and may be permitted to carry on business in other states; yet, so far as jurisdiction of courts is concerned, they are treated both by our Federal courts and by our state courts as residents of the state in which created, and nonresidents of other states. The appellant in this case is a foreign corporation. . . . Foreign corporations are and remain, to all intents and purposes, so far as jurisdiction of actions is concerned, nonresidents of the state."

In the case of New York L. Ins. Co. v. Pike, 51 Colo. 238, 117 Pac. 899, the supreme court of Colorado says: "The authorities, both court and text writers, announce as settled doctrine that a corporation organized under the laws of one state is a resident of the state under whose laws it was created; that it cannot be a resident of any other state; and though such a corporation be permitted by another state, upon compliance with its laws, to carry on its business there, such permission and compliance does not make it a resident of such other state. . . . To hold otherwise would be to infringe upon the statute an exception which is wholly foreign to its plain terms, and would be only an amendment thereof."

To grant to a foreign corporation the right to hold property, to do business, maintain actions, enjoy the benefits of eminent domain, does not make it a domestic corporation; and notwithstanding the right to the enjoyment of all of these privileges, and such others as the legislature may from time to time provide, the residence or citizenship of a foreign corporation would not be changed, and it would still, under the great weight of authority, be subject to attachment as a foreign corporation. Barbour v. Paige Hotel Co. 2 App. D. C. 174; Cowardin v. Universal L. Ins. Co. 32 Gratt. 445; Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 34 N. Y. 208; Blackstone Mfg. Co. v. Blackstone, 13 Gray, 488; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 524, 10 L. ed. 277; Shaw v. Quincy Min. Co. 145 U. S. 444, 36 L. ed. 768, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 935.

The supreme court of California in Waechter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 10 Cal. App. 70, 101 Pac. 41, had under consideration the question of venue in a suit brought against a foreign corporation, involving the same principle that we are called upon to consider. The court held that "its primary purpose was apparently to place foreign railway and transportation companies upon an equal standing in this state with domestic corporations, in respect to building railways and exercising the right of eminent domain, and the rights and privileges incident thereto. To construe it as taking such companies out of the operation of the provisions of the general section relating to the place of trial of actions would be to create a specially privileged class of nonresident corporations who would be favored above, not only nonresident natural persons, but all other foreign corporations that might be doing business in the state. This would not only result in creating a special class of corporate defendants in civil actions, but would also arbitrarily discriminate in favor of corporations against natural persons who were nonresidents."

The authorities are uniform that the domicile, residence, and citizenship of a corporation are in the state where it is created, and that, where the corporation is not domesticated (that is, reincorporated in other states where it does business), it can have but one domicile, one residence, and one citizenship, and that is in the state issuing its charter and maintaining supervision and control over the corporation. 5 Thomp. Corp. 2d ed. § 6629.

In Drake on Attachments, 7th ed. § 80, the proposition is stated as follows: "The foreign character of a corporation is not to be determined by the place where its business is transacted, or where the corporators reside, but by the place where its charter was granted. With reference to inhabitancy, it is considered an inhabitant of the state in which it was incorporated."

These general principles respecting residency or inhabitancy of corporations cannot be denied or questioned. Cowardin v. Universal L. Ins. Co. 32 Gratt. 445.

It must be conceded that it is beyond the power of the state to forfeit or extend the corporate existence of a foreign corporation. It can exercise no power or control over the corporation as such. A foreign corporation, by compliance with the Constitution and laws, may do business within the state at its pleasure, and, when dissatisfied, can withdraw at will.

The provisions of our attachment law provide for no such exemption as contended for by appellant; and, even though the legislature should attempt to make some such provision looking to the exemption of foreign corporations from attachment by a compliance with the Constitution and laws, such legislation might be seriously questioned upon the ground and for the reason that it would be class legislation, or an attempt on the part of the legislature to confer special privileges upon a particular class of persons which could not be enjoyed by all alike. We do not think that the legislature ever intended that a foreign corporation, by complying with the Constitution and laws of this state permitting it to do business, should be regarded as a resident of this state, within the meaning of our attachment laws, and that its property should be exempt from attachment. Voss v. Evans Marble Co. 101 Ill. App. 373.

In view of the conclusion reached by this court upon the second ground of objection urged to the validity of the attachment of the property of appellant, it becomes immaterial whether or not the stock pledged by the Idaho Railway, Light, & Power Company to respondent is or became valueless by the fault of respondent or the conduct of appellants.

The third objection urged, namely, that the undertaking for attachment was insufficient, was not discussed by counsel for appellants, either during the oral argument or in the brief filed on appellants' behalf.

The order of the District Court refusing to dissolve the attachment is hereby affirmed. Costs awarded to respondent.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF IOWA EX REL. JOHN B. HAMMOND, Appt.,

v.

MRS. MAURICE LYNCH et al.

(— Iowa, —, 151 N. W. 81.)

Statute — conclusiveness of enrolled bill.

1. The courts cannot go behind the enrolled bill to determine whether or not the requirements of the Constitution were complied with in the enactment of a statute.

Same — absence of signature of speaker — effect.

2. The absence from the enrolled bill in the office of the secretary of state, of the signature of the speaker of the house of representatives, renders the statute void where the Constitution provides that every bill, having passed both houses, shall be signed by the speaker and president of their respective houses.

(February 17, 1915.)

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County dismissing a petition filed to enjoin the maintenance of a house of prostitution by defendant Lynch. Affirmed.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

A demurrer to a petition praying that a nuisance be enjoined was sustained, and, as plaintiff failed to plead over, the petition was dismissed. The state appeals.

Messrs. George Cosson, Attorney General, and C. A. Robbins, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

The effect of the failure of the proper officers to certify over their signatures as to the final passage of the bill, as required by constitutional provision, is not clearly determined.

Where the evident purpose of the signatures is to indicate to the governor that the bill has been constitutionally passed, the failure to affix the signatures will not invalidate the act.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition alleged that Mrs. Maurice Lynch was maintaining the premises described, leased by her of her codefendant, as a place of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution in violation of law, and prayed that she be restrained from so doing. The defendant demurred to the petition on several grounds, only one of which is argued, and that is that chapter 214 of the Acts of the 33d General Assembly, as the same appears among the enrolled bills in the office of the secretary of state, though duly signed by the president of the senate and approved by the governor, was never signed by the speaker of the house of representatives. An inspection of the bill as it appears in the office of the secretary of state verifies the allegation, and, of course, the demurrer admits it. If the signature of the speaker of the house of representatives, as well as that of the president of the senate, was essential to the authentication of the bill as having passed the general assembly, chapter 214, as printed in the Session Laws of 1909, under which this suit was begun, cannot be deemed to have been enacted by that body, and did not become the law of this state.

The provisions of the Constitution bearing thereon are found in article 3; § 9 thereof declares that "each house shall . . . keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same."

Section 10: "The yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the desire of any two members present, be entered on the journals."

Section 15: "Every bill having passed both houses, shall be signed by the speaker and president of their respective houses."

Section 16: "Every bill which shall have passed the general assembly, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, which shall enter the same upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it; if, after such reconsideration, it again pass both houses, by yeas and nays, by a majority of two thirds of the members of each house, it shall become a law, notwithstanding the governor's objections. If any bill shall not be returned within three days after it shall have been presented to him, Sunday excepted, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general assembly, by adjournment, prevent such return. Any bill submitted to the governor for his approval during the last three days of a session of the general assembly, shall be deposited by him in the office of the secretary of state within thirty days after the adjournment, with his approval, if approved by him, and with his objections, if he disproves thereof."

Section 17: "No bill shall be passed unless by the assent of a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the general assembly, and the question upon the final passage shall be taken immediately upon its last reading, and the yeas and nays entered on the journal."

The authorities agree that the bill, when signed, as exacted, by the speaker of the house and president of the senate, and approved by the governor and deposited with the secretary of state, is at least prima facie evidence that it was passed by the legislature; but many courts entertain the view that it is within their jurisdiction to ascertain whether the authentication as thus made is correct, and whether the legislature in fact did what its presiding officers say it did, and which the governor approved, and for that purpose to resort to the journals of the respective houses, and even consider other evidence bearing on the question. See State ex rel. Cheyenne v. Swan, 7 Wyo. 166, 40 L.R.A. 195, 75 Am. St. Rep. 889, 51 Pac. 209, and cases therein cited; Rode v. Phelps, 80 Mich. 598, 45 N. W. 493; State ex rel. Douglas County v. Frank, 60 Neb. 327, 83 N. W. 74; State ex rel. Boyd v. Deal, 24 Fla. 293, 12 Am. St. Rep. 204, 4 So. 899; Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, 58 Am. Dec. 571.

Other authorities are to the effect that, while the Constitution has prescribed the formalities to be observed in the passage of bills and the creation of statutes, the power to determine whether these formalities have been complied with is necessarily vested in the legislature, and, a bill having been authenticated and promulgated by the legislative department to the public in the manner authorized by the Constitution, this is conclusive evidence of its proper passage by the legislature. As all decisions entertaining the latter view exact, as essential to the authentication of the enrolled bill and proof of its passage, the signature of both the speaker of the house and president of the senate, inquiry as to whether we may look beyond the enrolled bill to ascertain whether it is in fact a statute of the state is pertinent. The expressions contained in the opinions of this court are in harmony with the authorities declaring the enrolled bill conclusive. In Clare v. State, 5 Iowa, 509, the question as to whether the enrolled bill in the office of the secretary of state or as published in the session laws was controlling, and the court said: "The original act in the secretary's office is the ultimate proof of the law, whatever errors there may be in what purports to be copy thereof; and the court will inform itself and take cognizance of the true reading of the statute."

In Duncombe v. Prindle, 12 Iowa, 1, the question involved was whether township 90 was taken from Webster county and added to Humboldt county, and it was contended that the number "90" was omitted by mistake from the act as published, but appeared in the original bill. The court, upon examination of the enrolled bill, found this not to be so, and added: "This enrolled bill, thus filed and preserved in the secretary's office, is the authenticated copy of the real bill which the general assembly passed, and is the ultimate proof of the true expression of the legislative will, as this court have before held. Clare v. State, 5 Iowa, 510. And that for the obvious reason that it is the bill which received the signatures of the officers of both branches of the legislature, after a committee appointed for that purpose had compared it with the law as passed, and reported it a correct copy of the same. Behind this it is impossible for any court to go for the purpose of ascertaining what the law is. There is no other bill, original or a copy, to which the signatures of the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives are affixed, or to which is appended the approval by the governor. And when counsel speak of some other original bill than this, in which the township 90 was embraced, we confess we are at a loss to conceive what they mean. Are we to suppose that the enrolling clerk, and the committee appointed to examine and report upon the accuracy of his work, have all been guilty of laches or corruption, especially in the absence of any competent proof to that effect?"

Though not involved in Koehler v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 543, 14 N. W. 738, the court in the course of its opinion observed that "inasmuch as a bill, before it becomes a law, must be signed by the presiding officers of the two houses and by the governor, as will be assumed, we may, for the purposes of this case, concede, when it has been enrolled and so signed and deposited in the office of the secretary of state, it is the ultimate and conclusive evidence of the contents of the bill which passed the general assembly, and that it cannot be contradicted by the journals, because there is no constitutional provisions requiring that it shall be entered on the journals."

And further on at page 563, of 60 Iowa, it was said: "For fear we may be misunderstood, we will repeat that, when a bill or joint resolution is required to be signed by the presiding officers and the governor, and it is so signed, it will be conceded that such bill or resolution constitutes the ultimate and conclusive evidence of the contents thereof."

In Darling v. Boesch, 67 Iowa, 702, 25 N. W. 887, the bill was presented to the governor for his approval during the last three days of the session of the general assembly, and he did not sign it and merely deposited it in the office of the secretary of state without objection thereto within thirty days, and the court held that it did not become a law.

In Miller v. Oelwein, 155 Iowa, 706, 136 N. W. 1045, it was declared that "the enrolled bills duly signed and deposited with the secretary of state constitute the ultimate proof of their regular enactment, and behind them it is impossible for any court to go for the purpose of ascertaining what the law is."

Duncombe v. Prindle, supra, and Collins v. Laucier, 45 Iowa, 702, were cited, and also Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart, 141 Ind. 281, 60 L.R.A. 671, 40 N. E. 1051. But later on this was added: The "mere failure of the journals to show compliance with the requirements as to the method of enacting a law will not be conclusive that such requirements were not complied with"—citing Leavenworth County v. Higginbotham, 17 Kan. 62.

In the recent case of Conly v. Dilley, 153 Iowa, 677, 133 N. W. 730, the contention was that the two houses did not adopt the same bill, in that in passing the house it included two amendments omitted by the senate, and, among other things, the court observed that "in the first place, it is extremely doubtful if the courts can properly go behind the enrolled bill to scrutinize the details of its legislative history for grounds upon which to hold it invalid. Clare v. State and Duncombe v. Prindle, supra; 36 Cyc. 971. It may be held that if the record affirmatively disclosed the adoption of an amendment which does not appear in the enrolled bill, or that such bill did not receive a constitutional majority of either house, or other vital defect of that nature, the court would not be bound to accept the enrolment and publication of an alleged statute as a finality; but we are here asked to go very much farther than the suggested case, and to presume that the house did adopt certain amendments of which there is not the slightest record, except of the fact that they were recommended by a committee. The fact that the journal does not show what was done with these amendments may afford good ground to criticize the manner of keeping the record; but we know of no rule of law or reason by which we can presume they were adopted by the house."

It will be noted that the point under consideration was not involved in any of those cases, but it was covered by what was said in Duncombe v. Prindle, supra, and that decision is generally cited in opinions holding that the enrolled bill in office of the secretary of state, when properly attested, is conclusive evidence of its enactment, and, even though what was said in other decisions be dicta, these indicate the trend of thought of those concurring therein. Moreover, upon an examination of the conflicting authorities, we are inclined to the opinion that this construction has the better reason for its support. There is quite enough uncertainty as to what the law is without saying that no one may be certain that an act of the legislature has become such until the issue has been determined by some court whose decision might not be regarded as conclusive in an action between other parties. Regardless of the good faith of a person or officer relying on the enrolled bill in the office of the secretary of state, this would afford no protection from the consequence of his acts if it should turn out that the journals or other evidence disclosed fatal defects in its passage. One believing that he were complying with the law might be unwittingly committing a crime, or an officer paying out money in supposed obedience to a statute might discover too late that the enactment he undertook to obey had not been adopted in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, according to record of clerks, though the legislators were proceeding under solemn oath of obedience to the fundamental law. It seems quite enough that the average citizen must take notice of the contents of the enrolled bill when duly authorized, subsequent to July 4th after passage, without also putting upon him the burden of ascertaining the condition of the journal of the respective houses bearing thereon, and determining for himself the effect of any irregularity therein tending to invalidate the bill. Courts could not rely upon the published session laws, but would be required to look beyond these to the journals of the house and senate, and often to any printed bills or amendments which might be found after the adjournment of the general assembly. Otherwise, after relying on the prima facie evidence of the enrolled bills, authenticated as enacted by the Constitution, for years, it might be ascertained from the journals that an act theretofore enforced had never become a law. The inconvenience of such a rule and the consequent confusion are a strong argument against its adoption. What is the design of exacting the signing of the enrolled bills by the presiding officers of the two houses and the approval of the governor, and that they be deposited with the secretary of state? Is it not that these are the final records of the acts of the legislature for the information and guidance of other departments of government? If so, why should they not be accorded the respect usually accorded solemn records? If merely steps in the enactment of laws, why are not other matters exactd in the passage of a bill also required to be preserved? The Constitution nowhere requires the bill to be made of record. Aside from entering the yeas and nays on the journal on final passage, no record except the enrolled bill duly authenticated is exacted by the fundamental law, and as the legislature is a co-ordinate branch of the government, in no sense inferior to the other branches, and equally bound by oath of obedience to the Constitution, we perceive no reason for not regarding its final record as embodied in such enrolled bill, authenticated as required by § 16 of article 3 of the Constitution, as absolute a verity as the judgment of a court. Of course, a judgment may be attacked, but not collaterally, and that is the only way an enrolled bill may be assailed.

Each of the three departments of our government is equal, and each should be responsible to the people whom it represents. The legislature enacts laws, and is commanded by the Constitution to enact them in a certain way. The executive enforces the laws, and by the Constitution it is made his duty to take certain steps looking toward such enforcement in the manner prescribed therein upon the happening of certain contingencies. The judicial department is charged with the duty of interpreting the laws, adjudging rights and obligations thereunder. Such being the respective duties of the several departments, it would seem that, when certified to have been performed as required by the Constitution, this should be conclusive on the other departments, and there would seem no more impropriety in the legislature seeking to go behind the final record of a court to determine whether it had obeyed some provision of the Constitution in making such record, than there would be in the courts seeking to go behind the final record made by the legislative department. Where the executive is charged with taking certain things upon contingencies happening, and is given no power to act except upon such contingency, if he determined that the contingency exists and acts in pursuance thereof, the courts will not inquire into the fact as to whether he decided correctly in determining the existence of the contingency. Indeed, to preserve the harmony of our form of government, these mandatory provisions must be considered as addressed to the department which is called upon to perform them, and neither of the other departments will be permitted in any manner to coerce that department into obedience thereto. Those courts which uphold the inquiry as to whether the legislature has observed the mandatory provisions of the Constitution necessarily assume that it is safer to intrust the enforcement of these to the judicial department than the legislature, and that the judicial department is the only one in which sufficient integrity exists to insure observance of the provisions of the Constitution. Such an attitude seems intolerable, and not to be endured. It is sometimes said that the courts assume superiority over the legislature in determining that an act violates a provision of the Constitution. This is not so, however, for they merely undertake to determine whether an act of the general assembly is in conflict with the Constitution, and, if it is, the statute necessarily must yield, for that the Constitution has a sanction greater than can be given by the action of any department of state.

"Upon principle then, in view of the division into departments under our form of government, each of equal authority, one department cannot rightfully go behind the final record certified to it or to the public from either of the other departments. And the judicial department is no more justified in going behind the final act of the legislature to see if it has obeyed every mandatory provision of the Constitution than is the legislature to go back of the final record made by the courts to see whether or not they have complied with all the constitutional requirements." State ex rel. Reed v. Jones, 6 Wash. 452, 23 L.R.A. 340, 34 Pac. 201.

What was said in Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514, 95 Am. Dec. 710, is especially pertinent: "It is argued that, if the authenticated roll is conclusive upon the courts, then less than a quorum of each house may, by the aid of corrupt presiding officers, impose laws upon the state in defiance of the inhibition of the Constitution. It must be admitted that the consequence stated would be possible. Public authority and political power must, of necessity, be confided to officers, who, being human, may violate the trusts reposed in them. This, perhaps, cannot be avoided absolutely. But it applies also to all human agencies. It is not fit that the judiciary should claim for itself a purity beyond others, nor has it been able at all times with truth to say that its high places have not been disgraced. The framers of our government have not constituted it with faculties to supervise coordinate departments, and correct or prevent abuses of their authority. It cannot authenticate a statute; that power does not belong to it; nor can it keep the legislative journal. It ascertains the statute law by looking at its authentication, and then its function is merely to expound and administer it. It cannot, we think, look beyond that authentication, because of the Constitution itself. If it may, then, for the same reason it may go beyond the journal, when that is impeached; and so the validity of legislation may be made to depend upon the memory of witnesses, and no man can, in fact, know the law, which he is bound to obey. Such consequences would be a large price to pay for immunity from the possible abuse of authority by the high officers who are, as we think, charged with the duty of certifying to the public the fact that a statute has been enacted by competent houses. Human governments must repose confidence in officers. It may be abused, and there may be no remedy. Nor is there any great force in the argument which seems to be regarded as of weight by some American courts, that some important provisions of the Constitution would be a dead letter if inquiry may not be made by the court beyond the rolls. This argument overlooks the fact that legislators are sworn to support the Constitution, or else it assumes that they will wilfully violate that oath. It is neither modest nor just for judges thus to impeach the integrity of another department of government, and to claim that the judiciary only will be faithful to its obligations."

It is also to be observed that the manner of keeping the journal, by either the house or senate, is not prescribed in the Constitution. Nor does it require that the acts finally passed shall be preserved in any form or place other than as enrolled bills authenticated as exacted therein and deposited with the secretary of state. In State ex rel. Reed v. Jones, supra, the court, in reverting to this matter, said: "The enrolled acts are prepared with some care, and, under the rules of our legislature, and of every legislative body of which we have any knowledge, some committee is charged with the responsibility of seeing that such enrolled bills are compared with the one which actually passed the legislature before they are presented to the presiding officer for signature. There is therefore some protection thrown around these enrolled acts, and it would be a difficult matter for anyone through carelessness or fraud to prevent the will of the legislature, as expressed in the bill actually passed, being embodied in the enrolment thereof. But, if the doctrine be once established that the fact that such bill had passed can be negated by the journal, there would be very little to prevent a bill which had been properly passed being defeated by the carelessness or fraud of the journal clerk or some employee under him. Under the practice prevailing in the legislature of this state, and in most of the other states, there is very little assurance that the journal will fully and accurately show the proceedings of the body for which it is kept. The practice in nearly all such bodies is to have the journal read, if read at all, from loose slips of paper, made up partly in writing and partly by pasted slips, and, after being thus read, ordered approved. It is also a fact of which everyone has knowledge that often upon such reading there is such inattention on the part of the members of the legislature that gross errors might pass unnoticed. The journal as thus read and approved from loose slips of paper is then passed to the journal clerk, and by him, or under his direction, transcribed into a book, and the slips then carelessly preserved or entirely destroyed. The transcription of these minutes, without any further action on the part of the legislature, or of any person but the one who makes it, except superficial examination by the journal clerk, and possibly by the presiding officer, becomes the formal journal. It follows that the chances of mistake are very great, and for fraud upon the part of the copyist even greater. The Constitution requires that there should be a majority of the body recorded as voting in favor of a bill upon its final passage. Upon such passage the bill in fact receives one or two more than such constitutional majority, and is duly passed; but if by carelessness or fraud the copyist should change one or two of the names of those voting, from the affirmative to the negative, the will of the legislature, regularly expressed, would be defeated. And the same result might follow if in copying he should omit a name. Not only would such results follow in the cases specified, but in many other ways the least error in making up or transcribing the journal might result in the defeat of the will of the legislature. Unless the method of keeping journals should at once be revolutionized, and so much attention be paid to them that they will be made to absolutely represent all the doings of the body to such an extent as to very much prolong the sessions of the legislature, the sanctity of legislative enactments will be entirely dependent upon the carefulness and good faith of some copyist employed by the legislature at a few dollars a day. Much less evil will grow out of a course of decision which will give the people to understand that the legislative is a department of the government of as high authority as the judicial, and that with the mandatory provisions directed to it, the other departments of the government have no concern. When this is once well understood, the people will see to it that such mandatory provisions are complied with by the legislature, or, if they do not, the blame must rest upon themselves or the system of government which has as its basis the equal authority of the three departments into which it is divided."

In Pacific R. Co. v. The Governor, 23 Mo. 353, 66 Am. Dec. 673, in considering this subject, the court, speaking through Scott, J., said: "If the legislature exceed its powers in the enactment of a law, the courts, being sworn to support the Constitution, must judge that law by the standard of the Constitution, and declare its validity. But the question whether a law on its face violates the Constitution is very different from that growing out of the non-compliance with the forms required to be observed in its enactment. In the one case, a power is exercised, not delegated, or which is prohibited, and the question of the validity of the law is determined from the language of it. In the other, the law is not, in its terms, contrary to the Constitution; on its face it is regular, but resort is had to something behind the law itself in order to ascertain whether the general assembly, in making the law, was governed by the rules prescribed for its action by the Constitution. This would seem like an inquisition into the conduct of the members of the general assembly, and it must be seen at once that it is a very delicate power, the frequent exercise of which must lead to endless confusion in the administration of the law. This inquiry may be extended to good as well as to bad laws,—to those passed as well with the approval of the governor, as to those which are passed his objections to the contrary notwithstanding; for it is clear that, if a law passed over the objections of the governor may be impeached by inquiring whether the forms of the Constitution were observed in its enactment, the same inquiry may be instituted in relation to laws passed with his sanction, and thus statutes, constitutional on their face, regular in their terms, which may have been the rules of action for years, and under which large amounts of property have been vested, and numerous titles taken, may be abrogated and declared void. A principle with such a consequence should be supported by a weight of authority which no court can resist. When we reflect on the manner in which the journals are made up, and the rank of the officers to which that duty is intrusted, how startling must the proposition be that all our statute laws depend for their validity on the journals of the two houses of the general assembly showing that all the forms required by the Constitution to be observed in their enactment have been complied with. The required forms may be observed, and the clerks may fail to make the necessary or correct entry. If the journals had been designed as the evidence in the last resort that the laws were constitutionally passed, would not some method have been adopted by which greater care would have been exacted in entering the proceedings of the two houses? Would the task of making them have been intrusted to a single clerk, with a power in the houses to dispense with their reading, even should there be a rule requiring them to be read,—a matter, however, about which the Constitution and laws are silent? In that country from which we borrow so many of our ideas respecting government and laws, and whose common law and early statutes constitute the substratum of all our systems of jurisprudence, the statute roll is the only and exclusive evidence of what the statute law is, so long as it is in existence. Then it is maintained that, if the journal were every way full and perfect, yet it hath no power to satisfy, destroy, or weaken the act, which, being a high record, must be tried only by itself,—teste meipso. . . . So it appears that by the common law the statute roll was the absolute and conclusive proof of a statute. This record could not be contradicted. It implied absolute verity. There was no plea by which the existence of a statute could be put in issue. Under this state of the law our Constitution was adopted."

In Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am. Dec. 93, will be found a review of the authorities up to that time; the court concluding that "the result of authorities in England and in the other states clearly is that at common law, whenever a general statute is misrecited, or its existence denied, the question is to be tried and determined by the court as a question of law; that is to say, the court is bound to take notice of it, and inform itself the best way it can; that there is no plea by which its existence can be put in issue and tried as a question of fact; that, if the enrolment of the statute is in existence, the enrolment itself is the record, which is conclusive as to what the statute is, and cannot be impeached, destroyed, or weakened by the journals of Parliament or any other less authentic or less satisfactory memorials; and that there has been no departure from the principles of common law in this respect in the United States, except in instances where a departure has been grounded on, or taken in pursuance of, some express constitutional or statutory provision requiring some relaxation of the rule, in order that full effect might be given to such provisions; and in such instances the rule has been relaxed by judges with great caution and hesitation, and the departure has never been extended beyond an inspection of the journals of both branches of the legislature. It remains L.R.A.1915D.

to be seen whether there is anything in our Constitution or laws requiring or authorizing a departure from the common-law rule. . . . When we once depart from principle,—from a sound rule of law,—where shall we stop? Do not the circumstances of this case open to our vision a vista of absurdities into which we shall stumble if we attempt to explore forbidden fields for evidence of a vague, shadowy, and unsatisfactory character upon which to overthrow the enrolled statutes of the land? In this case, the enrolment, the record of the statute, exists, and we are satisfied that we should not look beyond it, certainly not beyond the record aided by the journals, and looking at both, we must hold the entire act to be a valid law."

This decision was followed in Yolo County v. Colgan, 132 Cal. 265, 84 Am. St. Rep. 41, 64 Pac. 403, though its author, since a judge of the United States circuit court, afterwards seems to have raised some doubt as to its correctness in San Mateo County v. Southern P. R. Co. (C. C.) 8 Sawy. 238, 13 Fed. 722.

The question was exhaustively considered in State ex rel. Pangborn v. Young, 32 N. J. L. 29, where, among other things, the court said [in 10 Nev. 182, 21 Am. Rep. 721]: "For whoever engages in any transaction the validity or construction of which depends upon statutory provisions, whoever holds or acquires any sort of property or right, the title or enjoyment of which may be affected by the operation of any law, is bound to take notice, at his peril, what the law is. And it is not enough for him to know what the law is after a court of last resort has made an investigation and determined what part of the statute roll is to stand and what part to fall, but he must know in advance of litigation, and govern his conduct accordingly. If there is any record or document outside of the statute roll to which a court will resort for the purpose of testing the validity of an enrolled law, he must not overlook it. If a court will hear oral testimony to impeach the record, he must be able to conjecture in advance what the testimony will be, and what weight will be allowed to it. Considering the exigency of this rule, it is easy to perceive of what extreme importance it is that there should be some high, authentic, and unquestionable record to which not only courts and public officers, but private citizens, may resort, and by a simple inspection determine for themselves with infallible certainty what are the statutes of the state, and what are their terms. Considerations such as these had led to the firm establishment in England, at a date anterior to American independence, of the maxims that matters of public law are not the subject of allegation or denial in pleading, nor of proof upon the trial of causes; but that courts would always take judicial notice of the law, and that, upon the suggestion of any doubt as to the existence or provisions of a parliamentary enactment, the court would inform itself in the best way it could, not by listening to proofs, but by inspection of the record, if it was in existence, and, if not, by looking to the printed statute, or, failing that, by examination of other documents where it had been recited, recognized, and acted upon. The record which, as long as it existed, was held to import absolute verity, which not only dispensed with, but excluded, all other evidence, which could neither be aided nor impeached by the journals of Parliament, was the copy of the act enrolled by the clerk of the Parliament and delivered over into chancery. The question frequently arose in England, but the rule was uniformly maintained that the courts would look to the statute roll, and to that alone."

The issue is also well considered in State ex rel. George v. Swift, 10 Nev. 176, 21 Am. Rep. 721; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650; Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 38 L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16; People v. Devlin, 33 N. Y. 269, 88 Am. Dec. 377; and many other cases.

The authorities bearing on all phases of the inquiry will be found collected in the opinion and note to Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. State, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1.

The Supreme Court of the United States held an enrolled act duly authenticated and on file with the secretary of the state conclusive proof of the law as passed by Congress, in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495, where, speaking through Harlan, J., it said: "The signing by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and by the President of the Senate, in open session, of an enrolled bill, is an official attestation by the two Houses of such bill as one that has passed Congress. It is a declaration by the two Houses, through their presiding officers, to the President, that a bill thus attested has received, in due form, the sanction of the legislative branch of the government, and that it is delivered to him in obedience to the constitutional requirement that all bills which pass Congress shall be presented to him. And when a bill thus attested receives his approval, and is deposited in the public archives, its authentication as a bill that has passed Congress should be deemed complete and unimpeachable. As the President has no authority to approve a bill not passed by Congress, an enrolled act in the custody of the Secretary of State, and having the official attestations of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of the President of the Senate, and of the President of the United States, carries, on its face, a solemn assurance by the legislative and executive departments of the government, charged, respectively, with the duty of enacting and executing the laws, that it was passed by Congress. The respect due to coequal and independent departments requires the judicial department to act upon that assurance, and to accept, as having passed Congress, all bills authenticated in the manner stated; leaving the courts to determine, when the question properly arises, whether the act, so authenticated, is in conformity with the Constitution. It is admitted that an enrolled act, thus authenticated, is sufficient evidence of itself—nothing to the contrary appearing upon its face—that it passed Congress. But the contention is that it cannot be regarded as a law of the United States if the journal of either House fails to show that it passed in the precise form in which it was signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses, and approved by the President. It is said that, under any other view, it becomes possible for the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate to impose upon the people as a law a bill that was never passed by Congress. But this possibility is too remote to be seriously considered in the present inquiry. It suggests a deliberate conspiracy to which the presiding officers, the committees on enrolled bills, and the clerks of the two Houses must necessarily be parties, all acting with a common purpose to defeat an expression of the popular will in the mode prescribed by the Constitution. Judicial action based upon such a suggestion is forbidden by the respect due to a co-ordinate branch of the government. The evils that may result from the recognition of the principle that an enrolled act, in the custody of the Secretary of State, attested by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses of Congress, . . . according to the forms of the Constitution, would be far less than those that would certainly result from a rule making the validity of congressional enactments depend upon the manner in which the journals of the respective Houses are kept by the subordinate officers charged with the duty of keeping them."

There the court held it not competent to show from the journals of the House and other evidence that the enrolled bill as passed contained a section not found in the enrolled act in the office of the Secretary of State.

Enough has been said and quoted to clearly indicate the grounds of our conclusion that the enrolled bill on file with the secretary of state is the ultimate proof of its passage in the form there appearing, and that beyond this the courts cannot go in ascertaining whether the legislature complied with the requirements of the Constitution. The authorities seem about evenly divided as to whether resort may be had to the journals of the houses, but there is a decided tendency in recent decisions to hold that the enrolled bill is conclusive evidence of its passage as it appears. In the last edition of Sutherland on Statutory Construction, at page 72, the author observes that "it is no longer true that 'in a large majority of the states' the courts have held that the enrolled act may be impeached by a resort to the journals. A comparison will show that the courts are now about equally divided on the question. The current of judicial decision in the last ten years has been strongly against the right of the courts to go back of the enrolled act. Undoubtedly, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, supra, has had much to do in creating and augmenting this current; but it may also be due to the greater simplicity, certainty, and reasonableness of the doctrine which holds the enrolled act to be conclusive. Many courts and judges, while feeling compelled to follow former decisions holding that the enrolled act may be impeached by the journals, have done so reluctantly, and have expressed doubts as to the validity of the doctrine, and in many cases, as will appear in the following sections, have qualified and restricted it in important particulars."

Dissatisfaction with the contrary rule has been expressed in the following cases: Webster v. Little Rock, 44 Ark. 536; People ex rel. Barnes v. Starne, 35 Ill. 121, 85 Am. Dec. 348; State ex rel. Godard v. Andrews, 64 Kan. 474, 67 Pac. 870; State ex rel. Casper v. Moore, 37 Neb. 13, 55 N. W. 299.

In State ex rel. Hoover v. Chester, 39 S. C. 307, 17 S. E. 752, previous decisions were overruled. The entire field on both sides has been covered in the decisions of other states, and we have sought only to indicate the reasons which have been persuasive to us in reaching the conclusion that the enrolled bill duly authenticated as exacted by the provisions of the Constitution is conclusive, not only that it passed the general assembly, but that it so did in the form of the enrolled bill. In other words, the several sections of the Constitution are mandatory, and when an act has been promulgated as therein prescribed, and only then, does it become a law of the state.

This does not relieve either house of the obligation under § 17 of article 3 of the Constitution, from seeing to it that the yeas and nays on the final passage of every bill are entered on its journal. This is to be actually complied with, and only when so done, and it appears that a "majority of all members elected to each branch of the general assembly" have assented thereto, is the bill to be "signed by the speaker and president of their respective houses." Section 15 of article 3. Thereby the presiding officer of each house certifies to the passage of the bill in conformity with the requirement of the Constitution and the rules of the respective houses, and such certification may not be impeached by the very fallible record of some clerk ordinarily made up from hastily prepared memoranda, for the preservation of which the law makes no provision, or other evidence of like character. The respective houses having certified to the passage of a particular bill in the manner prescribed by the fundamental law, it is not competent for the courts to inquire whether the general assembly—a co-ordinate branch of government—has observed the requirements of the Constitution devolving upon it, and inquire whether its certification is true. Such a course would be inconsistent with the independent character of the legislative department, which necessarily must pass on the manner of performing its duties, though, as previously observed, the extent of its powers as defined by the Constitution is appropriate matter for judicial inquiry. A bill may be presented to the governor for approval only after it has passed both houses, and the only authentication of the bill in form or substance as being that which has been passed is the signature of each presiding officer, and only when so signed and approved, or approval omitted for three days, is it deemed a verity, and the courts will not get behind the enrolled bill to ascertain whether the legislature complied with the requirements of the Constitution in its adoption. In other words, the certification through the presiding officers by the general assembly is deemed conclusive evidence that the bill was passed as exacted by the Constitution.

What has been said, perhaps, indicates with sufficient definiteness our conclusion that the signature of the speaker was essential to the validity of the enrolled bill. Courts holding that resort may not be had to other than the enrolled bills to ascertain their enactment by the general assembly are unanimous in deciding that the signature of the presiding officer of each house is essential as proof of their passage, and that the omission of either is fatal to the bill. 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 545. Moreover, the greater number of those deciding that the journals of the respective houses or other evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining whether constitutional requirements as to the manner of passing a bill have been observed entertain the same view, and declare the omission of the signature of either presiding officer from the enrolled bill fatal. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150, 16 Am. Rep. 647; Moody v. State, 48 Ala. 115, 17 Am. Rep. 28. See 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 545; Lynch v. Hutchinson, 219 Ill. 193, 76 N. E. 370, 4 Ann. Cas. 905; State ex rel. Coffin v. Howell, 26 Nev. 93, 64 Pac. 466; State ex rel. Scarborough v. Robinson, 81 N. C. 409; Jones v. Hutchinson, 43 Ala. 721; Legg v. Annapolis, 42 Md. 203; State v. Kiesewetter, 45 Ohio St. 263, 12 N. E. 807.

Manifestly, this is because of the very tenable theory that all provisions of the Constitution, unless the contrary appears therefrom, are to be regarded as mandatory. It is hard to understand arguments construing any portion of the fundamental law as discretionary, for, if so, there could be no adequate reason for including it therein. As observed by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (page 94): "The courts tread upon very dangerous ground when they venture to apply the rules which distinguish directory and mandatory statutes to the provisions of a Constitution. Constitutions do not usually undertake to prescribe mere rules of proceeding, except when such rules are looked upon as essential to the thing to be done; and they must then be regarded in the light of limitations upon the power to be exercised. It is the province of an instrument of this solemn and permanent character to establish those fundamental maxims, and fix those unvarying rules, by which all departments of the government must at all times shape their conduct; and, if it descends to prescribing mere rules of order in unessential matters, it is lowering the proper dignity of such an instrument, and usurping the proper province of ordinary legislation. We are not therefore to expect to find in a Constitution provisions which the people, in adopting it, have not regarded as of high importance, and worthy to be embraced in an instrument which, for a time at least, is to control alike the government and the governed, and to form a standard by which is to be measured the power which can be exercised as well by the delegate as by the sovereign people themselves. If directions are given respecting the times or modes of proceeding in which a power should be exercised, there is at least a strong presumption that the people designed it should be exercised in that time and mode only; and we impute to the people a want of due appreciation of the purpose and proper province of such an instrument when we infer that such directions are given to any other end; especially when, as has been already said, it is but fair to presume that the people in their Constitution have expressed themselves in careful and measured terms, corresponding with the immense importance of the powers delegated, and with a view to leaving as little as possible to implication."

This is expressive of the view entertained by the great weight of authority, and there appears no sound reason for not holding, in accord therewith, that the section of the Constitution under consideration (§ 15 of article 3), in exacting the signature of the speaker of the house as well as that of the president of the senate, is essential to the authentication of the bill in form and substance, as well as, in certifying its passage, to its validity as a statute of this state. All are presumed to know the law, and it is of highest importance to each citizen, as well as to the public officer, that there be an authentic record to which he may resort to ascertain certainly and definitely what laws are enacted by the legislature which control him, and which he is bound to observe at his peril. Whatever conduces to certainty in this respect is of great moment to every person in the state, and no rule of construction would be wise which would leave so important a matter to doubt or uncertainty. Our conclusion that the enrolled bill must be signed by both the speaker of the house and the president of the senate, and that when so signed and approved by the governor, or approval omitted, under circumstances defined in § 16 of article 3 of the Constitution, is conclusive that it has been properly enacted, and has become a valid statute of the state, accomplishes this, and we need only add that, in consequence thereof, chapter 214 of the Acts of the 33d General Assembly, not having been signed by the speaker, is not and never was a part of the laws of this state.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

MRS. CLARENCE E. FILLEY, Appt.,
v.
ILLINOIS LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,

(91 Kan. 220, 137 Pac. 793.)

Insurance — for wife — effect of divorce.

1. The benefit accruing from a policy of life insurance upon the life of a married man, payable upon his death to his wife, naming her, is payable to the surviving Headnotes by SMITH, J.

Note. — Effect of divorce on rights of beneficiary under insurance policy or benefit certificate.

The earlier cases upon this question are treated in the notes to Wallace v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 478, and Green v. Green, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 370, wherein the general rules are fully stated.

Perhaps the most important of the recent decisions is FILLEY v. ILLINOIS L. INS. CO., wherein it was held that the question as to whether a policy of life insurance or a benefit policy issued to one for the benefit of another vests a present interest in the beneficiary depends not upon the name or nature of the company, but on the terms of the policy, the existing statutes, and the by-laws, if any, by which such company and its policy holders are bound; and applying this rule, that a policy issued to a member of a mutual benefit society, which policy provided that the benefits should be paid to such person's wife, naming her, was payable to the named person, although some years thereafter she secured a divorce, and the insured was thereafter again married to one who sustained the relation of wife to him for several years and until his death, it being shown that after such remarriage the insured kept the annual dues and demands paid, and made no attempt to change the beneficiary.

The general rule that a wife's interest as beneficiary in an ordinary or old line life insurance policy is not affected by a divorce where under the policy the husband had the right to change the beneficiary, but did not do so, was held in the case of Guthrie v. Guthrie, 155 Ky. 146, 159 S. W. 710, to be applicable to an insurance policy, the parties named in which were divorced in Illinois, the decree in the divorce suit having made no award with reference to it, and it not appearing that there was any statute in Illinois providing for the restoration upon divorce of property obtained through marriage.

And in Salvin v. Salvin, 165 App. Div. 362, 151 N. Y. Supp. 60, it was held that the interest of a beneficiary in an ordinary life insurance policy payable to "B., the wife of the insured," was not terminated L.R.A.1915D.

beneficiary named, although she may have years thereafter secured a divorce from her husband, and he was thereafter again married to one who sustained the relation of wife to him at the time of his death.

On Rehearing.

Same — vesting of rights.

2. The rights of a beneficiary in an ordinary life insurance policy become vested upon the issuance of the policy, and can thereafter, during the life of the beneficiary, be defeated only as provided by the terms of the policy.

Same — Kansas Mutual Company.

3. The Kansas Mutual Life Association was not strictly a mutual association nor a by the obtaining by her of a divorce from the insured, it being said that the phrase, "the wife of the insured," was purely descriptive, and did not import an implied condition that to receive the proceeds of the policy she should continue to be his wife up to the time of his death.

In the recent Kentucky case of Sea v. Conrad, 155 Ky. 51, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1074, 159 S. W. 622, it was held that a paid-up "old line" life insurance policy, taken by a man for the benefit of his wife, was within a statute providing that upon divorce the court shall restore any property which either party may have obtained directly or indirectly from or through the other during marriage, and in consideration or by reason thereof, and therefore that a wife who was named as beneficiary in such an old line life insurance policy which became paid up before the parties were divorced was by such divorce divested of all beneficial interest therein, although the policy was left in the possession of the wife, the husband having collected the dividends upon it.

And the meaning of the term "dependent upon" as used in the by-laws of a fraternal benefit association and a statute governing such associations, limiting beneficiaries and payment of death benefits to those dependent upon the insured, was determined in Johnson v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 91 Kan. 314, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461, 137 Pac. 1190, wherein it was held that a woman who has obtained a divorce from her former husband and a judgment for alimony is not entitled to be regarded as a dependent upon him so that after his death she may collect an insurance policy issued by such an association while she was still his wife, and naming her as beneficiary, although the judgment for alimony is still uncollected, upon the mere showing that such judgment is uncollected, without showing that there is no way in which the judgment can be satisfied.

fraternal benefit association, but was practically an old line life insurance company, although it collected money to meet its obligation by so-called annual dues instead of by premiums.

On Petition for Second Rehearing.

Same — vesting of interest — what determines.

4. Whether a policy of life insurance or a benefit policy issued to one for the benefit of another vests a present interest in the beneficiary depends, not upon the name or nature of the company, but on the terms of the policy, the existing statutes, and the by-laws, if any, by which such company and its policy holders are bound; and when such policy is issued to a member for the benefit of a proper beneficiary, then, in the absence of some statute, by-law, or contract to the contrary, the beneficiary thereby becomes vested with an interest which cannot be destroyed at the will of the insured.

Same — divorce — continuing policy.

5. Such a policy issued to a member of a mutual company, providing that the death benefit should be paid to such member's wife, naming her, entitled her to such benefit, although some years before the death of the insured she was divorced from him; it being shown that after such divorce and after his remarriage the insured kept the annual dues and demands paid and made no attempt to change the beneficiary.

Same — provision for surrender of policy.

6. A provision in the policy, that, should the insured reach the age of sixty-four and so desire, he could surrender such policy and receive back his payments with interest, is held to be a condition subsequent not impairing the vested interest of the beneficiary, unless and until the insured should reach the designated age and then choose to surrender.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County in favor of defendant Fannie E. Filley, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due on a benefit certificate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Eugene S. Quinton, Joseph G. Waters, and John Calhoun Waters, for appellant:

That the death benefit was payable to the status, wife of Clarence E. Filley, at the time of his death, is conclusively supported by the certificate.

Fannie E. Filley, having sought and obtained a divorce absolute, and thereby claiming no right, title, or interest in said death benefit, ceased to be the wife of Clarence E. Filley, and ceased to sustain any relationship to him, as fully as if he had never existed, and would not have an insurable interest, nor any interest, in his life by virtue of insurance upon his life, except to kill him to obtain the benefit accruing thereby.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, in addition to the facts admitted in the pleadings, signed by the attorneys for each party. It reads: "It is admitted by the plaintiff, through and by her attorneys, and the defendant Fannie E. Filley, by and through her attorneys, that this cause may be submitted to the court upon the following agreed statement of facts and the copy of the policy attached to plaintiff's petition, and upon the pleadings: That at the time of the issuance of the policy herein sued on, to wit, on or about the 7th day of June, 1883, the said Clarence E. Filley, upon whose life said policy was issued, was then and at that time lawfully married to Fannie E. Filley, the defendant herein, and the said Fannie E. Filley, defendant herein, was at that time the lawful wife of the said Clarence E. Filley. It is further admitted that on or about the 12th day of June, 1900, the said Fannie E. Filley, defendant herein, sought and obtained a divorce from her then husband, Clarence E. Filley, the insured named in said policy, sued on in this action, the said policy being a part of this agreed statement of facts; and that in said decree certain property was prayed for, and set apart and decreed to Fannie E. Filley, the defendant; and that said

Fannie E. Filley, defendant herein, is not claiming any right, title, or interest in said policy by virtue of said decree. That on or about the 20th day of March, 1901, the said Clarence E. Filley was married to the plaintiff herein, Mary Filley. And the said Mary Filley, plaintiff herein, was the wife of said Clarence E. Filley at the time of the death of Clarence E. Filley, the insured in said policy. The annual premiums upon said policy were paid annually by the said Clarence E. Filley, up until the time of his death, on the 24th day of August, 1910."

The determining question of law involved is whether, under these facts, Fannie E. Filley, who as the wife of the insured was made the beneficiary, is entitled to recover from the insurance company, she having been divorced before the death of the insured; or whether Mary Filley, whom the insured married after the divorce from Fannie, and who was the wife of the insured at the time of his death, is entitled to recover. Mary Filley, in the name of Mrs. Clarence E. Filley, brought this action, and Fannie E. Filley answered setting up her claims. The insurance company, defendant, having assumed the obligation of the Kansas Mutual Life Association, which issued the policy sued on, admitted its liability and paid the amount of the claim into court, and, upon the order of the court, it was dismissed from the action. The court rendered judgment in favor of Fannie E. Filley, and Mary Filley appeals, and assigns as error: First, that the court erred in rendering judgment for the appellee; second, in overruling the motion for a new trial; third, in not rendering judgment for the appellant.

The death benefit in the policy recited, in substance, that upon the receipt of satisfactory proof of the death of Clarence E. Filley, the insured, "he having conformed to all the conditions hereof, this association will pay to his wife, Fannie E. Filley, or to her legal representatives, the net proceeds of one full assessment . . . to an amount not to exceed $3,000." Also, "that should the said Clarence E. Filley live to the age of sixty-four years, and then choose to surrender this policy, this association will pay to said Clarence E. Filley the amount he has paid into the treasury on account of death and expectation indemnity assessments (less the 10 cents, cost of collection), with 4 per cent interest upon such payments. . . ."

Epitomizing the agreed facts, the appellee Fannie E. Filley, was the wife of the insured over seven years from the time of the issuance of the policy when she secured a divorce, and in the way of alimony was apportioned a part of his property; that, L.R.A.1915D.

about nine months after the divorce, the insured married the appellant, who remained his wife until the time of his death, over nine years thereafter. No claim is made by appellee by reason of any provision for her in the decree of divorce.

The appellant contends that the benefit was payable to the status, the person who sustained the relation of wife to Clarence E. Filley at the time of his death. The first ground for this contention is the language of the certificate or policy. It is said that, where two nouns indicate one person, the second serves to identify the first rather than the first to identify the second. We see no force in this contention.

On the other hand, the appellee, Fannie E. Filley, contends, and we think in accordance with the authorities, that the circumstances and relations of the parties at the time the contract for insurance was made should determine, if the terms of the contract are indefinite or uncertain, the purpose and intent of the insured. He had the right to designate any person or persons he chose as beneficiaries within the restrictions of the rules of the company, and, where the writing does not clearly indicate the purpose of the insured, the motives which actuate people, generally will be presumed to have actuated him. It may be said, without hesitation, that a man, with or without children, does not ordinarily prefer his wife's relatives in preference to his own in the descent or appropriation of his estate or of any interest in property which he controls. It is said in appellee's briefs that the insured and Fannie E. Filley had children, but there is no evidence of this in the agreed statement of facts. Whichever of the contending claimants was designated in the policy as the primary beneficiary, "her legal representatives" were clearly the alternative or secondary beneficiaries. If the motives which usually actuate men lead to the presumption that the secondary beneficiaries contemplated were related to him more nearly than his other relatives, the heirs of the primary beneficiary were probably his heirs.

So far as shown, the insured was at the time of the issuance of the policy living amicably with his then wife, and under such circumstances, in purchasing such a contract, a man ordinarily makes provision for the relations then existing, for the support and benefit of his then wife and their children, if any they have or are reasonably to be expected. It will not be presumed that the insured contemplated a divorce from his then wife, and in purchasing a policy of insurance was intending to make provision for another wife.

Yet it seems clear, if the policy be construed as designating the appellant as the beneficiary, that the words, "or her legal representatives," must also mean the legal representatives of the appellant. It also seems improbable that the insured could have contemplated a benefit to one succeeding his then wife, at the time of securing the contract of insurance; much less then that he contemplated a possible benefit to the second wife's heirs or legal representatives.

In 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 21, 23, it is said: "In interpreting a writing, the court, in order to determine its meaning, will consider all the facts and circumstances attending its execution. Among the circumstances so considered, are the relations of the parties, the nature and situation of the subject-matter, and the apparent purpose of making the instrument or contract in question. . . . It is but another statement of the same rule to say, as is frequently done, that the court will, if necessary, put itself in the place of the parties and read the instrument in the light of the circumstances surrounding them at the time it was made, and of the objects which they evidently had in view."

This is a well-recognized rule. Viewing the situation as of the time the policy was written, we conclude that the object of the insured was to protect his then wife, if she should survive him, his children by her, if any they had or might have. There is nothing to indicate that he contemplated a divorce from his then wife, which occurred seven years thereafter, or that he was contemplating any protection to anyone who might thereafter become his wife and maintain that relation at the uncertain time of his death.

The appellant cites the case of Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. v. Sturges, 18 Kan. 93, 26 Am. Rep. 701. In that case Sturges was the assignee of a policy of insurance on the life of a man in the continuance of which he had no interest whatever, and a benefit to him was not at all contemplated by the insured or the company at the time of the issuance of the policy.

The case of Hatch v. Hatch, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 373, 80 S. W. 411, is more closely analogous to this case; but in that case the wife was not named in the policy when it was procured. The intention of the insured to benefit her thereby seems to be negatived, inasmuch as some other person was made the beneficiary, and the wife procured the policy by assignment, and she thereafter obtained a divorce from her husband, the insured.

strument in this case is designated as a policy, and not as a certificate, and has more resemblance to an old line policy of insurance than to a mutual benefit certificate. At any rate, under the authorities, the question of appellee's right to receive the benefit depends largely on whether her rights vested at the time of the issuance of the policy, or could only vest upon the death of the insured. In support of the contention of the appellant, several fraternal insurance cases are cited, among which are Order of R. Conductors v. Koster, 55 Mo. App. 186, and Tyler v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Assn. 145 Mass. 134, 13 N. E. 360. In this class of cases it seems to be the general rule that no interest vests in the beneficiary until the death of the insured; while in the old line insurance cases the interest of the beneficiary is said to vest at the time of the execution of the policy.

The provisions of this policy are more like the provisions of old line life insurance policies than fraternal certificates. In this class of insurance policies we believe it is generally held that, when a married woman is named as a beneficiary in a policy of insurance on the life of her husband, she is entitled to the proceeds of the policy notwithstanding a divorce has been obtained by her before his death. Overhiser v. Overhiser, 14 Colo. App. 1, 59 Pac. 75; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Morris — N. J. Eq. —, 70 Atl. 924; Overhiser v. Overhiser, (Overhiser v. Mutual L. Ins. Co.) 63 Ohio St. 77, 50 L.R.A. 552, 81 Am. St. Rep. 612, 57 N. E. 965; Overbeck v. Overbeck, 155 Pa. 5, 25 Atl. 646; *White v. The judgment is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, Smith, J., on July 7, 1914, handed down the following additional opinion (93 Kan. 193, 144 Pac. 257):

The former opinion in this case is found in 91 Kan. 220, ante, 137 Pac. 793. On the reargument the appellant vigorously objects to the following statements in the original opinion:

"The instrument in this case . . . has more resemblance to an old line policy of insurance than to a mutual benefit certificate.

"While in the old line insurance cases the interest of the beneficiary is said to vest at the time of the execution of the policy.

"The provisions of this policy are more like the provisions of old line life insurance policies than fraternal certificates."

It is also contended that the case of Johnson v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 91 Kan. 314, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 461, 137 Pac. 1190, is controlling in this case. In that case the policy or certificate was issued by a "fraternal beneficiary association," defined by § 4303 of the General Statutes of 1909 as follows: "A fraternal beneficiary association is hereby declared to be such a corporation, society or voluntary association of individuals, formed or organized into a lodge system with ritualistic form of work, or composed of members of an order or society having a lodge system with a ritualistic form of work, or of such members, their wives, widows, or daughters, as shall make provision for the payment of benefits in case of death, sickness, or temporary or permanent disability, and shall be carried on for the sole benefit of its members and their beneficiaries, and not for profit."

The distinction between the two policies is fairly made in the Johnson Case, supra, as follows: "The right of a divorced wife to recover upon a policy of insurance naming her as the beneficiary" is upheld in the case of Filley v. Illinois L. Ins. Co., "the distinction between that case and this resting wholly upon the statute . . . which controls in the case of beneficiary associations, and which has no force or effect upon ordinary life insurance policies."

Practically the only difference between the policy in question and the ordinary life insurance policy is that the Kansas Mutual Life Association, which issued the policy, derived the money to meet its debt demands by what is denominated "annual dues" of $4, which the holder of each policy agreed to pay to the association on the 1st of January of each year, and an admission fee of $16, instead of collecting annual premiums. The association agreed to pay on policies only the gross amount collected for so-called dues, less 10 cents for collection, and retained to itself as profits any excess over the amount of the insurance which might be collected from the policy holders. The policy in question was issued in 1883, and there seems to have been no statute of the state at that time authorizing or defining fraternal beneficiary associations.

The defendant is an old line life insurance company organized for profit, as was also the Kansas Mutual Life Association organized for profit, but not to the policy holders or members of the association.

It appears by the exhibit attached to the policy that the Illinois Life Insurance L.R.A.1915D.

Company presented a proposition to the trustees of the Kansas Mutual Life Association to assume and reinsure the policies of the Kansas company, and that such proposition was duly accepted by unanimous vote of the policy holders, and the Illinois company was subrogated to all the rights, liabilities, and obligations of the Kansas company on the policy in question, and agreed to assume and carry out the provisions of the policy as in such proposition provided. It thereby appears that the Illinois company acquired the rights of the Kansas company as well as its liabilities. The policy holders, of course, could not transfer the rights of the company, so it is apparent that there was a tripartite agreement, the consideration for which does not appear, nor whether the Kansas company received a profit in the transfer.

It is a general rule that one may take out a policy on his own life for the benefit of any person he may choose to designate, in the absence of a statute or of a provision in the constitution or by-laws of fraternal association to the contrary, and statutory provisions of this character are held prospective, and not retrospective, in their operation. 1 Cooley, Briefs on Ins. pp. 796-798.

Any provision of our statute subsequent to the issuance of the policy is therefore not applicable to this case. United States v. American Sugar Ref. Co. 202 U. S. 563, 50 L. ed. 1149, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 717; Winfree v. Northern P. R. Co. 227 U. S. 296, 57 L. ed. 518, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Union P. R. Co. v. Laramie Stockyards Co. 231 U. S. 190, 58 L. ed. 179, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 101.

The fact that the Kansas company collected annual dues instead of premiums did not make it a beneficiary society. State v. Moore, 38 Ohio St. 7.

An "old line life insurance company" is generally a corporation which insures any applicant who passes the medical examination and otherwise can meet the rules of the company, and the insured does not thereby become a member of the company. Yet, as in this case, the consent of the policy holder would be necessary to substitute another corporation in place of the insurer, and to relieve the insurer from liability. On the other hand, the individual member of a strictly mutual life insurance association or fraternal benefit association is at once an insurer as to his fellow members, and, in turn, is insured by them. None but members of the association are insured. The Kansas Mutual Life Association was not such an association. We adhere to the statement in the former opinion that "the provisions of this policy are more like the provisions of old line life insurance policies than fraternal certificates." 91 Kan. 225.

It is contended that Fannie E. Filley had no vested interest in the policy of insurance for the reason that, if the insured lived to the age of sixty-four years, he had the option of receiving the cash benefit of the policy to himself, and thus divesting any interest of Fannie E. Filley therein. This constituted a condition subsequent, and not a condition precedent. The general rule seems to be that the person designated as the beneficiary in a life insurance policy is entitled to the benefit, and neither the insured nor the insurer can change it to the detriment of the beneficiary. Van Bibber v. Van Bibber, 82 Ky. 350.

We think the right to the benefit provided in this policy vested immediately in Fannie E. Filley, subject only to the right of the insured as provided therein. Her right was subject to a defeasance, but was a substantial vested right until the defeasance should occur, and it never did occur. The insured could defeat the beneficiary's rights under the policy only as provided therein. Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 42 Conn. 60, 19 Am. Rep. 530; Voss v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 119 Mich. 161, 44 L.R.A. 689, 77 N. W. 697.

On reconsideration we are assured of the correctness of the former decision, and it is adhered to.

The judgment is reaffirmed.

A second petition for rehearing having been filed, West, J., on November 14, 1914, handed down the following response:

In view of the literature on file in this case, especially the somewhat emphatic petition for a second rehearing, it has been determined to re-examine the questions presented by the record, and the writer has been assigned the task of formulating the result.

It is mutually conceded and asserted that an ordinary old line policy vests a personal interest in the beneficiary; hence no authorities need be cited in support of that proposition. Of course, such vested interest arises from the contract, and the corollary follows that the obligations of such contract cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation or by the unauthorized act of the insured.

It must also be conceded that the certificate of an ordinary mutual benefit society is subject to whatever changes are permitted by its charter or by-laws or by statutes existing when the certificate is issued.

Both parties have argued the case on the theory that the right of Fannie E. Filley depends largely on the question whether the L.R.A.1915D.

character of the company and the terms of its policy require the application of the old line rule or the benefit society rule, and it is vehemently asserted that the policy in question can by no logical possibility be deemed old line in nature or by resemblance.

All we have to enlighten us on this point is the policy itself and the statute in force when it was issued; neither the charter nor the by-laws, if any, being in evidence. The act of 1898 as amended in 1899 (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 4303) cannot apply for the reason already indicated. Whether a policy or certificate be issued by an old line or by a mutual benefit company, the question of a vested interest thereby passing must be determined, not by the name of the company, nor even by its general character, but by the nature of the contract, which must be held to include the statutes in existence applicable thereto, the same as if written in, and all the by-laws and regulations by which those who deal with the company are bound. Block v. Valley Mut. Ins. Asso. 52 Ark. 201, 20 Am. St. Rep. 167, 12 S. W. 477; United States Casualty Co. v. Kacer, 169 Mo. 301, 58 L.R.A. 436, 92 Am. St. Rep. 641, 69 S. W. 370. When this policy was issued in 1883, the general insurance act of 1871 as amended was then in force. Gen. Stat. 1889, §§ 3316 et seq. Section 3402 provided that the act should not apply to life insurance companies organized on the co-operative plan, which provision was held to apply to the Bankers' & Merchants Benefit Association in State v. Bankers' & M. Mut. Ben. Asso. 23 Kan. 499. In State v. Vigilant Ins. Co. 30 Kan. 585, 2 Pac. 840, 842, it was held that the Vigilant Insurance Company, though formed to afford mutual protection and indemnity to its members in case of loss by death and theft of certain private personal property, was an insurance company, and as such covered by the insurance law; but it was said: "As to life insurance companies organized on the co-operative plan, they are expressly exempted from the provisions of that act." p. 588.

Ordinary life insurance companies were prohibited from doing business unless upon an actual capital of at least $100,000. We find no other statute then in force directly affecting the policy or the question involved. Being relegated therefore to the policy itself, we observe that it recites that, in consideration of the representations and agreements made in the application, the payment of an admission fee of $16, the payment of a sum not exceeding $4, annually on the 1st day of January, and the prompt payment of such benefit assessment as may legally be levied by the directors, the association issues such policy to Clarence E. Filley, with certain agreements.

One of these agreements is that on substantial proof of his death the association will pay to his wife, Fannie E. Filley, or her legal representatives, the net proceeds of one full assessment, less the 10 cents cost of collection, at schedule rates, upon all members of good standing at the date of his death until such assessment shall exceed $1,500. Then the assessment shall be for an amount in proportion to the policy held by each, not exceeding schedule rates, and to an amount not to exceed $3,000. Further, that, should the insured live to the age of sixty-four years and then choose to surrender the policy, the association would pay to him the amount he had paid into the treasury on account of death and expectation assessments, less the 10 cents cost of collection, with 4 per cent interest, "provided that no assessments for the purpose of paying this expectation indemnity shall exceed the regular death assessment, and provided further, that in no case shall the payment upon this policy exceed $3,000, and it is further agreed by the association that all moneys collected by assessment aforesaid (less the cost of collection) shall be applied to the adjustment of those claims only."

Among the special conditions named in the policy is the following: "The association may classify its membership for the purpose of assessments when it shall appear expedient, in which case members shall only be assessed to pay benefits in their own class."

The schedule rates already referred to, on which assessments were to be based, are expressly named and classified according to age.

The provision permitting the assured, after reaching the age of sixty-four years, to surrender and settle for cash, we regard as a condition subsequent. The policy assured the payment to the beneficiary, conditioned of course on the payment by the insured of all the assessments and demands. Should the insured live to be sixty-four and then choose to surrender the policy and take the cash proceeds instead of allowing the insurance to continue, he could do so; the double contingency, his age and his choice, having been reached, and thus the subsequent condition having been met. 2 Words & Phrases, 1401.

Section 76 of the act of 1871 (Gen. Stat. 1889, § 3400; Gen. Stat. 1909, § 4144) provides that in case any life insurance company organized under the laws of this state issues any policy of insurance upon the life of any person or persons for another's benefit, and such beneficiary dies during the lifetime of the person or persons whose life or lives are assured, it shall be lawful for such company to receive from the assured an affidavit setting forth the facts in the case; and, if it shall appear from such affidavit that the affiants have paid the annual premium, and intended thereby to insure for the benefit of the person named in the policy as beneficiary, that such policy has not been assigned or transferred, and nominates or appoints some other beneficiary, "it shall then be the duty of said insurance company to take up and cancel said policies, at the request of said assured, and issue in like terms another policy or policies upon the life or lives of said insured for the benefit of the beneficiary in said affidavit nominated." Gen. Stat. 1909, § 4144. Of course, this does not in terms cover the present situation, for here the insured instead of the beneficiary died first. But the principle involved is analogous to the one under consideration touching the right to change beneficiaries. This section was thoroughly considered in Olmstead v. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. 37 Kan. 93, 14 Pac. 449. In that case a Kansas co-operative society, organized to give financial aid and benefit to the widows, orphans, and dependents of deceased members, issued a certificate to David D. Olmstead in 1874, by which his beneficiaries were to be entitled at his death to a sum not exceeding $2,000, if certain rules and agreements were complied with; the express agreement being that the benefit should be paid to Jennett Olmstead, his wife, or her legal representatives. In August, 1884, the insured died. Shortly before he had made a will by which he attempted to bequeath the benefit in question to his children, and to the executor for the payment of certain debts and items of expense. During his life Mr. Olmstead retained possession of the certificate and kept the fees and assessments paid. No affidavit was filed and no other certificate was issued to take the place of the original. The executor sued, and the company brought the money into court and asked that the legal representatives and heirs of Jennett Olmstead be made parties. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover. It was said (p. 96) that, however well founded the distinction may be between old line and benefit companies and policies, the beneficiary can only be changed and the benefit transferred to another in the manner prescribed by the rules and the regulations of the society, and in accordance with the terms of the contract.

"The contract in this case specifically provided that the benefit should be paid to the wife of the member, or to her legal representatives. The addition of the words 'legal representatives' clearly imports that, in case of her death, the benefit should be paid to her heirs or next of kin who fall within the classes mentioned in the charter to whom aid may be given. Thus, the contract fixed and limited the persons who might receive the benefit. . . . No provision was made in the certificate of membership for a change in the beneficiary, and the record does not show what rules, if any, the society had made respecting such change." 37 Kan. 96.

It was further held that, the statute having provided one way to change the beneficiary, no other was intended, and that the insured had no interest in the benefit arising from his membership; that it could in no event become a part of his estate; hence he could not bequeath it. This decision has been referred to with approval in Kemper v. Modern Woodmen, 70 Kan. 119, 78 Pac. 452; Pilcher v. Puckett (Modern Woodmen v. Puckett), 77 Kan. 284, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1083, 94 Pac. 132; Boise v. Shepard, 78 Kan. 308, 96 Pac. 485; Modern Woodmen v. Comeaux, 79 Kan. 493, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 814, 101 Pac. 1, 17 Ann. Cas. 865; and cited in Hunt v. Remsberg, 83 Kan. 665, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 246, 112 Pac. 590, 21 Ann. Cas. 1267. The same reasoning must apply here. There is nothing in the statute or policy, and nothing shown in any charter or by-laws, authorizing the insured to change the beneficiary or to transfer the benefit, in which he had no interest and which could not become a part of his estate save upon condition subsequent, as already shown. Although he was a member of the association, which at the time issued policies to none but members, still the policy evidenced the contract between the association and him, made for the benefit of another on sufficient consideration, and no authority appears by which the member could change the terms or impair the obligation of such contract.

But it is contended that the subsequent divorce destroyed the status of wife, and that the remarriage of the insured brought about a relationship and condition demanding a change of beneficiary from the first to the second wife, and that it was the woman who should be his wife at death that he really intended as the beneficiary. It is remarkable that Mr. Filley continued to pay all sums required by the terms of the policy after the divorce, after the remarriage up to his death, with no attempt to change the policy or the beneficiary. It would seem a natural inference that he made no such attempt because he had no desire to, or else because he knew he could not succeed. It would appear from certain statements in the briefs that he adjusted certain financial matters with his first wife, and yet we hear no suggestion that such adjustment included the beneficial interest under this policy. Not only do we think reason and the weight of authority favor the theory that when he took out the policy he contemplated no divorce or remarriage, but that at all events he entered into a contract which left him without power to change the beneficiary. Indeed, there is no evidence that he ever dreamed of the benefit going other than as provided in the policy.

It must be presumed that the divorce was obtained legally, and a legal proceeding cannot be deemed to abrogate an existing contract in nowise involved in such proceeding. The rights of the company, the insured, and the beneficiary became fixed upon the issuance of the policy, and they cannot be held to have become impaired by orderly litigation occurring afterwards over other matters.

The language of the policy, "his wife, Fannie E. Filley," is plain enough without resort to technical rules of grammar. We do not think the average man could err in understanding its meaning, and we are content with the clearness thus apparent on the face of the instrument.

The indorsement on the outside of the policy, "Clarence E. Filley in favor of his wife," is not sufficiently significant of the real contract inside to control or modify the terms thereof.

But it is insisted that, when the original beneficiary ceased to be the wife, the condition subsequent contained in the policy by which the insured could, at sixty-four, surrender and receive his payments with interest, rendered it to her interest to hasten his departure, and therefore placed matters in an unlawful condition; it appearing that Fannie E. Filley makes no claim here on account of the decree of divorce. Counsel correctly argue that a divorce ends the relation of husband and wife, and this is followed by the suggestion that it would be against public policy to allow one to be a beneficiary in a policy of insurance upon the life of the other. The case of Hatch v. Hatch, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 373, 80 S. W. 411, is in some respects similar to the one at bar, and the decision to quite a degree supports counsel's contention. Riley v. Riley, 75 Wis. 464, 44 N. W. 112, was decided chiefly on the effects of the by-laws. Order of R. Conductors v. Koster, 55 Mo. App. 186, holds that a benefit certificate speaks with reference to the conditions existing at the death of the member, and that when the by-laws require the beneficiary to have an insurable interest, and the certificate designates the beneficiary mainly by the relationship of wife, her rights lapse. This also supports the theory contended for. In Tyler v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Asso.

145 Mass. 134, 13 N. E. 360, the by-laws required the beneficiaries to be heirs or members of the decedent's family, and it was quite naturally held that a divorced wife was neither. In Goldsmith v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 18 Abb. N. C. 325, 41 Hun, 641, 2 N. Y. S. R. 610, the insured sued to reform a policy upon his life "for the sole and separate use and benefit of his wife, Lina Goldsmith; but in case of her previous death, to revert to the insured" (p. 328), and it was held that the agent who acted as scrivener or amanuensis for the insured did not word the policy so as to express the intention of the latter that his wife should have the insurance if his wife at his death. The court also thought this the real effect of the words used, and the matter was held in abeyance until the findings could be produced and examined to see if they would support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

But the authorities opposing counsel's view are numerous and convincing and impress us as much more in accord with the right and reason of the matter. Among these may be mentioned Wallace v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 478, and note (97 Minn. 27, 106 N. W. 84); note in 49 L.R.A. 749; Overhiser v. Overhiser (Overhiser v. Mutual L. Ins. Co.) 63 Ohio St. 77, 50 L.R.A. 553, 81 Am. St. Rep. 612, 57 N. E. 965; White v. Brotherhood of American Yeomen, 124 Iowa, 293, 66 L.R.A. 164, 104 Am. St. Rep. 323, 90 N. W. 1071, 2 Ann. Cas. 350, and note 351; McGrew v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 132 Cal. 85, 84 Am. St. Rep. 20, 64 Pac. 103; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251; Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 253; 25 Cyc. 889.

It must be remembered that we have a case in which there appears no provision for a change of beneficiary, and no desire to make a change, but a continuance of payments after the divorce the same as before. The decision in Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. v. Sturges, 18 Kan. 93, 26 Am. Rep. 761, is cited. It was held there that one, to take by purchase or assignment an insurance on another's life, must have an interest in such life. Haynes took out a policy on his own life for $2,000 and afterwards assigned it to Sturges, who had no interest in his life. The company assented, and Sturges continued the payment of the premiums. The court said the contract amounted to a bet for each year that the insured would not live the year out, but, "where such contracts are associated with beneficent and modifying circumstances (as many insurance contracts are supposed to be) making them beneficial to society, they are generally upheld, notwithstanding their wagering characteristic." 18 Kan. 95. But here the proceeds of the policy were not payable to Mr. Filley, but to his wife, Fannie E. Filley, and the fact that she had been his wife many years and had borne him children made the circumstances quite different from those in the Sturges Case, and we cannot regard the decision as either applicable or controlling.

Whatever the character of the Illinois Life Insurance Company, its contract attached to the policy simply subrogates it to the rights, liabilities, and obligations of the Kansas Mutual Company, and it agrees to assume and carry out the provisions of the policy as provided in a certain proposition "to assume and reinsure the policies" of that company. Having paid the money into the court for the benefit of the claimant found to be entitled thereto, it is not necessary to consider further the nature of the Illinois Life Insurance Company's charter or contract.

For the reasons hereinbefore set forth, the result of the two former decisions (91 Kan. 220, ante, 137 Pac. 793; 93 Kan. 193, ante, 144 Pac. 257) must stand. Whatever may be found in either of them inconsistent herewith may be regarded as expunged.

The motion for a second rehearing is denied.

(December 12, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County in favor of interpleader in a garnishment proceeding to reach the proceeds of a draft in satisfaction of a debt of the drawer. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Eugene S. Quinton, for appellant:

The draft deposited for collection and credited to the depositor's account was not the property of the bank.

Mr. B. F. Scandrett also for appellee.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On November 17, 1911, the W. H. McIntyre Company drew a draft for $3,412.50 upon Charles D. Scott, of Topeka, payable to the City National Bank of Auburn, Indiana, and delivered it to the bank, with a bill of lading attached. The bank sent the draft to a Topeka bank for collection. Scott paid the draft November 27th, and on the same day brought an action against the McIntyre Company for $1,955, garnishing the Topeka bank, which filed an answer setting out the facts, and stating that it held the proceeds of the draft subject to the order of the court. Service by publication was made upon the defendant, which made no appearance, and judgment was taken against it. The Auburn bank interpleaded, claiming to be the owner of the money in the hands of the Topeka bank, which was paid into court to await the result of the litigation. The plaintiff filed a denial of the allegations of the interplea, and a jury was impaneled to try the issue. Evidence was taken, and the court directed a verdict for the interpleader, upon which judgment was rendered. The plaintiff appeals.

The evidence as to the transactions between the McIntyre Company and the Auburn bank was in the form of depositions. It was uncontradicted, and must be deemed to have established these facts: The draft was delivered to the bank by the company in the usual course of business, and, in accordance with custom, credit was at once given to the company on the books of the bank and in the pass book of the company, whose account was at the time overdrawn in the sum of $2,070.44. Five days later it was again overdrawn. The practice was for the bank to accept such drafts, send them out for collection, credit the company at once with their face, and, when the returns were received, charge the company with interest to that time; the understanding being that, if payment should be refused in any instance the amount of the item should be charged back to the depositor.

Various assignments of error are made, but the case turns upon the question whether the title to the draft and its proceeds at the time of the garnishment was in the Auburn bank, or in the McIntyre Company;

whether the bank took the draft as a purchaser, or for collection. There is much apparent and considerable real conflict in the decisions bearing on the matter. They are collected in notes in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 694, and 86 Am. St. Rep. 782. The general rule has been thus stated: "Prima facie, according to the weight of authority, the passing to the credit of the depositor, of a check bearing an indorsement not indicating that it was deposited for collection merely, passes the title to the bank. Still, according to the weight of authority, the rule above stated is not an absolute rule, and is prima facie merely, and yields to the intention of the parties, expressed or implied from the circumstances." 3 R. C. L. 524.

See also Noble v. Doughten, 72 Kan. 336, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1167, 83 Pac. 1048.

In Beal v. Somerville, 17 L.R.A. 291, 1 C. C. A. 598, 5 U. S. App. 141, 50 Fed. 647, which in one of the notes referred to (7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 694, 700) and which is classed with the minority decisions, it was held that the right of the bank to charge back the item to the depositor in the event of its nonpayment is inconsistent with the hypothesis that title thereto had passed to the bank. This view has been adopted in a number of cases, of which Armour Packing Co. v. Davis, 118 N. C. 548, 24 S. E. 365, is typical. It has been denied in others, examples of which are: Auto & A. Mfg. Co. v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 116 Md. 179, 81 Atl. 294; American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gueder & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 336, 37 N. E. 227; and Fourth Nat. Bank v. Mayer, 89 Ga. 108, 14 S. E. 891.

Of the Beal-Somerville Case one of the text-writers says: "This last is the only able examination of the matter that has been made. It expressly disapproves 2 Morse, Banking, 896." Zane, Banks & Bkg. § 133, p. 211, note 14.

Another says of it: "The court lays much weight on the fact that the indorsement was 'for deposit,' which was held, erroneously, it is submitted (ante, note 64), to import a bailment, with the result that it rested on the bank to support affirmatively a claim that on the deposit it became an owner of the check." Tiffany, Banks & Bkg. § 11, p. 38, note 82.

We cannot regard the right of a bank receiving a draft for deposit to charge the amount back to the depositor if payment is refused, as having a determining influence. Such a right on the part of the bank would seem to be an ordinary incident even of a deposit which is accepted as cash. The transaction is based upon the supposition that the draft is going to be paid. A guaranty of payment often results from the indorsement, but, however evidenced, it should not militate against the theory of a passing of the title. The fact that the depositor has guaranteed the payment of a draft with a bill of lading attached should not prevent the bank from holding the goods or their proceeds, and looking first to them, as against the depositor or any claimant under him, such as an attaching creditor. See Shaffer Bros. v. Rhynders, 116 Iowa, 472, 89 N. W. 1099; German Nat. Bank v. Grinstead, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 674, 52 S. W. 951.

Some of the conflict in the decisions bearing upon the general aspects of the question can be accounted for by differences in the facts, and the manner in which the issue of ownership has been raised, but in some instances the divergence is due to the attitude taken as to the effect of giving immediate credit to the depositor. An extended review of the authorities is not thought necessary. Here we regard the result as controlled by the circumstances that the depositor not only received credit for the amount of the draft, but actually drew upon it, and used the full amount. When the item was deposited, the account of the McIntyre Company was overdrawn. The credit operated at once to offset the depositor's debt to the bank. Before the garnishment summons issued, the account was again overdrawn, and the credit thereby exhausted. In this situation the McIntyre Company could not successfully have asserted a claim to the draft or its proceeds against the Auburn bank, and the attaching creditor could gain no higher rights than were possessed by the defendant. Ladd & T. Bank v. Commercial State Bank, 64 Or. 486, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 657, 130 Pac. 975. In Perth Amboy Gaslight Co. v. Middlesex County Bank, 60 N. J. Eq. 84, 45 Atl. 704, which leans to the view favoring the theory of a bailment, rather than a purchase, where a draft is deposited for credit, the court says: "If a depositor deposits a check or draft on a third party with the understanding, either expressed or implied, that he is to draw against it at once as if it were cash, and the bank agrees to accept it and treat it as cash, and the depositor draws against it before the amount is realized by the bank, then it is properly treated as a deposit of cash. Or, if the depositor is already indebted to the bank, and the deposit is received in whole or partial payment, the same result follows." p. 91.

In National Bank v. Everett, 136 Ga. 372, 71 S. E. 660—an attachment case—this language was used: "The evidence discloses that at the time of the deposit the drawer had overdrawn its account, and the deposit was entered as cash to its credit; that the drawer was not only accustomed to draw against deposits of this character, but actually did draw. These circumstances evince the parties' intention to treat the draft as a deposit of money, and therefore the title to the draft and the bill of lading attached is in the bank." p. 374.

Of the situation arising even where a restricted indorsement indicates that a draft is deposited for collection, it is said: "If, notwithstanding such restrictive indorsements, advances are actually made to the depositor, the title passes. . . . The mere crediting of paper thus indorsed to the depositor as cash does not transfer the title. If the depositor has a right to draw at once for the amount credited as though it were a cash deposit, in some states the title passes; in others it does not pass until he has actually drawn." 5 Cyc. 497.

The bank in its interplea described itself as the owner of the proceeds of the draft. Whether its interest amounted to a full title or to a lien for what it had advanced is not material, since the controlling facts were fully developed. Whether the title to a draft passes to a bank which gives the depositor credit immediately upon its receipt depends upon the actual or presumed intention of the parties, and may, in a particular case, be a question of fact for a jury. Here the only direct testimony concerning the actual purpose of the McIntyre Company and the Auburn bank is to the effect that a purchase was intended, and not a deposit for collection. This testimony, however, probably amounted only to the statement of a legal conclusion. The character of the transaction is determined by the circumstances already stated. The draft bore a serial number placed upon it by the Auburn bank. A witness for the plaintiff testified that it was the practice of banks to assign such a number (corresponding to that entered in a register) to items which were received for collection, but not to those accepted as cash. This is relied upon as evidence to support a finding that the title to the draft remained in the company. We agree with the trial court that, upon all the evidence, the question of ownership was one of law, and that the fact that a serial number had been assigned to the draft by the Auburn bank cannot affect the matter, in view of the other circumstances which serve fully to characterize the transaction.

Complaint is made of the rejection of evidence offered by the plaintiff, but we regard it as insufficient to influence the result.

The judgment is affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

J. C. BORTON, Appt.,
v.
GEORGE MANGUS.

(93 Kan. 719, 145 Pac. 835.)

Injunction — obstruction of highway — special injury.

One who has occasion to pass over a highway more frequently than others does not sustain special damage peculiar to himself beyond that of the general public which would entitle him to relief by injunction.

(January 9, 1915.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court of Sherman County sustaining a demurrer to his petition filed to enjoin the obstruction of a public highway. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Hartzler, for appellant:

Plaintiff suffered special damages peculiar to himself beyond that of the general public, and was entitled to an injunction.

Mr. G. L. Calvert also for appellee.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought suit to enjoin the obstruction of a public highway, and appeals than that suffered by the general public by an obstruction in a road, but was simply compelled to travel over another route just as convenient in point of distance as the old one, was held not entitled to maintain an action to enjoin the obstruction of the old road.

In Painter v. Gunderson, 123 Minn. 323, 143 N. W. 910, one who was accustomed to go to a lake, over a highway extending from another highway to the lake, and by boat in summer and on the ice in winter to a village across the lake and to other places, and who was accustomed to use the highway in hauling water from the lake for use on his farm and ice in the winter for storage, and in getting water from the lake for use in a threshing engine which he operated, was held not entitled to maintain an action to abate an obstruction of the road as a nuisance. The plaintiff was obliged to adopt a more circuitous route, and was unable to make use of water and ice from the lake as formerly. The plaintiff also alleged that his farm, which was in the neighborhood, was depreciated in value on account of the obstruction of the road.

The mere fact that one used a road was held not to show sufficient special interest in such person to entitle her to a mandatory injunction commanding the removing of the obstruction and restraining the further obstruction of the road. Owens v. Varnell, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 145 S. W. 256. In the course of the opinion it is stated that "the bare statement that the road was used by appellee and her tenants to go to see their neighbors and children, to go to the county seat to pay taxes, and that it added to the value of appellee's place, will not suffice to show such special injury."

The plaintiff is a stock grower and farmer, and owns and resides on a farm located in the state of Colorado adjoining the line between that state and Kansas. The defendant is the owner of land lying in Kansas immediately east of the lands of the plaintiff. It appears from the petition that there is a north and south road in Colorado adjoining plaintiff's land on the east, which road lies wholly within the state of Colorado, and that there is also a road in Colorado running east and west through the lands of the plaintiff and which is 200 yards south of his residence, and that this east and west road intersects the north and south road and connects with a road in Kansas which the plaintiff claims the defendant has obstructed.

The plaintiff alleges that the obstructed road became a highway by special act of the legislature of Kansas (chapter 215,

On the contrary it has been held that one who uses a highway in going to and from his home to a distant tract of land owned by him at least twice each day sustains a special injury by the closing of the highway where he is required to travel another road about twice the length of the old road. Ingalls v. Eastman, 61 Wash. 289, 112 Pac. 372, following Sholin v. Skamania Boom Co. 56 Wash. 303, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1053, 105 Pac. 632.

The cases covered in the present note and the earlier note supplemented hereby are intended to be limited to those in which the question of special damages is determined independently of damages to property. The line between these two classes of cases has not always been kept distinct, as will be noticed from some cases included in the present note, viz., Painter v. Gunderson, and Ingalls v. Eastman, supra; but cases which turn upon the ownership of neighboring property have been excluded.

W. A. E.

Laws of 1887) declaring all section lines in Sherman and certain other counties in Kansas to be public highways, and to be of the width of 60 feet. The section line between sections 19 and 30 in township 8 of range 42 in Sherman county runs through the tract of land owned by the defendant, and the plaintiff alleges that by virtue of this act of the legislature and the use by the public for a number of years it became a public highway. The town of Kanorado is in Kansas and is the postoffice and market town of the plaintiff. When the road in question was opened and used by the public, the plaintiff could travel from his farm in Colorado to the town of Kanorado, and it furnished the nearest highway to the town from his land and residence. He alleges that the defendant has erected and maintains buildings and fences thereon, and that the obstruction compels him, in order to reach the town of Kanorado, to drive about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south on the north and south road in Colorado, then by an angling road northeast to town; and that on every trip he makes to the town, either for business or pleasure, he must travel about 2 miles more by reason of such obstruction.

It will be observed that there is no allegation in the petition that the plaintiff is denied ingress to or egress from his farm by reason of the obstruction, and, indeed, the facts show that his lands do not abut upon the road which defendant has obstructed. The obstructed road lies wholly within the state of Kansas; his farm lies in Colorado. The allegation is that the obstructed road intersects the north and south highway along the state line, and is a continuation of an east and west road which runs 200 yards south of plaintiff's residence. It therefore affirmatively appears that he has ample means to get to and from his farm by the highways in Colorado.

The rule is firmly established in this state and is of general application everywhere that, to entitle a private individual to invoke the interposition of a court of equity to restrain a public nuisance arising from an obstruction of a public highway, he must show special damages apprehended or sustained peculiar to himself and different in character from those suffered by the public at large. Venard v. Cross, 8 Kan. 248; Trosper v. Saline County, 27 Kan. 391; Ruthstrom v. Peterson, 72 Kan. 679, 83 Pac. 825. In the latter case the court interpreted the petition to mean that a public road 40 feet wide was established on the west side of a tract of land and along the east side of the land belonging to the plaintiff. The obstruction interfered with the east 20 feet of the road, but left a strip 20 feet wide on the west side of the road adjoining the land belonging to the plaintiff, and, because the court could not judicially declare that a 20-foot strip of land was too narrow for plaintiff's use as a road to and alongside of his land, it was held that he failed to show special damages different in character from that sustained by the public at large. In the opinion it was said: "The only special right which an abutting owner has in a public highway is that of access to his premises. When he has passed from his land into the road, his right to travel there is not different from the right enjoyed by other members of the community." Page 680 of 72 Kan.

In Sargent v. George, 56 Vt. 627, the court refused relief by injunction where the damage complained of was the obstruction of a passageway leading from a house to the street for the reason that but a few rods distant there existed another way equally available and in daily use. One who has occasion to pass over a highway more frequently than others does not sustain special damages peculiar to himself beyond that of the general public, which would entitle him to relief by injunction. In Wellborn v. Davies, 40 Ark. 83, it was held that the inconvenience resulting to a physician in visiting his patients caused by the obstruction of a public road by fences is not a special injury different from that which every citizen suffers whose business or pleasure may cause him to travel the road. It is of the same character, only perhaps different in degree, from that which others suffer who have other business and live far away.

In Crook v. Pitcher, 61 Md. 510, it was held that the fact that one who had very frequent occasion to use a highway is obliged to travel a longer road because of an obstruction does not show a special damage different from that which the public sustains. To the same effect is Jacksonville. T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 34 Fla. 346, 26 L.R.A. 410, 16 So. 282; Sohn v. Cambern, 106 Ind. 302, 6 N. E. 813. There is some conflict of authority upon this question in the different states. See notes in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 73; and 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1053.

The allegations in the petition are to the effect that the plaintiff can and does go from his land to a public road and reaches the market town in Kansas by traveling one-half mile south, and then by a road northeast to Kanorado. As said in Ruthstrom v. Peterson, supra: "When he has passed from his land into the road his right to travel there is not different from the right enjoyed by other members of the community." (P. 680.)

The same principle would seem to apply here. There is a road which reaches his land and by which he can pass to and from town. The inconvenience resulting to him from the obstruction of the road is of the same character that every citizen suffers who, from business or pleasure, has occasion to travel the road. It may differ in degree, but not in kind, from that which others suffer who have occasion to use the road. He is not denied access to his land by the alleged obstruction, but is merely required, like others, to travel a longer distance between his land and the town.

If the state line between Kansas and Colorado were located a mile farther west than it is, and the plaintiff's land lay in this state, and the road when open, as the plaintiff contends it should be, extended from the town to the road running north and south along the plaintiff's land, he could not enjoin the obstruction complained of because he would still have free access to his land, and would be unable to show that he sustained a damage different in kind and character from that suffered by the public at large. It will therefore be unnecessary to discuss the interesting question whether the action is transitory or local, or whether the courts of this state would entertain jurisdiction in a suit by a nonresident to enjoin the obstruction of a highway in Kansas upon the theory that the obstruction closed a road and resulted in denying him access to or egress from lands in Colorado.

It is said in the abstract that the court sustained the demurrer on the ground that the plaintiff lacked legal capacity to sue, which was one of the grounds of the demurrer, as was also the ground that the petition failed to state a cause of action. The plaintiff has legal capacity to sue, but, being in court, is unable to state facts which constitute a cause of action entitling him to relief.

The judgment therefore will be affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

FOREST G. SHAW, Appt.,
v.

INGRAM-DAY LUMBER COMPANY.

Sale — right to accept rejected offers.

1. One who, in response to a quotation for flooring, orders a quantity with an irregular matching to which the quotation did not apply, which the seller declines to fill, cannot perfect a contract by merely notifying the seller that regular matching will be satisfactory, since, having rejected L.R.A.1915D.

the original offer, his power to accept it without renewal was gone.

Custom — effect on contract.

2. A usage or custom, to be a guide in the construction of contracts, must be uniform, reasonable, and generally known.

(February 19, 1913.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Second Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, dismissing his counterclaim in an action brought to recover the price of three cars of lumber sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Harry A. Shaw, for appellant:

The correspondence, regardless of any question of custom, shows a complete contract for five cars of flooring.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coyle, 123 Ky. 854, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 433, 124 Am. St. Rep. 384, 97 S. W. 772; Eckert v. Schoch, 155 Pa. 530, 26 Atl. 654; Bauman v. McManus, 75 Kan. 106, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1138, 89 Pac. 15; Pitcher v. Lowe, 95 Ga. 423, 22 S. E. 678; John Single Paper Co. v. Hammermill Paper Co. 96 App. Div. 535, 89 N. Y. Supp. 116; Anglo-American Provision Co. v. Prentiss, 157 Ill. 513, 42 N. E. 157.

Where it is alleged that there is a custom by which certain terms were understood to be implied in an offer, which would make the acceptance complete and unqualified, then whether or not such custom exists is a question of fact, and upon evidence of such custom being produced, it should be submitted to the jury to determine whether or not it does exist.

Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Louisville Cotton Oil Co. 136 Ky. 843, 122 S. W. 852, 125 S. W. 266.

Though there has been no absolute acceptance of an order, yet, when the correspondence of the parties plainly recognizes the existence of a contract, whereby one party is led to believe that he in fact had Note. — Right to accept offer after submitting counter proposition.

It is well established that an offer must be accepted in order to constitute a contract; and, also, that it must be accepted upon the terms and conditions contained in the offer. An acceptance upon new and different terms proposed by the acceptor cannot bind the one first making the offer, in the absence of his assent to the new and different terms so proposed.

The counter proposition made by the person to whom the offer is addressed, according to the weight of authority, operates as a rejection of the original offer. Mechem, Sales, § 229; Elliott, Contr. § 41; Page, Contr. § 46; 9 Cyc. 290.

a contract, and acted in reliance thereon to his damage, the other party will be estopped from denying the existence of the contract.

John Single Paper Co. v. Hammermill Paper Co. 98 App. Div. 535, 89 N. Y. Supp. 106; Pitcher v. Lowe, 95 Ga. 423, 22 S. E. 678; Bauman v. McManus, 75 Kan. 106, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1138, 89 Pac. 15.

Though an acceptance, when really qualified, can never complete a contract, it will not in all cases operate as a rejection of the pending offer.

Mechem, Sales, art. 230; Johnson v. King, 2 Bing. 270, 9 J. B. Moore, 482.

Messrs. Duffin, Sapinsky, & Duffin for appellee.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee sued the appellant in the court below upon an account of three carloads of lumber sold and shipped it, aggregating $538.45; and for the further sum of $2.04 paid by appellee to a notary public for protesting a draft it drew upon appellant for the amount of the above account, which draft the latter refused to pay, thereby necessitating its protest for nonpayment. The petition credited appellant on the amount thus sued for with $194.87 freight charges paid by the latter upon two carloads of the lumber, leaving a balance of $345.62, for which judgment was prayed. Appellee's claim was not controverted by appellant, but the latter pleaded, in its answer, a set-off and counterclaim by way of damages for a larger amount, resulting, as alleged, from appellee's breach of a contract for the sale and delivery to it of five other cars of lumber; the damages thus claimed being, as alleged, profits, after deducting freight charges, which appellant would have made upon the lumber if received. By an amended answer it was further alleged by appellant that the contract it had with appellee for the purchase of the lumber in question was made by means of letters which passed between them, and these letters, both those written by appellant to appellee and those received by it from the latter on the subject of the lumber, were introduced in evidence on the trial of the case. The burden of proof was upon the appellant to establish its set-off and counterclaim, and, after the introduction of its evidence, the court, upon appellee's motion, peremptorily instructed the jury to find for it. Thereupon judgment was entered dismissing appellant's set-off and counterclaim, and allowing appellee its debt and costs, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted. As there could have been no misapplication of the law by the trial court in granting the peremptory instruction, if the letters relied on by appellant to prove the contract alleged to have been made by it with appellee failed to do so, the question presented for our decision by the appeal is mainly one of fact.

In our opinion only four of the several letters found in the record throw any real light upon the question of fact to be determined. These include the letter from appellant to appellee of June 19, 1909, the answer of appellee thereto of June 22, 1909, that of appellant to appellee of June 24, 1909, and appellee's answer to same of June 28, 1909. These four letters are in words and figures as follows:

Gentlemen:—

We have orders for the following stock

It follows from the fact that the counter proposition is a rejection of the original offer, that such offer ceases, and the person to whom it was addressed, and who has made a counter proposition, cannot thereafter accept it.

In Frith v. Lawrence, 1 Paige, 434, where the person to whom an offer was addressed accepted it conditionally, it is stated that he, having declined to accept the offer as proposed, could not, by any subsequent assent to the original offer, make a valid contract binding on the person thus making the offer.

Thus, an offer by the lessor to cancel a lease on certain terms, to which offer the lessee makes reply proposing other terms, cannot, after the proposal of the other terms, be accepted by the lessee. Fox v. Turner, 1 Ill. App. 153.

An offer to convey land by a quitclaim deed, to which the person addressed replies, accepting the proposition "with the under-L.R.A.1915D.

standing that you will deliver to me all the papers you have in reference to the land, U. S. patent and other deeds," cannot thereafter be unconditionally accepted by the person to whom addressed. Egger v. Nesbitt, 122 Mo. 667, 43 Am. St. Rep. 596, 27 S. W. 385.

In Flomerfelt v. Hume Bros. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 30, 31 S. W. 679, where a third person proposed to assume the indebtedness of a firm on certain conditions, to which a creditor of the firm replied, offering other conditions, it is stated that this new proposition was equivalent to a rejection of the original proposal, and the original offer thereby lost its vitality, and could not thereafter be accepted by the creditors to whom it was made.

The letter in which the 1,200 tons were ordered contained a reference to the original offer, and it is stated that this reference shows that the order for the 1,200 tons was not an independent proposal, but an answer to the defendant's offer, a qualified acceptance of that offer varying the number of tons, and therefore in law a rejection of the offer; that the negotiation between the parties being thus closed, the one to whom the original offer was made could not afterwards fall back on the original offer, and the attempt to do so is ineffectual, and creates no right against the person making the original offer.

It is appellant's contention that the correspondence manifested by these letters resulted in a contract, whereby appellee sold and undertook to deliver to appellant five carloads of lumber, only one car of which was delivered. Appellee contends, on the other hand, that by neither by these letters nor otherwise did it contract with appellant to sell it five carloads of lumber. We are unable to see that such a contract is shown by the letters in question. Briefly stated, appellant by the letter of June 19th called on appellee for a quotation of its prices on the five carloads of flooring. In its letter of June 22d to appellant, appellee, by quoting prices, offered to sell it the five carloads at the prices indicated. After receiving the letter of June 22d appellant had the option, within a reasonable time, to accept or reject the proposal of sale made therein. By its next letter, which was that of June 24th, appellant did neither unqualifiedly, but, instead, told appellee to enter its order for the five cars upon the condition that all the flooring should be S2S&CM, meaning, "Surface two sides and center matched," that is that each piece of flooring should be planed or dressed on both sides, as well as tongued and grooved.

and at the end of this time refused the offer, whereupon the person to whom the original offer was made accepted that. Upon these facts the court states that the owner offered to sell for a stated price, and had this at once been unconditionally accepted, there would undoubtedly have been a perfect binding contract; but instead of that, the person to whom the offer was made, made an offer of his own, and he thereby rejected the offer previously made by the owner; concluding, the court states: "I think that it was not afterwards competent for him to revive the proposal of the defendant [the owner] by tendering an acceptance of it, and that therefore there exists no obligation of any sort between the parties."

A proposal contained in a telegram by one party to a contract, to the other, for an extension of the time for performance, to which the other party replied by telegram with a counter proposal for a different time, cannot thereafter be accepted by L.R.A.1915D.

Nothing in its previous letter of June 19th asking of appellee a proposition of sale and prices indicated that the flooring inquired about was expected to be S2S&CM. Appellant's letter of June 24th, instead of being an acceptance of the proposition of sale contained in appellee's letter of June 22d, was more in the nature of a counter proposition, which had practically the same legal effect as an avowed rejection of appellee's proposition, and appellee had the right to so treat it and say nothing further on the subject. It did not, however, pursue that course, but, as we have seen, on June 28th again wrote appellant, telling it:

We are in receipt of your favor of the 23d, and note you want the five cars all S2S&CM. This is impossible as we are running all of our 4-in. stock standard matching. Regretting that we are not able to get together on this we are,

Yours very truly,

Ingram-Day Lumber Co.

It is patent that down to this time the minds of the parties had not gotten together, consequently there was thus far no contract between them. Appellee's letter of June 28th ended negotiations, and left the parties as they were before the first letter from appellant was written. It cannot be doubted that appellant thus understood it. This is fully shown by its letter to appellee of June 30th, wherein it is said:

We are in receipt of your favor of the 28th and note that it would be impossible for you to work the five cars of flooring S2S&CM, and it would be entirely satisfactory to us if you work it regular. Please the other party by a letter, where the telegram containing the counter proposal contained no notice of a further reply by mail being given. Goulding v. Hammond, 4 C. A. 533, 13 U. S. App. 30, 54 Fed. 639.

An offer contained in a letter to sell stock at a certain price, to which the person addressed replied, stating that he would take the stock at a less price, thereupon ceases and cannot be accepted unless renewed. A conversation held thereafter in regard to the stock, even though it amounts to a bargain, rests in parol, and the contract, being one required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, is invalid. Sprague v. Hosie, 155 Mich. 30, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874, 130 Am. St. Rep. 558, 118 N. W. 497.

In Davis v. Parish, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 153, 12 Am. Dec. 287, a written contract for the sale of land was entered into, conditioned on the land being satisfactory to the purchaser when he saw it. After seeing the land, the purchaser declared he did get behind the car #1 common flooring, and let it come forward at once.

Yours very truly,
Forest G. Shaw & Co.
per F. G. Shaw.

Appellant here manifested its knowledge that appellee had rejected its proposition as to the five cars of flooring, and therefore expressed its willingness to take them as first offered by appellee; but the offer thus made appellee declined to accept. This attempt to fall back on appellee's original offer was ineffectual, and created no rights against the latter. An offer, when once rejected, loses its legal force, and cannot be accepted thereafter so as to create a binding agreement, without the assent of the party making the original offer. The fact that appellee did, in compliance with appellant's urgent requests, subsequently furnish it one carload of flooring of the desired quality, in the light of all the correspondence, affords no proof that it was a part of the five carloads appellant wished to procure. On the contrary, appellee's letter of July 26th, in substance, advised appellant that it would endeavor to send it a single car, but would not fill its previously rejected order for the five cars. Nothing more than this was shown by any of the subsequent letters between the parties. Those written by appellant merely indicate that it was insisting that a contract had been made for the five carloads of flooring, and those of appellee that there was no such contract. So the case we have is one in which there was an offer by one party to sell, and a qualified acceptance by the other party, based on conditions not contemplated by the party offering to sell or embraced in his offer of sale. This being so, the qualified acceptance was but a counter offer on not like it, and refused to take it upon the terms agreed upon, but proposed other terms which the vendor would not accept. After certain negotiations the purchaser decided to accept the land, but some objection being raised by a third party, who had an interest in the transaction, an action for specific performance was brought. In holding that there was no written contract, the court states that the written contract was to cease and become a nullity if, when the purchaser saw the land, he should not like it; that when he viewed the land and declared his dislike, the contract by its own terms expired, and after it had once expired it could not be resuscitated by parol any more than it could have been originally created by parol.

It will be noticed from the foregoing cases that the counter proposition constitutes a rejection of the offer. An express rejection is not necessary, nor need the offer be withdrawn to prevent its subsequent acceptance. The rejection resulting from the counter proposition effectually terminates the existence of the offer. The situation is then as if the original offer had not been made, so far as any rights or liabilities can arise therefrom.

In Sheffield Canal Co. v. Sheffield & R. R. Co. 3 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 121, the parties met after the offer was made, and disagreed as to the terms of the contract. Subsequently the person to whom the offer was made attempted to accept it. It was held that this could not be done, and in the course of the opinion it is stated that if an offer made by letter is verbally rejected, the party who makes it is relieved from his liability on that offer unless he consents to renew the treaty on the same footing; the party who has rejected the offer cannot afterwards, at his own option, convert the same offer into an agreement by acceptance. While other terms were proposed by the person to whom the original offer was made, the part of the intending buyer, which the seller could accept or reject, and did, in fact, reject. Therefore the negotiations did not result in a binding contract. "It is elementary law that an offer to sell must be accepted as made, and that an acceptance in different terms, or upon other conditions, amounts only to a counter offer on the part of the buyer, which the seller may accept or reject at his pleasure." Gold Spring Distilling Co. v. Stitzel Distilling Co. 150 Ky. 457, 150 S. W. 516.

In Hutcheson v. Blakeman, 3 Met. (Ky.) 80, we held that in creating a contract the negotiation may be conducted by letter, and the contract is complete when the answer containing a direct and unconditional acceptance of a distinct proposition is despatched by mail or otherwise, provided it be done with due diligence after the receipt of the letter containing the proposal, and before any intimation is received that the offer is withdrawn; but the acceptance must be unqualified. Indeed, the authorities in support of this proposition are so numerous and uniform that it is deemed unnecessary to quote from them in detail. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Levy, 122 Ky. 457, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 739, 92 S. W. 325; Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. v. Elliott, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 552, 93 S. W. 659; Hartford L. Ins. Co. v. Milet, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1297, 105 S. W. 144; Henson v. Wilson, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1382, 55 S. W. 209, 1 Page, Contr. §§ 37, 44-47; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coyle, 123 Ky. 854, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 433, 124 Am. St. Rep. 384, 97 S. W. 772; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Columbus Rolling Mill, 119 U. S. 149, 30 L. ed. 376, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168. In the case last cited it was held that an offer to sell imposes no obligation on either party until accepted according to its terms; that a proposal to accept or an acceptance upon terms varying from those offered is a rejection of the offer, and ends the negotiation, unless the offer is renewed, or the proposed modification accepted; and, moreover, that an offer which has been rejected cannot be revised by the tender of an acceptance of it. These authorities are conclusive of the case at bar, and our examination of the cases relied on by appellant's counsel convinces us that they are not in conflict with them.

We find no merit in appellant's defense that it was a custom among lumbermen that, when an offer is made such as is contained in appellee's letter to appellant of June 22d, it implies that the lumber will be S2S&CM, and that, when appellant wrote appellee on June 24th the letter containing his qualified acceptance of the latter's offer, it was not necessary for him to have made any reference to that feature of the contract. The evidence introduced in appellant's behalf did not prove such a custom. A usage or custom of trade to be a guide in the construction of contracts must be uniform, reasonable, and generally known, and the evidence in this case falls short of establishing the custom according to these well-known rules. Kendall v. Russell, 5 Dana, 503, 30 Am. Dec. 696; Houston v. Peters, 1 Met. (Ky.) 558; Caldwell v. Dawson, 4 Met. (Ky.) 121; Eagle Distilling Co. v. McFarland, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 860. In Tamplet v. Saffell, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 31, the rule in question is stated in these words: "No custom or usage, however well established, can be incorporated into a contract if it is inconsistent with the clear intention of the parties. An expressed exclusion is not necessary. It is sufficient that the custom is excluded by necessary implication."

In our opinion the trial court did not err in giving the peremptory instruction directing a verdict for the appellee. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

there was discussion between the parties, and the case is treated as a rejection of the original offer not arising alone from the counter proposition, but from the use of express words. Cases in general dealing with the right to accept an offer after an express rejection of the same have been excluded from this note.

So, cases in which the offer has been withdrawn have in general been excluded; such as Goodridge v. Wood, 133 Ill. App. 483, where the person making the offer had withdrawn it after a counter proposition had been submitted, and before the person to whom the offer had been addressed had accepted the original offer. It was here held that the person to whom the offer was

JAMES LEWIS, Appt.,

v.

JENS JOHNSON, Respt.

Contract — offer — counter proposition — effect.

A party to whom an offer of contract is made must either accept it wholly or reject it wholly. A proposition to accept on terms varying from those offered is a rejection of the offer, and a substitution in its place of the counter proposition. It puts an end to the negotiation so far as the original offer is concerned. The original offer thereby loses its vitality and is no longer pending; hence the party who has submitted the counter proposition cannot, at his own option, revive and accept the original offer which he has once virtually rejected. In order to give the rejected offer any new vitality, there must be a renewal of it, or renewed assent to it, by the party who made it. In a case within the statute of frauds, the agreement to deal on the basis of the rejected offer must be in writing.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling a motion for new trial in an action brought to recover damages for failure of defendant to carry out the terms of an alleged written contract for the sale of land to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. S. Marden and W. B. Douglas, for appellant:

The clause "take care of" the renters is equivalent to an insistence that the renters should be paid simply for the indebtedness due to them from respondent for plowing, as he disclaimed in that letter any other obligation.

Headnote by HALLAM, J.

addressed could not, after the withdrawal, accept it; but it is stated that under the doctrine of Fox v. Turner, supra, it did not require even the notification which the offerer gave to the person to whom the offer was addressed to prevent his afterwards accepting the offer.

So, in Rapp v. Livingston, 14 Daly, 402, 13 N. Y. S. R. 74, the person to whom the offer was addressed not only wrote suggesting modifications in it, but the person making the offer expressly withdrew it; and after this there was held to be no right to accept the offer in the absence of a renewal.

In Foster v. Boston, 22 Pick. 33, a number of landowners submitted a proposition to the city for the opening of a street, agree-

Yale v. Watson, 54 Minn. 173, 55 N. W. 957.

Messrs. James A. Peterson and Paul J. Thompson for respondent.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant owned a half section of land in Clay county. Plaintiff entered into negotiations to buy it. The negotiations were conducted by correspondence and a number of letters were exchanged between them. Plaintiff claims a contract of sale was made and that it was broken by defendant. Defendant denies that any contract was ever made. There are two letters which, if they could be taken alone, would make out a contract. The first is a letter written by defendant to plaintiff, dated January 8, 1909, making a proposition as follows: "I will accept your offer of $21 per acre. . . . This must be spot cash, subject to the mortgage of $3,000, which is due next fall. You will have to make settlement to the renters for the plowing done this fall." The other is a letter written by plaintiff to defendant, of January 26, 1909, purporting to accept the above proposition.

The trouble arises from the fact that there was intervening correspondence which precludes our regarding these two letters as a completed offer and acceptance. This intervening correspondence was as follows: When plaintiff received the letter of January 8th, instead of accepting its terms, he wrote the following: "Now, Mr. J. Johnson, I will give you what I said for the land, $21 per acre,"—entirely eliminating the matter of settlement with the renters ing to relinquish their title to lands free of charge. The city thereupon, without expressly declining or accepting this offer, passed a vote offering to pay a stated sum for the accomplishment of the improvement. It was contended on the part of the landowners that by this vote the city impliedly declined their offer and that they were no longer bound by it. The court, however, states that this was a distinct proposition on the part of the city, and if not accepted it did not preclude them from acting upon the offer before made by the landowners, if it was not withdrawn. This statement, however, is obiter in this case, since it was decided that the landowners had withdrawn their original offer and submitted a modification.

The element of time entered into the decision in Ortman v. Weaver, 11 Fed. 358. It was here held that a conditional acceptance of an offer made to sell timber, which qualifies the offer as to the amount to be paid in cash, the manner of giving a note for the balance, and some details as to the manner of closing the transaction, which is not acquiesced in by the person making the original offer, prevents the person to whom the original offer was made from accepting the original offer; at least, after the expiration of two weeks. It is stated in the course of the opinion that "I would not say that a person might not accept an offer with qualifications upon one day, and upon the next day, and before his counter proposition is rejected, accept unconditionally. But where the qualified acceptance is rejected, or sufficient time has elapsed upon which a refusal should be inferred, the party to whom the offer is made cannot then treat it as still in force and accept it."

The fact that the person making the offer regarded it as still binding, and wrote to the person to whom it was addressed, stating that he revoked the offer, cannot change the rule. Fox v. Turner, 1 Ill. App. 153.

Cases in which there is no counter proposition or offer of modification are not within the scope of the present note. The following case illustrates this kind of case, and also illustrates the fact that a mere inquiry made of the person making the offer does not amount to a rejection thereof:

A mere request for a modification, added to an absolute acceptance of the offer, does not amount to a rejection of the offer. Turner v. McCormick, 56 W. Va. 161, 67 L.R.A. 853, 107 Am. St. Rep. 904, 49 S. E. 28. In this case the person to whom an offer to sell coal lands was made accepted the offer and added a request "to make delivery of deed with abstract of title to me in Morgantown, W. Va., on Saturday, June 28, 1902, hour and place to be decided later."

An inquiry addressed to one making an offer to sell goods at a stated price and hold the offer open until a stated time, as to whether he would accept the stated price for delivery over a period beyond that indicated in the offer, and if not, the longest limit he would give, does not amount to a rejection of the offer so as to prevent the one to whom the offer was made from thereafter accepting it within the time limited. Stevenson v. McLean, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 346, 49 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 701, 42 L. T. N. S. 897, 28 Week. Rep. 916, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 82.

The case of Zearing v. Crawford, M. & C. Co. 102 Ark. 575, 145 S. W. 226, bears some resemblance to the question under annotation, but is not directly in point, as in this case the parties had, after the rejection of the first offer, entered into a written agreement prescribing other terms. It was held that the written contract withdrew the alleged offer of sale on the basis named at first, and substituted therefor an offer to sell on the basis of another estimate, and the one to whom the first offer was addressed could not thereafter, upon failure to comply with the provisions of the written contract, accept the offer first made.

and of the encumbrance on the land. This was not an acceptance of defendant's offer. It was a rejection of it. 9 Cyc. 290; Kileen v. Kennedy, 90 Minn. 414, 97 N. W. 126; Bastian Bros. Co. v. Wemott-Howard Co. 113 Minn. 196, 129 N. W. 369; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Columbus Rolling Mill, 119 U. S. 149, 151, 30 L. ed. 376, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168; Egger v. Nesbitt, 122 Mo. 667, 676, 43 Am. St. Rep. 596, 27 S. W. 385. There was still further correspondence before the letter of January 26th. On January 13th defendant wrote plaintiff, stating that the mortgage, instead of being $3,000 on the half section in question, was $6,000 on the whole section, and further stating: "I have no contract with parties who are to rent the land for this season, but they did some plowing last fall. . . . If I sell to you, you will have to take care of the renters,"—and adding the further significant language, "I will not accept my money on this deal until everything is arranged satisfactorily to all parties interested," evidently meaning that everything must be arranged "satisfactorily" to the tenants. The terms contained in this letter are not identical with those of the letter of January 8th. On January 14, 1909, plaintiff again wrote, making still another counter proposition. After all this intervening correspondence, varying on both sides from the original offer of January 8th, plaintiff could not catch up this letter of January 8th, and, by writing a letter accepting its terms, make a binding contract, without some renewed assent thereto on the part of the defendant. This is well settled.

The law is that a party to whom an offer is made is at liberty to accept wholly, or to reject wholly, but one of these things he must do. 1 Parsons, Contr. *477. A proposition to accept on terms varying from those offered is a rejection of the offer, and a substitution in its place of the counter proposition. It puts an end to the negotiation so far as the original offer is concerned. The original offer thereby loses its vitality, and is no longer pending between the parties; hence the party who has submitted the counter proposition cannot, at his own option, revive and accept the original offer, which he has once virtually rejected. Fox v. Turner, 1 Ill. App. 153. See also Lanz v. McLaughlin, 14 Minn. 72, Gil. 55, and cases above cited. In order to give the rejected offer any new vitality, there must be a renewal of it, or renewed assent to it, by the party who made it. Sheffield Canal Co. v. Sheffield & R. R. Co. 3 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 121, 132. The attempted acceptance of a rejected offer is in effect nothing more than a proposal which L.R.A.1915D.

must be assented to by the original offerer before any contract arises. The revival of the rejected offer is an essential part of the contract, and it must be proven as a substantive fact.

It is not contended that defendant assented to a revival of his offer of January 8th in express terms. Plaintiff contends that he did so by assenting to completion of the negotiations in accordance with this letter. The evidence of such assent is that he employed an attorney "to fix up the title;" that the attorney, at defendant's direction, caused abstracts of title to be forwarded to plaintiff's attorney, and carried on some correspondence with plaintiff's attorney. If we were called upon to determine the significance of those acts, we should deem them of doubtful force as tending to establish a contract, in view of the attitude in fact taken by this attorney in the correspondence that followed. This correspondence showed that differences as to the terms on which the parties were to contract arose at the very inception of the renewed negotiations. We are, however, relieved from determining the effect of the somewhat equivocal character of these acts by the express terms of the statute of frauds. This is a contract for the sale of land, which, under the statute of frauds, must be in writing. It seems to us self-evident that, if parties agree to deal on the basis of a rejected offer, the vendor's assent thereto, being an essential part of the contract, must be in writing. Davis v. Parish, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 153, 12 Am. Dec. 287; Sprague v. Hosie, 155 Mich. 30, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874, 130 Am. St. Rep. 553, 118 N. W. 497; Hyde v. Wrench, 3 Beav. 334, 4 Jur. 1106, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 139. It was not in writing in this case. Where a contract within the statute of frauds is made out by correspondence, the correspondence taken together must establish the contract in all its terms. It can receive no aid from parol evidence. Jenness v. Mt. Hope Iron Co. 53 Me. 20. A parol agreement to deal on the basis of a rejected offer is of no avail. After the contract had once expired it could not be resuscitated by parol, any more than it could have been originally created by parol. This position would be too clear to admit of question if, instead of a few days, a few years had intervened between the expiration of the written contract and the attempt to revive it. Upon principle, however, it is evident that the length of time which had elapsed can make no difference in this respect. Davis v. Parish, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 153, 12 Am. Dec. 287.

We hold that no contract was ever made between the parties. It accordingly becomes unnecessary to consider the further questions argued by counsel.

Order affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE TRUST COMPANY, Trustee, Appt.,
v.

ELLA BULL SNIVELY.

(162 Ky. 461, 172 S. W. 911.)

Will — devise for life with power of disposition — estate created.

A life estate only which the life tenant cannot take out of the possession of the trustee is created by a devise to be held in trust for the use and benefit of a person specified "during her life, with power to dispose of the same by her last will and testament."

(February 2, 1915.)

A PPEAL by the trustee from a judgment of the Chancery Branch, Second Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, in favor of the granddaughter of testatrix, Mary A. Bull, deceased, in a proceeding for the settlement of her estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Randolph H. Blain, for appellant:

A testator has an absolute and unconditional right to place upon a devise a limitation restricting the possession to a trustee, and restricting the beneficial right of a cestui que trust for life or for a term of years.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. Mary Bull, in the second and third clauses of her last will, provided as follows:

"Item Second. I hereby direct my executor to convey or cause to be conveyed to the Louisville Trust Company, trustee, for the use and benefit of my daughter, Mary D. Creamer, my house and lot and all of the household and kitchen furniture therein, being No. 2440 Park place, Louisville, Kentucky, for and during the life of my said daughter, Mary D. Creamer, usually known as Mary D. Snively, and the remainder at her death to be held by the Louisville Trust Company in trust for my said granddaughter, Ella Bull Snively, with full power to my said granddaughter, Ella Bull Snively, to dispose of said real estate by her last will and testament, and the said Louisville Trust Company shall keep all taxes, insurance, and repairs on said real estate paid.

"Item Third. I direct my executor to pay to the Louisville Trust Company in trust for my granddaughter, Ella Bull Snively, the net amount of my policy in the Equitable Life Insurance Company, amounting to about $5,000. The same to be held by the Louisville Trust Company for my granddaughter, she to receive the net income from same until she is thirty years of age, at which time she is to receive the principal sum free of trust."

In the fourth clause the testatrix directed that the remainder of her estate be divided into three parts, one portion going to Robert F. Bull, another to Mrs. Creamer and her children, and the other to Edward Bull's children.

In the fifth paragraph she provided that:

"I direct my executor to dispose of the second portion above referred to as follows: To pay to my daughter Ella G. Sevier, the sum of $2,000 in cash, to my daughter Mary D. Snively-Creamer, the sum of $500 cash and to my grandson, John Bull Snively, $200. These amount to be paid as soon after my death as practicable.

"All the balance of said portion to be paid over to the Louisville Trust Company and held by said company in trust for the use and benefit of Ella Bull Snively, during her life, with power to dispose of same by her last will and testament."

And in a codicil she made this provision:

"Having bequeathed to my grandchild, Ella Bull Snively, a life interest in my present residence, No. 2440 Park avenue, after the death of her mother, Mrs. Mary D. Snively, it is my will that said item two of the above will be amended as follows, to wit:

"That if my said grandchild, Ella Bull Snively, should leave any children, this house and lot shall descend to said children upon her death. If she should leave no children surviving her, she may dispose of the same by last will and testament to any of my descendants, but she shall have no right to dispose of the said house and lot to strangers or any other persons other than some of my lineal descendants."

In the division of the property as directed in clause 4, there was paid to the Louisville Trust Company, as trustee of Ella Bull Snively, $5,650. Some time after this division and payment, Ella Bull Snively, in the litigation pending about the settlement of the estate, asserted, in a pleading filed for that purpose, the claim that under the will she was entitled to the property described in clause 5 of the will in fee simple, and she asked that the trustee be required to deliver the same to her free of any trust. The question at issue coming up on a demurrer to the pleading of Ella Bull Snively, the chancellor held that she took the fee in this estate, and entered a judgment that "all the property, including money, notes, bonds, securities, and choses in action now held by the Louisville Trust Company as trustee for the said Ella Bull Snively under item 5 of the will of said Mary A. Bull rightfully belongs to said Ella Bull Snively unconditionally, absolutely, and in fee simple, and that the trust in said Louisville Trust Company under said will was a dry trust, and not enforceable, and that the said Ella Bull Snively recover of the Louisville Trust Company, trustee, free of said trust, all money, notes, L.R.A.1915D.

bonds, stocks, and choses in action now held by said trust company in trust for her; to have and to hold in fee simple and free of any trust."

Complaining of this judgment, the trust company prosecutes this appeal, insisting that under the will Ella Bull Snively took only a life estate in the property described in clause 5, with power to dispose of the same by her last will and testament.

It will be observed that there is no devise over after the death of Ella Bull Snively, and therefore it is further insisted by counsel for appellant that, if she should die without having disposed of her property by her last will and testament, the estate would vest in the legal heirs of the testatrix, and consequently, having a contingent interest in this estate, these heirs were necessary parties to this suit. This alleged defect in parties is not, however, very material, because, if the estate was left in the hands of the trustee, and Ella Bull Snively took only a life estate, and did not dispose of it by will, it would go to these heirs, and, if she took the fee, that would dispose of the interest of the heirs, and so the issue raised by the trustees presents fully every defense to the claim of Ella Bull Snively that could have been presented if the heirs had been made parties.

The real question in the case is: Did Ella Bull Snively take a fee, or only a life estate, with power of disposition? It would appear from the reading of clause 5 that the testatrix intended to do two things in respect to the estate given to Ella Bull Snively; namely, to give her the use and benefit of the fund during her life, and also the power to dispose of it by will. This is the ordinary and natural meaning that we think should be given to the words used by the testatrix in the last paragraph of this clause. There is no substantial difference in respect to the title vested in Ella Bull Snively by clause 2 and clause 5. One of these clauses relates to real property and one to personal estate, but in each of them it is provided that the estate given should be held in trust for Ella Bull Snively, with power to dispose of the same by will. It is true that in clause 2 the trustee is directed to keep all taxes, insurance, and repairs paid on the real property therein disposed of, while in clause 5 there is no particular direction given to the trustee describing its control over the property or its duties. But the fact that the trustee was directed in clause 2 to pay taxes, insurance, and for repairs does not really add anything to either the duty or power of the trustee, because the law, in the absence of this direction, would impose the performance of these duties. If the words, "during her life," had not been inserted, and clause 5 had read that the property was to be held "by said company in trust for the use and benefit of Ella Bull Snively, with power to dispose of same by her last will and testament," then the construction of this clause would be controlled by the rule announced in Constantine v. Moore, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 369, 62 S. W. 1016. In that case the will read:

"In consideration of the love and affection I have for my beloved wife, . . . I give and bequeath unto her all my property I may die possessed of, of every description, real, personal and mixed, to have the same for her benefit, to control the same during her life as she may see proper, free from the claim of every person or persons, and to dispose of the same as she may see proper at her death."

And the court said that the testator having given the fee in the first of the clause, the words, "to control the same during her life as she may see proper, free from the claim of every person or persons, and to dispose of the same as she may see proper at her death," were merely explanatory of the preceding part of the clause; that these words were not a qualification of the fee already given, but were added to make sure the preceding clause would not be misunderstood. But here the will expressly provides that the devisee shall only have the estate "during her life, with power to dispose of same by will."

In Robbins v. Robbins, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 209, 9 S. W. 254, the testator directed his executor to sell his Chicago property as soon as he thought advisable for the interest of his wife, and when sold directed, "That he forthwith invest the proceeds of said sales in United States bonds, in the name of my said wife, and for her benefit. She will, at no time, loan any of the proceeds of said sales of said real estate to any person or persons whatever, but is to have the interest on said bonds to use as she may desire."

In another clause he directed that, if the Chicago estate was not sold, the rents were to go to his wife to use as she may desire. In holding that the wife took the fee, and not a life estate, the court said that it was manifest from the reading of the entire will that the testator's intention was to dispose of his whole estate, and there was no indication of any purpose on his part to limit the estate of his wife, there being no children, to a life estate.

The essential difference between that case and this lies in the fact that here the testatrix expressly provides that the devisees shall hold the estate "during her life."

The case of Fristoe v. Laytham, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 157, 36 S. W. 920, can hardly be regarded as authority for the proposition asserted by counsel for appellee in this case, as it appears from the opinion that the parties interested in the construction of the will consented that it disposed of the fee, and not a life estate.

In Drye v. Cunningham, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2500, 74 S. W. 272, the testator by his will gave certain property to his wife for life, with remainder to his daughters, one of whom was Susan Tucker, and provided that the share of Susan Tucker should be placed in the hands of a trustee to manage and control the same and pay over to her annually the interest; and the court held, there being nothing in the will to indicate a purpose on the part of the testator to limit the estate of Mrs. Tucker in the property placed in the hands of the trustee to a life estate, that she took the fee, saying: "The fund was placed in the hands of a trustee for its protection from her improvidence or that of her husband, but nothing further was provided. . . . The creation of the trust did not change the character of the estate devised to Mrs. Tucker. It was her property held in trust for her."

A similar ruling was, in effect, made in Reuling v. Reuling, 137 Ky. 637, 126 S. W. 151.

In the case of McCallister v. Bethel, 97 Ky. 1, 29 S. W. 745, the question arose as to the proper construction of a clause in the will of Ben Talbot in which he devised certain property to John McCallister in trust for Joseph McCallister, with the provision that, if Joseph McCallister left surviving him no children, it should go to any persons to whom Joseph might will it. Joseph died intestate and without children; and the court, in holding that he took the fee in the property devised, said: "There is no expression or word used which requires the trustee to give Joseph the rents during his life, so as to indicate an intention upon the part of the testator that he was to have only a life estate in the land. It is perfectly manifest from the will that the testator knew how to create a life estate in a devise. . . . Had he intended that Joseph should only take a life estate in the farm, he would have said so, as he did in the case of his daughter. . . . Having given Joseph the fee, it was wholly unnecessary for the testator to emphasize the fact by trying to confer upon him the right to will the farm to whomsoever he pleased. The right to so dispose of the farm was incident to the estate which the testator gave him, and no further words were necessary to be employed to enable him to do so, unless he had bodily heirs."

In Cropper v. Bowles, 150 Ky. 393, 150 S. W. 380, the property in question was given to Mrs. Bowles, "to be her sole and separate estate, free from the debts and control of her husband or any husband she may ever have, with the right to dispose of the same by last will and testament or writing in the nature thereof, but without power to mortgage or otherwise to encumber, or to sell or convey the same during her life." The court held that Mrs. Bowles took the fee, and that the restraint upon the alienation of the estate was void; but it will be observed that here the grantor, without limitation, except in respect to the restraint on alienation referred to, conveyed the estate in fee, nowhere indicating a purpose that it should be for life.

Turning now to the other line of cases relied on in support of the proposition that under the will Ella Bull Snively took only a life estate in this fund, it appears that in McCullough v. Anderson, 90 Ky. 126, 7 L.R.A. 836, 13 S. W. 353, the testator devised his property to his wife in a clause reading:

"To my most precious and well-beloved wife I give, during her life, all my estate, real and personal, whether in possession or in action, with full and ample authority to dispose of the whole of it as she pleases. At her death, should she not have previously made a testamentary distribution of all remaining undisposed of by her, I desire that such remainder shall be distributed as herein directed."

On the death of the wife, who had not made any disposition of a large part of the estate, a controversy came up as to whether she took the fee or a life estate, and the court held that the wife took only a life estate with the power of disposition, which she had failed to exercise, laying down the general rule, that has since been consistently followed, that "if the estate is given or devised generally or indefinitely with a power of disposition, it passes a fee, but when the devisor or grantor owning the fee gives to the first taker an estate for life, with the power to dispose of the fee, no greater estate is vested in the first taker than that carved out of the fee and vested in him by the devisor or grantor. He is given a life estate in express terms, and the failure to exercise the power gives to the remainderman the fee, because, no disposition having been made of it by the life tenant, he takes under the will or conveyance. . . . Now, if . . . [the testator] had intended to vest the wife with the fee, or to give her the absolute estate, without any limitation, it could have been readily expressed, and there would have been no necessity for carrying a life estate out of the fee, and then conferring upon the life tenant the power to pass the fee by deed or will, if she desired to do so. The provision of the will giving the wife this power shows that upon its exercise alone could the wife pass the fee, so as to defeat the objects of the testator's bounty, designated to take the remainder." Payne v. Johnson, 95 Ky. 175, 24 S. W. 238, 609; McCallister v. Bethel, 97 Ky. 1, 29 S. W. 745.

Running through the many cases construing provisions in wills like the one here in question, there will be found the distinction that, when the estate is devised for life, either expressly or by necessary inference gathered from the intention of the testator as expressed in the will, the power of disposition in the devisee will not convert the estate into a fee, but, if the devise does not specifically or by necessary inference create a life estate, the power of disposition invests the devisee with the fee, and these rules apply with equal force whether the estate is given immediately to the devisee or placed in the custody of a trustee for his benefit.

In this will we think the testatrix manifested very clearly her purpose to limit the estate to a life estate, or else she would not have used the words, "during her life." If the testatrix had not intended to limit the estate to a life estate with the power of disposition, it is difficult to understand why these words were inserted in the will. That they were not used by inadvertence or mistake, or through ignorance of their meaning, is shown by the care with which the entire will was prepared, and the clearness with which the testatrix disposed of her estate, and the appropriateness of the words used in giving the fee and lesser estate to different devisees. The will provides in express terms that the trustee "shall hold the estate in trust for the use and benefit of Ella Bull Snively during her life," and, if the estate should be taken out of the hands of the trustee and turned over to the devisee, this would be doing, as it seems to us, what the testatrix expressly directed should not be done. This conclusion, which results in holding that Ella Bull Snively did not take the fee, but only a life estate, with power of disposition, makes it unnecessary to consider the other question raised, that the will created what is known as a dry or passive trust.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to enter a judgment in conformity with this opinion.

WILLIAM D. DAISEY, Appt.,
v.

E. H. WAGNER et al., Doing Business as
J. F. Wagner's Sons.

(162 Ky. 554, 172 S. W. 942.)

Master and servant — assumption of risk — danger of fall from roof.

The foreman of a roofing gang assumes the risk of injury from falling from a roof upon which he is at work, because of the absence of gutters or hangers thereon to protect employees from falls.

(February 5, 1915.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Third Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O'Doherty & Yonts and Joseph S. Lawton, for appellant:

It was the duty of the defendants to exercise ordinary care to keep the premises in a reasonably safe condition.

Williams Coal Co. v. Cooper, 138 Ky. 287, 127 S. W. 1000; Anderson v. Republic Iron & Steel Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 723, 107 S. W. 220; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 6th ed. §§ 185, 185 B, 6th ed. 207 E, 207 G.

It was the duty of the master to furnish hangers or gutters at the edge of the roof for the protection of the servants working on the roof. The injuries occurred from the failure of the master to provide hangers or gutters, which had no connection with the plaintiff's work and which ought to have been constructed by the master, or an entirely different set of workmen.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 6th ed. 297 A.

Plaintiff was not charged with the duty of inspection.

Anderson v. Republic Iron & Steel Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 723, 107 S. W. 220.

Note. — As to servant's assumption of risk of dangers created by the master's negligence which might have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the servant, see note to St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Birch, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1250; and later case, Gombert v. McKay, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1234.

The applicability of the rule as to safe place where the conditions of work are changing is considered in the note to Smith v. North Jellico Coal Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1267. And see later case, Griffin v. Fredonia Brick Co. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1088. L.R.A.1915D.

Mr. Fred Forcht, for appellees:

Plaintiff assumed the risk from injury resulting while engaged in the work that he was employed to do.

Co. 137 Ky. 303, 125 S. W. 718; Standard Oil Co. v. Watson, 154 Ky. 550, 157 S. W. 929; Dyer v. Pauley Jail Bldg. Co. 144 Ky. 592, 139 S. W. 789.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, William D. Daisey, by the institution of this action in the Jefferson circuit court, common pleas branch, third division, sought to recover of the appellees, E. H. Wagner and others, partners, doing business as J. F. Wagner's Sons, damages for injuries he sustained by falling from a building upon which he and other employees of appellees were engaged in placing a tile roof. A demurrer was filed by appellees to the petition as amended, which was sustained by the circuit court, and appellant failing to plead further, the petition was dismissed at his cost. From the judgment manifesting these rulings, he has appealed.

Appellees are engaged in the tinning and roofing business in the city of Louisville, and appellant, at the time of the accident resulting in his injuries, was employed by them as a general foreman in the work of roofing buildings. It appears that in the fall of 1912 appellees contracted with one Vissman, who was erecting a new residence in Louisville, to put a tile roof upon the building, and that appellant as their foreman was instructed by them to take charge of certain other of their employees, over whom he had control, and put the tile roof upon the Vissman building, and, while he and they were upon the building and performing the work of putting on the tile roof, he fell therefrom a distance of 30 feet to the ground, thereby sustaining the injuries complained of, which were of a painful and permanent character. The grounds relied on for the recovery sought are thus stated in the petition: "Plaintiff states that the defendants, their agents and servants, by and through their gross negligence, failed to furnish the plaintiff with a reasonably safe place in which to do the work, which he was required and directed to do under his employment, and that the said place was unsafe and dangerous, in this, that the roof of said residence was very steep, and the defendants, their agents, and servants failed to furnish and provide any gutters or hangers, or like appliances to the same, by means of which the plaintiff would have been enabled to use ladders upon said roof, while engaged in the work of placing and securing said tile in position on the sheeting of said roof. Plaintiff states that the defendants, their agents, and servants knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the unsafe and dangerous condition of said place, and, so knowing, ordered and directed the plaintiff to do the work of placing said tile upon said roof, and the plaintiff, in obedience to said order and direction of the defendants, their agents, and servants, as aforesaid, did go upon said roof, and actually engaged in the work of placing the tile on said roof, and while so doing the plaintiff was, because and by reason of the unsafe and dangerous condition of said roof, as aforesaid, caused to slip and fall from said roof, and to strike the ground, and to sustain serious, painful, and permanent injuries. . . ."

The different senses in which the phrase "assumption of risk" is employed by the courts are indicated and explained in the note to Scheurer v. Banner Rubber Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1215, entitled "May servant assume the risk of dangers created by the master's negligence."

Many other phases of the subject of assumption of risk are treated in notes which may be found by referring to the Index to L.R.A. Notes, under the subject "Master and Servant," subdiv. "Assumption of Risk."

It will be observed that the single ground of negligence complained of above is that the appellant was required by appellees to work upon a steep roof which, by reason thereof and of the absence of gutters or hangers upon the roof, rendered it an unsafe place for the required work, and that these conditions caused his fall to the ground and consequent injuries. In the amended petition it was further averred: "That before placing or setting the tile on said roof, it was customary and necessary at the time of the disaster to plaintiff herein, for the protection of the life and limbs of the workmen placing or setting said tile on said roof, for the defendants and all similar concerns engaged in said tiling of roofs, in order to make said roof reasonably safe to work upon, to furnish and provide gutters or hangers on the lower edge of said roof, so that, if a workman upon said roof while engaged in setting said tile happened to slip or fall, he would get caught or be able to catch himself on said hangers or gutters, and thereby be protected and prevented from falling to the ground. That it was the duty of the deendants to furnish such gutters or hangers on the roof mentioned herein, for the purposes mentioned above, but that defendants, their agents, and servants, by and through their gross negligence, failed to furnish the plaintiff with a reasonably safe place or with reasonably safe appliances or any appliances whatsoever in which to do the work he was required and directed to do under his employment, and that the said place was dangerous and unsafe, in this, that the roof on said residence was very steep, and the defendants failed to furnish and provide any such gutters or hangers by means of which the plaintiff would have been protected and prevented from falling to the ground in the manner hereinafter set out."

It is not averred in the petition or amendment thereto that there was any employee of appellees superior in authority to appellant in charge of the work on the roof, or charged with the duty of directing appellant how to do the work, or of instructing him as to the manner in which it should be done. Neither is it alleged that the place on the roof from which he fell was one that he was ordered by a superior to take, or that there was any defect existing in the material used or the roof itself, or that any of the appliances used in performing the work were defective, or that as a result thereof appellant's injuries resulted. Reduced to the last analysis, the averments of the petition, as amended, simply convey the meaning that appellant slipped because of the steepness of the roof, and fell to the ground because there were no gutters or hangers upon the roof upon which he could have caught and prevented his fall after he had slipped. It is true the amended petition contains the averment that it was the duty of appellees to have furnished gutters or hangers upon the roof before requiring the work to be performed thereon, but as appellant was an experienced workman in roofing, and by reason thereof was acting as appellees' foreman, and was, in fact, in charge of the work of putting on the roof, he must have known, and did know, that there were no gutters or hangers upon the roof, and also of the steepness of the roof, and that in the absence of the gutters or hangers he was liable to fall to the ground. It is a matter of common knowledge that gutters are placed upon roofs to carry off the rain-water that may fall upon them, and further a matter of common knowledge that gutters are never made or attached to the roof except as the roof is being put on or after its completion.

We think it manifest that, in undertaking the work of putting on the roof as appellees' foreman, appellant assumed whatever risk grew out of the performance of the work. It was such work as could only have been done or directed by a person of his skill and experience. Being in charge of the work, it was his duty to use ordinary care to so perform it as that no injury would result to himself or the other workmen under his control, and notwithstanding the averments of the petition that the roof was an unsafe place to work and that this fact was not known to him, but was known or by the exercise of ordinary care could have been known to appellees, it is nevertheless patent that it was known to him, or could have been known by such an inspection of the roof as his duty as foreman required him to make before beginning work upon it. He was charged with the duty of inspecting the roof as well as of doing or causing to be done the work of putting on the tile. If the doing of the work in the manner attempted by him was dangerous because of the absence of gutters or hangers to the roof, he should have deferred beginning work upon it until he could give information of such danger to appellees that they might have had an opportunity to supply gutters, hangers, or other appliances that would have made the performance of the work of putting on the roof reasonably safe. If appellant had been a young and inexperienced employee and had gone to work upon the roof without knowledge of the danger, or under an assurance from appellees that it was reasonably safe for him to do so, it would present a different state of facts upon which the liability of the latter might be made to rest; but no such contention is here made.

In Russell v. W. E. Caldwell Co. 158 Ky. 229, 164 S. W. 787, there was an attempt upon the part of Russell to recover damages for injuries resulting, as alleged, from the negligence of his employer, W. E. Caldwell Company. The injuries resulted while he was repairing the roof and guttering of a building owned by the latter. In the opinion it is said: "It will be observed that there is no allegation that the defendant corporation assumed any control over the work of making repairs, and there is no allegation that the plaintiff was at the time of the injury working under immediate supervision or direction of any superior officer or employee of the company; nor is there any allegation that the plaintiff was an inexperienced workman. One who is employed to do repair work upon a roof and guttering of a building, from the very nature of things knows in advance that his employer is not undertaking to furnish him a reasonably safe place in which to work; because if the place was not out of repair, and therefore in some measure dangerous, he would not have been employed to repair it, and under such conditions the employee necessarily assumes the additional risk growing out of the then condition of the place."

In Ballard & B. Co. v. Lee, 131 Ky. 412, 115 S. W. 732, Lee had been employed to take the roofing off of an old building, and while so employed fell from the roof and was killed. In that case we said: "It seems to us that if the owner of a house employs a competent and experienced laborer to take off an old roof and put on a new one, or to repair the roof, or to tear down a building, it is fair to assume that the employee will take the necessary precautions to protect himself from injury on account of the dangerous or defective condition of the premises about which he is engaged to work, and that it would be imposing upon the employer an unreasonable duty to require him to have a careful examination of the premises made for the purpose of discovering defects or dangers in order that he might inform the employee concerning them."

The work attempted to be done by appellant was in itself hazardous and the danger of its performance obvious to a person of even less experience than was possessed by him. Being in charge of the work as foreman because of his experience and skill, he will not be heard to say that he did not know of the danger. Therefore such risks as would ordinarily be incident to such work must be regarded as having been assumed by him. The duty of the master with respect to the furnishing of a safe place or safe premises for the performance of such work as fell to the lot of appellant can have no application. Therefore the master is not, in a case like this, charged with the duty of exercising ordinary care to discover the dangerous or unsafe place, and is not liable in damages for an injury to the servant because of the dangerous condition; for, the danger being obvious, the duty of protecting himself against it is shifted to the employee. So, assuming in this case that appellant's injuries were received as alleged in the petition, as the conditions which caused them were openly visible to him and the work was to be performed in accordance with his judgment as appellees' foreman, there being no assurance by the appellees of the safety of the place (even if such assurance under the circumstances could have shifted the liability), nor promise by appellees to provide other appliances of greater safety, we can but hold that appellant assumed the dangers incident to the performance of the work, for which reason he cannot re-

It is our conclusion, therefore, that the demurrer was properly sustained; wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUIS STERLING COON, by Next Friend,

KENTUCKY & INDIANA TERMINAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— Ky. —, 173 S. W. 325.)

Note. — Doctrine of attractive nuisance as applied to walls, fences, etc.

The doctrine of attractive nuisance has been broadly treated, in its relation to various specific situations, in the note to Cahill v. Stone, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1094. That note has been supplemented, so far as concerns ponds, reservoirs, waterways, etc., by the note to Thompson v. Illinois C. R. Co. 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1101.

For the application of the doctrine to road vehicles, see note to Bruhneke v. La-Crosse, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1147.

The purpose of the present note is to consider merely the question whether the allurements and menace peculiar to such objects as walls, fences, gates, etc., or places in proximity thereto, render the doctrine applicable. It is therefore impossible to develop the arguments for or against the general doctrine itself, or the considerations that bear on the general question whether the doctrine, in jurisdictions in which it has been adopted, is to be applied liberally or strictly, except so far as those arguments and considerations may have affected the applicability of the doctrine to the particular conditions under investigation. For the broader aspects of the subject, the note in 19 L.R.A.(N.S.), already referred to, should be consulted.

The doctrine of "attractive nuisances," as laid down in the line of cases generally known as "Turntable Cases," seems to be that by creating or leaving on one's premises a dangerous machine or thing which is especially calculated to attract children to play therewith, one impliedly invites children on his premises, and is guilty of negligence if he does not take precautions to protect such children from injury. This doctrine has been debated in many cases and in many courts with the result that there are many authorities supporting the tance from the surface of the street, liable for injury to a child who climbs upon the wall and falls off onto the street, upon the theory of attractive nuisance.

Walls.

The District of Columbia was, in Hageage v. District of Columbia, 42 App. D. C. 109, held not liable under the attractive-nuisance doctrine for injury to a child while at play by falling over an unguarded retaining wall along an alley owned by the District, which the children of the neighborhood were accustomed to use as a playground, but which had not been designated as such, and had never been open to public travel, or used by the public as a street. The court stated that "there was nothing inherently dangerous either in this alley or in the fact that the embankment wall along its southern side was not guarded. Children had played there for a considerable time apparently without mishap. Conditions were observable by all. If the District is to be held liable in this case, then it necessarily follows that it is its duty to fence every pond and every stream, and make absolutely safe every foot of ground under its jurisdiction, when children are liable to resort thereto. . . . The alley . . . had not been designated as a public playground, and hence the children who frequented it were not there upon the invitation of the District authorities, either express or implied. The District, therefore, was under no greater duty to those children when there than when upon any other portion of the public domain not specially set apart for them. It had not left in a place known to be frequented by children an attractive and inherently dangerous machine that was just

Messrs. Humphrey, Middleton, & Humphrey, for appellee:

A concrete retaining wall 20 inches wide is not an attractive nuisance within the doctrine of those cases commonly called "Turntable Cases," which allow a recovery as certain to draw a child into peril as poisoned meat placed by the roadside would be likely to attract a neighbor's dog; nor had it been guilty of another act of gross negligence by maintaining in a public place a concealed danger amounting to a nuisance. It had merely deferred putting a guard rail along land dedicated for an alley until the convenience of the public required the alley to be improved and opened. If there is to be any limit to the liability of the District in such cases we must hold that no liability has been shown in this case." See also COON v. KENTUCKY & I. TERMINAL R. CO.

So it was held in Kayser v. Lindell, 73 Minn. 123, 75 N. W. 1038, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 408, that the doctrine of the "Turntable Cases" could not be applied so as to render the owner liable where a tenant's three-and-one-half-year-old boy was injured by falling off a retaining wall 7½ feet high at the rear of a space where children were accustomed to play, between the owner's house and that occupied by the tenant. The court stated that, "conceding that this yard was not a part or appurtenance of the rented premises, and that the child was in the yard by the implied invitation of defendant, we are still of the opinion that plaintiff is not entitled to recover. The doctrine of the 'Turntable Cases' cannot be extended to such a case as this." It is true, further observed the court, that if the owner of premises keeps upon them a concealed trap, and a person coming upon the premises by invitation is injured thereby, he may recover. But there was no mantrap in this case. The wall was plain to be seen. The child knew it was there, and fell off of it in the daytime. While the owner of the premises may owe more duty to a child than to an adult coming upon his premises by implied invitation, yet he is not bound to guard every stairway, cellarway, retaining wall, shed, tree, and open window on his premises, so that a child cannot climb to a precipitous place and fall off.

So, a city was held not liable in Clark v. Richmond, 83 Va. 355, 5 Am. St. Rep. 281, 5 S. E. 369, where a six-year-old boy climbed on a wall about 2 feet high, and while walking or standing thereon fell into an area on the other side. The court stated that notwithstanding the Turntable Cases, it was aware of no case that had gone to the extent of holding a municipal corporation liable in damages to a child who had left the street or highway and suffered an injury as a consequence of his having climbed upon a structure entirely without its traveled limits, and fallen therefrom.

One who maintains on his premises what is called an "attractive nuisance," that is, a place which, though patently dangerous to those of ordinary knowledge and prudence, is so enticing to others excusably lacking in intelligence and caution as to induce them to venture to it, is liable for resulting injuries to the latter; and the same rule applies to one who maintains on his own premises a dangerous instrumentality not in itself attractive, but placed in such immediate proximity to an attractive situation on the premises of another as to form with it a dangerous whole, notwithstanding the attractive nuisance on

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff, Louis Sterling Coon, suing by his next friend, brought this action against defendant, Kentucky & Indiana Terminal Railroad Company, to recover damages for personal injuries. Defendant's demurrer to the petition was sustained, and the petition dismissed. Plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the petition that defendant is a railroad company with authority to own, maintain, and operate a line of railroad in the state of Kentucky and elsewhere, and to own, maintain, and operate viaducts, bridges, and trestles over and the other premises may not be of itself dangerous. Consequently an electric light company was held liable under the attractive-nuisance doctrine in Consolidated Electric Light & P. Co. v. Healy, 65 Kan. 798, 70 Pac. 884, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 71, for maintaining defectively insulated wires outside the course of the traveled way, on a viaduct in a city street, and separated therefrom by a balustrade over which small boys were in the habit of climbing and going close to the wires, where a ten-year-old boy climbed over the railing, and came in contact with a wire, and was killed. The court said that while the company did not maintain the bridge and the railing constituting the attractive climbing place for boys, and it might be that its wires were not attractive appliances, still it maintained the wires in such immediate proximity to that which was attractive as to constitute them an integral part of the whole. It put its wires within the attractive environment; it identified itself in that way with the attractive place. (Generally as to duty in stringing electric wires to guard against danger to children, see note to Temple v. McComb City Electric Light & P. Co. 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 449; Wetherby v. Twin State Gas & Electric Co. 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1220; and Meyer v. Union Light, Heat, & P. Co. 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 136.)

Gates.

The court, in Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Bockoven, 53 Kan. 279, 36 Pac. 322, refused to extend the attractive-nuisance doctrine to an inside gate, holding that a railroad company maintaining, near a small settlement, a stockyard sufficiently fenced and protected by an outside gate, would not be liable for the death of a five-year-old boy who was killed by the falling of a defective inside gate upon which he was swinging, if, without the knowledge of the company, he reached the place by climbing over the outside gate. But the court said that if, with the consent or knowledge of the company, children frequently climbed over the outside gate or inclosure of the stockyard and played or swung on the inside gate, which was in a defective and dangerous condition, under certain circumstances, such negligence might be established as would create a liability for any injury resulting to such children from a gate knowingly left in a dangerous condition. If the outside gate was generally left open, in consequence of which children frequently went inside of the yards and played or swung on the defective inside gate, and all of this was with the consent or knowledge of the company, and if on the morning that the little boy was killed, the outside gate was open, and the boys entered the yard through the opened gate, a liability might rest upon the company if the parents were not negligent in suffering the boy to be exposed to such danger. If the railroad company had knowledge that little children frequently played in the vicinity or around the stockyards, and if the outside gate was open upon the morning of the injury, without the authority of the railroad company, the question might arise, whether, after being open, it was negligently permitted to remain open. An open door or gate to an inclosure or other premises where children frequently play would be very apt to excite their curiosity, and is something in the way of a permission or an invitation to enter such inclosure or premises, and a little boy, in going through an open gate or door around which he is playing, would be indulging in the natural instincts of a child. On the other hand, safe and securely closed gates would form a bar to the inclosure. It does not appear from the evidence that little children could open the outside gate of the stockyards when closed or shut. It was further observed by the court that if it were proved that on one occasion only, prior to the injury, children were in the stockyards and were ordered away at once by the company or its agent, and under such direction left the yard, that of itself would not establish knowledge on the part upon the streets and thoroughfares of the city of Louisville. With the consent of the city, the company built a viaduct about 60 feet long and 50 feet wide and 20 feet high, extending across Montgomery street between Thirtieth and Thirty-First streets, in that city. The north side of the viaduct consists of a concrete retaining wall. The wall is about 20 inches wide, with a smooth surface on top, and the west end is about 28 inches above the street. From the west end the wall gradually ascends until it reaches a height of 15 feet from the street. The children in the neighborhood find the wall attractive, and are in the habit of climbing upon it. This fact was known to the defendant. The plaintiff is an infant fourteen years of age. The plaintiff climbed of the company of any habit or practice of children resorting to the yards for play.

It is held in Snare & T. Co. v. Friedman, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 367, 94 C. C. A. 369, 169 Fed. 1, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 311, (writ of certiorari denied in 214 U. S. 518, 53 L. ed. 1065, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 700) that one piling building material (iron girders) in the street owes a duty to children of such tender years as to be incapable of contributory negligence or trespass, who, to his knowledge, are accustomed to play in the vicinity, to use ordinary care to prevent the piles from being in such unstable condition as would be likely to cause injury to such children as might come in contact with them. The court stated that the doctrine of those cases which relate to structures, dangerous, as well as attractive, to children, maintained on defendant's own land, is a fortiori applicable to cases like the present, where the defendant has maintained the dangerous thing, structure, or condition upon a public street or highway. This is just the opposite of the conclusion reached in 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 Ann. Cas. 497, a case in the state court between the same parties, on the same facts. (As to the right of the Federal court to determine the question independently of the decisions of the state courts, see the opinion in the Friedman Case, and the note in 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 380, 437, et seq.)

So, according to Louisville R. Co. v. Esselman, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 333, 93 S. W. 50, a city ordinance which permits owners, in repairing or constructing buildings, to place building material in the street, does not license them to set a dead-fall in the street to catch unwary children, mischievously or prankishly wandering within the forbidden zone. The law is, on the contrary, that the builder must anticipate their presence with a knowledge of their nature, and provide against accidents to them so far as may reasonably be within his power. The instincts of humanity father this rule. Conse- L.R.A.1915D.

the wall, and, when he reached a point about 11 feet from the street, fell and was severely injured. It is alleged that his injuries were due to the gross carelessness and negligence of the defendant in failing to guard and protect the wall in such a way as to prevent injuries to children.

Plaintiff bases his right to recover on the "Turntable Cases," or the "attractive-nuisance" doctrine. We deem it unnecessary to discuss the doctrine at length. Numerous cases illustrating the different phases of the rule may be found in the editorial note to the case of Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Harvey, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1136. Other discussions of the question may be found in the notes to Walsh v. Pittsburg R. Co. 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559. This court has applied the quently it was held in this case that the railroad company, which had stacked its building material (iron girders) in a street in so negligent a manner that a beam fell upon an eleven-year-old boy while attempting to get down from the top of the pile, upon which he had climbed, was liable for the resulting injuries.

So it was held in Smith v. Davis, 22 App. D. C. 315, that one who had piled lumber in a public street without proper consent, so as to constitute a public nuisance, was liable for injury to a nine-year-old trespassing child upon whom a portion of it fell, although the evidence failed to make apparent the cause of its falling, where the evidence also failed to show that the injured child was instrumental in causing the lumber to fall. In holding that the case fell clearly within the principle of Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, 4 Perry & D. 672, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 73, 5 Jur. 797 (the leading attractive-nuisance case) the court said that the lumber was piled on public ground, where the public had a right to be, and that it was tempting to children to play on it, or, it might be, to sit on it; and that, if by indulging their natural impulses, they were on the timber, and it fell from some jar or disturbance received, it would be difficult to show that there was any such negligence on their part as would defeat a recovery for an injury received by one of them.

But where children were accustomed to play in a lumber yard, and a child, while so playing, was fatally injured by a loose pile of lumber falling upon him, the court, in Kelly v. Benas, 217 Mo. 1, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 903, 116 S. W. 557, while recognizing that the doctrine of the Turntable Cases obtained in Missouri, held that it was not applicable to the case, and said: "If the old channel of the law is to be quite changed by the application of the new doctrine automatically and without discrimination, if sentimental considerations (however elevated and tender) are to usurp the place of cold and calm reason as the foundation for rules of law, then the flood gates now damming back liability will be raised, letting in strange and deep waters for the landowner to strug-doctrine and sustained a recovery in a number of cases. Thus, in Bransom v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193, the defendant owned a vacant lot between two streets in Frankfort. The lot had been used by the public for a number of years. Defendant used it for stacking lumber. One of the piles of lumber was negligently stacked. Plaintiff's intestate, a little boy, while playing on or near the unsafe pile of lumber, was struck by the falling lumber and killed. In the case of Harper v. Kopp, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2342, 73 S. W. 1127, the defendant, without permission from the city, left a pile of lumber stacked in the streets. A child six years of age, while playing about the lumber, was injured. A recovery was allowed because the defendant stacked the lumber in a public street, where its unguarded condition made it attractive and dangerous for young children. In the case of Louisville R. Co. v. Esselman, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 333, 93 S. W. 50, the railway company stacked, in one of the streets of Louisville, certain building materials to be used in the reconstruction of its power plant. Part of the materials consisted of heavy iron I-beams. While a boy eleven years of age was playing on the beams, one of them fell over and injured his leg. Judgment in favor of the boy was affirmed on the ground that the material was so negligently stacked as to constitute a dangerous instrumentality. A recovery was also allowed in Brown v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 135 Ky. 798, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 717, 123 S. W. 298, which was gle with. Not only will he be liable for boys drowned while swimming in his stock pond (the idea of swimming being alluring to a boy), for those who fall into uncovered wells, cisterns, and cellars (the notion of playing on the brink of such being a boyish one), for children who are suffocated while playing in piles of sand accumulated for building purposes, or in sliding down stacks of straw unscientifically piled and exposed, but he may be mulcted in damages for injuries to his neighbors' children, who, romping in his haymow, without his invitation, break their bones by sliding down his hay chute, or those who, playing in his rock quarry, are hurt. Shall he fence against adventurous, trespassing boys? Almost as well suggest 'that he build a wall against birds.' If he is held to liability for injury to the children of Jones because of the way he piles his lumber, by the same token, as to Brown, liability would be fastened on him for the way he piles his stones, his bricks, his corn in pens, his hayricks, and his cordwood on his private grounds; in fact, as has been pointedly said, every landowner will be liable for injuries to his neighbor's children under the new doctrine except the neighbor himself. We cannot well write the law that way."

No invitation to children to play in a lumber yard can be implied from the fact that the owner does not always drive them away when they enter it. Kelly v. Benas, supra.

So, a lumber pile on a vacant and uninclosed lot under defendant's control and adjacent to a lot on which she was erecting a building was held not an attractive nuisance in Middleton v. Reutler, 141 App. Div. 517, 126 N. Y. Supp. 315, and the defendant not liable, where a child nine years old was injured while playing on the lot by lumber falling upon him, there being no evidence to show who piled the lumber, or that it was negligently piled, or that defendant was in any way connected with the piling of it, the only evidence connecting defendant with it being a statement by plaintiff's mother to the effect that the defendant called upon her subsequent to the injury, and told her L.R.A.1915D.

she (defendant) had a right to put the lumber on the lot, and that plaintiff had no right to go there. The court stated that plaintiff at most was a mere licensee, and the owner of land is not bound by the common law to fence his land, nor is he under any obligations to make the same safe or to keep it in any particular condition for the benefit of trespassers, bare licensees, or persons going upon it without his invitation, express or implied. The court stated that the case could not be brought within the principle of the so-called Turntable Cases, or attractive nuisance.

So, where a lessee piled lumber on a lot adjoining a street, and a child, while at play, was injured by pulling several pieces of the timber upon him in attempting to get on or off the pile, the lessee was held not liable, in Powers v. Owego Bridge Co. 97 App. Div. 477, 89 N. Y. Supp. 1030, the case not coming within the attractive-nuisance doctrine. The court stated that defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff beyond that which it owed to other strangers, it had the right to use the premises in the usual manner in the prosecution of its business, and was not bound to anticipate that a trespasser would interfere with its property. The case is quite distinguishable from those where lumber or building material has been insecurely piled upon the street so as to menace the safety of those passing, and from those wherein dangerous structures have been maintained upon premises to which the public has been invited. The lumber was piled in the usual way, and if it had not been piled at all, the defendant could not have been held responsible for an injury to a trespasser.

In Kramer v. Southern R. Co. 127 N. C. 328, 52 L.R.A. 359, 37 S. E. 468, where a child was killed by the fall of cross-ties which a railroad company had piled in the street, counsel for plaintiff conceded that he did not contend for the application of the doctrine of the Turntable Cases; and the court observed that that doctrine would not apply if the ties had been carelessly piled on the defendant's premises; that those a typical turntable case. In the case of United States Natural Gas Co. v. Hicks, 134 Ky. 12, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249, 135 Am. St. Rep. 407, 119 S. W. 166, defendant maintained a defective gate valve in its pipe line underneath a street. Because of the defect the gas leaked. A child four years of age threw a match into the box, which caused an explosion, which injured plaintiff. It was held that, where a gas company maintained a pipe line in a highway, it was bound to protect it to prevent injuries to persons and children lawfully in the highway.

On the other hand, a recovery was denied in Louisville & P. Canal Co. v. Murphy, 9 Bush, 522, where a little girl five years of age fell through the railing of a bridge cases were exceptions to the general rule and went to the very limit of the law; adding that mere attractiveness of premises to children will not bring a case within the exceptional doctrine. It was held, upon the assumption that the defendant did not know that children were in the habit of playing on the ties in the street, that it was not liable; but, upon the assumption that it did know of that fact, and took no precautions to prevent such sport or to guard against injury to the children, it was liable, the decedent being too young to be chargeable with contributory negligence; the latter proposition, however, does not seem to rest upon the attractive-nuisance doctrine. Mr. Justice Furches, in a dissenting opinion, states that this case proceeds upon the theory that if a lumber dealer piles wood or lumber on his premises, though carelessly piled, and children play upon it, and are injured by its falling, the owner of the lumber is not liable in damages; but if he piles his lumber on the land of someone else, he is a trespasser, and if the lumber falls and injures the child, he is liable in damages. Furches was of the opinion that the railroad company had a right to pile the ties where it did, and was not liable as a trespasser.

Injury to a child while playing on a pile of railroad bridge ties in the railroad yard, which was fenced except on the side along the railroad track, and out of which the servants of the company always ordered any children found there, did not render the railway company liable, as it was not under obligation to so pile the ties as to prevent injury to a child climbing upon them. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Edwards, 90 Tex. 65, 32 L.R.A. 825, 36 S. W. 430. It is stated in the above case, in distinguishing the Turntable Cases, that the ruling in these cases must be justified upon one of two grounds: Either that the turntables possess such peculiar attractiveness as playthings for children that to leave them exposed should be deemed equivalent to an invitation to use them, or that, when unsecured, they are so obviously dangerous to children that, when it is discovered that maintained by defendant, and was killed. The evidence showed that the bridge was in good condition for purposes of travel. The court held that the defendant was not required to make its approach safe for children, but was required only to make it safe for the purposes of ordinary travel. In the case of Schauf v. Paducah, 106 Ky. 228, 90 Am. St. Rep. 220, 50 S. W. 42, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 73, it was shown that the city maintained a gravel pit which was filled with water. A little boy seven years of age walked into the water in pursuit of a bird. He got beyond his depth, and was drowned. A recovery was denied. In the case of Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb, 129 Ky. 395, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 179, 130 Am. St. Rep. 469, 111 S. W. 712, a wire heavily charged they are using them, it is negligence on the part of the owner not to take some steps to guard them against the danger. But when it is said that it is enough that the object or place is attractive or alluring to children, and when it is said, as has been intimated, that the fact that they resort to a particular locality is evidence of its attractiveness, the question suggests itself, What object or place is not attractive to very young persons who are left free to pursue their innate propensity to wander in quest of amusement? What object at all unusual is exempt from infantile curiosity? What place conveniently accessible for their congregation is free from the reckless feet of adventurous truants? We do not see that a yard kept by a railroad company for the deposit of old ties and other rejected material or new material for railroad repair and construction possesses any greater attraction for children than any other place of deposit of any similar material, kept by people pursuing other avocations. Is a pile of ties any more alluring than a pile of wood kept for fuel, or a pile of rails laid aside for making or repairing a farm fence? Children may injure themselves in playing on either. In such a case we conclude that the law does not devolve the duty upon the owner of the yard to see that the ties are so placed that children may not injure themselves while playing upon them. Though the ties may have been inartistically piled, we do not see that any danger should have been anticipated from the manner in which they were stored.

It is held in Busse v. Rogers, 120 Wis. 443, 64 L.R.A. 183, 98 N. W. 219, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 743, that one who, in using the street adjoining his property as part of his lumber yard, piles lumber there in an unstable manner, is liable for injuries caused by its fall upon a child who, while traveling along the street, follows its inclination to play, and attempts to climb upon the pile, and thereby causes the timber to fall; and the fact that, at the time a child is injured by the fall of lumber wrongfully and negligently piled in a highway, it has temporarily ceased to be a traveler, and turned aside with electricity ran in close proximity to a telephone pole. The wire was 18 feet from the ground. From the telephone pole two guy wires ran to the ground at an angle of about 45 degrees. A boy eleven years of age climbed up the guy wires. His head came in contact with the electric wire, and he was instantly killed. The court, after stating that the tendency of the more recent cases was to restrict rather than enlarge the Turntable Cases, held that the facts did not warrant a recovery. In the case of Hermes v. Hatfield Coal Co. 134 Ky. 300, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 724, 120 S. W. 351, the coal company maintained a coal chute in the city of Covington. A ladder ran from the ground to the top of the chute. A boy ten years of age climbed up the ladder, to play, does not bar its right of recovery against the wrongdoer. The court observes that this is not the case of an owner of land putting an attractive and lawful but dangerous machine or thing upon his own property and leaving it unguarded. It is the case of an owner placing an unlawful nuisance in the highway and leaving it unguarded. The child has a right in the highway. It must be recognized that he will play thereon if occasion offers. While it would not be accurate to say that the streets are made to play in, it would be equally inaccurate to say that a property owner can totally disregard the fact that children always have, and probably always will, play therein. He cannot lawfully lay anything like a trap for the child upon the highway, and escape the consequences by saying that the child would not have been injured had he confined himself exclusively to traveling.

The following cases do not discuss the attractive-nuisance doctrine, but the facts are such as to suggest the application of that doctrine:

Thus, one who stacks lumber in a public street is liable for injury to a six-year-old boy who falls therefrom, although it may not have been negligently piled, since its unguarded situation makes it an attractive and accessible object of danger to very young children. Harper v. Kopp, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2342, 73 S. W. 1127.

So, one was held liable in Spengler v. Williams, 67 Miss. 1, 6 So. 613, for the death of a child killed while at play by the falling of an unsafe pile of lumber in a public street, the recovery being allowed on the theory that the lumber so maintained was an attractive nuisance. The court stated that the allegation touching the character of the piled lumber as likely to induce children to play around and about it, and of defendant's knowledge of such fact, did not belong to that class of things required to be alleged in the pleading, or, if alleged, specifically proved.

So, one who had piled beer barrels on a sidewalk in front of his premises was held liable in Kreimer v. Straubmüller, 30 Pa. L.R.A.19151D.

and, while looking into the chute, fell and broke his neck. In denying a recovery the court said: "If the defendant company is responsible in the case at bar, then it is difficult to limit the rule which would hold a defendant responsible for the trespasses of children. There are very few things which do not afford an opportunity for head-long infancy to injure itself."

In the case of Myer v. Union Light, Heat & P. Co. 151 Ky. 332, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 136, 151 S. W. 941, the evidence showed that the light company furnished electricity to a church in Covington. Its wires passed down the side of the building and through a transformer into the cellar. A boy ten years of age, while hunting for a ball, climbed the fence inclosing the church yard, Super. Ct. 609, for injuries to a boy, received while playing upon them. The barrels were empty, were not in any way secured, and were so arranged in tiers as to be attractive to children. The pile of barrels was of such a character that the defendant should have anticipated that children would climb upon them in their play, and that the manner of piling was such as to render it dangerous to children who would be tempted to play thereon.

A railroad company was held liable in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Underwood, 114 C. C. A. 323, 194 Fed. 363, 3 N. C. C. A. 467, for injury to child six years old by a pile of lumber toppling over upon her while at play, the court stating that the conduct of the defendant in placing the lumber in an exposed situation and easily accessible to children of tender years constitutes actionable negligence.

Where a company, in violation of ordinance, piled lumber on the sidewalk in front of his premises, and a child four years old, while standing near or passing by, was killed by planks falling off the pile, the court, in True & T. Co. v. Woda, 201 Ill. 315, 66 N. E. 369, in affirming a judgment for plaintiff, stated that the company piled the lumber upon the sidewalk in a public street in the city in the vicinity of the homes of a number of children, and the evidence shows that it, through its agents, knew that the children were in the habit of congregating at the place where the lumber was piled, and climbing upon and over the same while at play. The pile of lumber, as thus situated, was of such character that the jury was justified in finding, from the evidence, that the company should have known it would be likely to attract small children; and if they climbed upon the lumber as piled it would be likely to fall upon them and injure them. The jury, from the evidence, were justified in finding that the company's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

Where a railroad company maintained a pile of wood in close proximity to the track, and knew for a year or more that children were accustomed to play there, it was held and, coming in contact with defendant's wires, was injured. A recovery was denied.

Counsel for appellant contend that the facts of this case bring it within the rule laid down in the case of Harper v. Kopp, supra, because the retaining wall was placed in a public street where plaintiff had the right to be. As before stated, however, the court rested its decision in the Kopp Case upon the fact that the defendant, without permission from the city authorities, stacked his lumber in a public street, where, because of its unguarded condition, it was dangerous to young children. In the case under consideration, the defendant was authorized by the city to build a viaduct and construct a retaining wall. The wall was placed where the defendant had the right to place it. The only ground, therefore, for holding the defendant liable, is that it maintained in a public place, in an unguarded and unprotected condition, a dangerous instrumentality or thing that was attractive to children. It could hardly be said that a retaining wall like the one in question is dangerous. It is not like a stack of lumber composed of separate pieces that are liable to fall at any time. On the occasion of the accident, it did not fall or break. The only sense in which it could be said to be dangerous is that it was easy to climb, and easy to fall from; but, for that matter, so is every tree, every pole, every fence, every ladder, every railing or set of steps, that the owner may have about his premises. It is charged in the petition liable in Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Matson, 68 Kan. 815, 75 Pac. 503, where a locomotive and a number of cars ran along the track close by, shaking the pile and causing a boy to fall under the train. The court stated that it was immaterial who owned the ground on which the pile of wood was placed, as the railroad company was aware of the situation and the danger. Even if the injury was the result of the concurrent negligence of two parties, the railroad company would be responsible where its negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

The negligence of a manufacturer was held a question for the jury in Valley Planing Mill Co. v. McDaniel, — Ark. —, 170 S. W. 994, where he left a truck loaded with lumber standing in the door of his dry kiln, abutting on a street, with the front end extending into the street about 3 feet, and a boy nine years old, walking along the street, reached up and caught hold of the front end of the truck, causing it to fall over and crush him. The evidence showed that the street abutting on the dry shed of the manufacturer where the boy was injured was not a very much traveled street by footmen, but the manufacturer, in the exercise of that care which the law requires of an ordinarily prudent person in the conduct of his business, was bound to anticipate that children, as well as adults, were likely to be walking along the street, and that a child of tender years might be tempted to play with a loaded truck, or to indulge in such childish pranks as the one in question. The child was upon the street, where it had a right to be; and the manufacturer should not only have anticipated that children were likely to walk upon the street, but that they were also likely to turn aside from travel and play and meddle with a loaded truck which extended out into the street. Having left the truck there, heavily loaded with lumber, with the front end sticking up, and the load on the truck so near evenly balanced that only a slight exertion was necessary to tilt it down, the manufacturer's negligence was, in the opinion of the court, a question for the jury. L.R.A.1915D.

Where certain persons in possession and control of an unfenced lot upon a public street had piled lumber on it so negligently that an infant playing near it was killed by one of the timbers falling upon him. It was held in Bransom v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193, that such persons, in placing the lumber on the lot, were bound to make it reasonably safe and secure against injury to children coming near it, and that a failure to do so rendered them prima facie guilty of negligence. In this case they had been notified of the dangerous character of the lumber piles, and were requested to make it safe, which, with ordinary diligence they could have done, but they failed and refused to do so. The lumber pile was within 40 feet of a public street, across a pathway the public had been accustomed to use, and upon an open, unfenced lot that children had for years been in the habit of resorting to by license of the owner, and without objection or warning by defendants, and to which they could, before the timber was placed thereon, resort with safety. It was therefore the duty of defendants, in placing their timber upon the lot, to do it in such a manner as to make it reasonably safe and secure against injuries to children coming there.

The owner of a lumber pile in a public landing place was held not liable, however, in Lynch v. Knopp, 118 La. 611, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480, 118 Am. St. Rep. 391, 43 So. 352, 10 Ann. Cas. 807, for the death of an eight-year-old girl, caused by the fall of lumber upon her, due to the fact that other children had gone upon the lumber and displaced pieces of it, since the owner had no reason to suspect that children would do that, and for the reason that the lumber pile was not such an object as to attract children or excite their curiosity.

Where lumber was piled in a passage or gangway on private property 54 feet from a public street, the owner was held not liable in Vanderbeek v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 467, where a child was killed by a pile of lumber toppling over upon her while gathering wood. The court stated that the passageways were in no sense intended for that defendant was negligent in not constructing the protecting wall in such a way that it could not be climbed. It is suggested that spikes could have been placed on it. Manifestly, if this had been done, and plaintiff had been injured, there would have been greater reason for holding the defendant liable. It is also suggested that a fence or a guard rail might have been constructed at the lower point of the wall. As this would have rendered access to the wall a little more difficult, the natural result would have been to increase the number of climbers, and not only add to their danger by furnishing them something else to fall from, but to impose upon the defendant the further duty of also guarding and protecting the additional guard rail or fence. In our opinion, the retaining wall in question was not such a dangerous instrumentality or thing as to impose on the defendant any liability for its original construction or its failure to construct barriers to prevent boys from climbing on it. It follows that the trial court properly sustained the demurrer to the petition.

the use of the public except as they might have occasion to go there for the purpose of business; the public, otherwise than to that extent, were not either expressly or impliedly invited or allured to pass through them. The occasional passing through by persons to reach a public street was not encouraged by the defendant or in any way acquiesced in, otherwise than as may be implied from not expressly forbidding it. The presence of children in the passageway was without the consent or even acquiescence of the defendant, for it cannot be disputed that generally they were driven out of the yard. Under these circumstances the defendant ought not to have been held responsible to the plaintiff for mere neglect in the mode of piling the lumber. The plaintiff was only a volunteer, and not there within the scope of the purpose of the way, or by any act of the defendant induced to come into it. The exposure of such gangways, clearly intended for business uses alone, although in a populous locality, where children might be tempted, from curiosity or idle purpose, to go, is not sufficient to require the defendant either to fence his yard or pile his lumber with reference to the fact that children might be injured by mere neglect in its piling. The court further stated that the defendant ought not to be held to the duty of reasonable care towards plaintiff in the piling of the lumber, piling it so as to prevent any danger that would be likely to come to children who might naturally and reasonably be expected to frequent the locality without a conscious purpose of mischief or conscious unlawful act. Plaintiff's age could have no bearing except on the question of contributory negligence; and if the defendant had been guilty of any neglect of duty towards him, his tender years might have shielded him from any imputation of carelessness.

It is culpable negligence to pile lumber near a sidewalk so that a child, by applying slight force, may topple it over. Earl v. Crouch, 40 N. Y. S. R. 847, 16 N. Y. Supp. 770, affirmed in 131 N. Y. 613, 30 N. E. 864. The court in the above case stated that there was abundant evidence that the lumber was piled in a negligent, careless manner, instead of piling it so that the tiers would rest against and support each other; the tier that fell was so piled that the slight force supplied to it by the child toppled it over. Fixing such a trap upon a street in an inhabited part of a city, with the strong probability that children would be playing about it at all hours of the day, was reckless, culpable negligence.

A builder who, under a permit from the city authorities, piled lumber in the highway so negligently that it toppled over and killed a boy playing on the sidewalk, was held liable in Addis v. Hess, 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 506.

A boy does not become, as matter of law, a loungee by stopping in a street on his way home, to rest and cool off, after finishing a game which he had been playing in a vacant lot, so as to prevent his recovering for injuries by the fall upon him of lumber illegally piled in the highway. Kessler v. Berger, 205 Pa. 289, 61 L.R.A. 611, 54 Atl. 887, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 203.

Telegraph poles and trees.

A telegraph pole with guy wire attached and prongs exposed was, in Thompson v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 138 Ky. 109, 127 S. W. 531, held not to constitute an attractive or dangerous trap for little children, so as to render the telegraph company liable for injuries to a child who slipped, striking the guy wire, in attempting to climb the pole.

In holding a guy wire not a dangerous instrumentality, attractive and alluring to children, within the meaning of the Turntable Cases, the court in Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb, 129 Ky. 395, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 179, 130 Am. St. Rep. 469, 111 S. W. 712, stated that as long as electric light wires are not put under ground, they must be put upon poles; and where they are placed above the street as high as 18 feet, the company should not be required to anticipate that children will climb up to the wires and get hurt. Guy wires are necessary on high poles at street corners where the line turns. A guy wire placed on a high pole to keep it in place, or some such contrivance, cannot well be dispensed with. Such a wire is not a dangerous instrumentality, attractive or alluring to children, within the meaning of the Turntable Cases. The little boy was a trespasser upon the defendant's wire, and, being a trespasser, he cannot complain that the premises were unsafe. Children no less than adults, when they trespass upon the property of another, take the risk unless the circumstances bring the case within the principle of what is known as the Turntable Cases, where a dangerous instrumentality is maintained, with knowledge, actual or constructive, that it is alluring to children and endangers them. A wire 18 feet above the ground, which can only be reached as this wire was, cannot be said to fall within the exception to the general rule.

And the fact that a telegraph pole contained protruding spikes or foot rests starting from a point about 20 inches from the ground did not bring it within the turntable doctrine so as to render a power company liable for injury to a child by falling while attempting to climb the pole. The court stated that it would be unwise to extend the doctrine of the Turntable Cases to cases of this character. It would seriously retard the material progress and cripple the business interest of the country if persons owning and operating public utilities which, from their very nature, require the use of structures and appliances placed in proximity to public highways, should be forbidden to use or maintain any structure or appliance of a kind calculated to attract and allure children to attempt their use as playthings, and which, when so used, becomes dangerous. Simonton v. Citizens' Electric Light & P. Co. 28 Tex. Civ. App. 374, 67 S. W. 530.

An electric railway company was held not liable, in Johnston v. New Omaha Thomson Houston Electric Light Co. 78 Neb. 24, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 435, 110 N. W. 711, 113 N. W. 526, for injury to a boy by taking hold of a live wire on a trolley pole located outside of a walk along a viaduct in a city. The court said that the structure was not of such a character as to be obviously attractive to children. And in a per curiam opinion, it was stated that the case appears to be quite unlike the Turntable Cases and others of like kind, where children are injured by machinery and appliances attractive as playthings, and left unguarded in such situations as to invite them to gratify their impulses without knowledge or apprehension of danger.

It was held in Temple v. McComb City Electric Light & P. Co. 89 Miss. 1, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 449, 119 Am. St. Rep. 698, 42 So. 874, 10 Ann. Cas. 924, that an electric light company was bound to have reasonably expected that small boys of the neighborhood would climb a little oak tree abounding in branches extending almost to the ground, and that the company was liable where a boy did climb the tree and came in contact with one of the company's uninsulated wires, receiving injury. The court stated that the immemorial habit of small boys to climb little oak trees filled with abundant branches reaching almost to the ground is a habit of which corporations stretching their wires over such trees must take notice. This court, so far as the exertion of its L.R.A.1915D.

power in a legitimate way is concerned, intends to exert that power so as to secure, at the hands of these public utility corporations handling and controlling these extraordinarily dangerous agencies, the highest degree of skill and care.

Other structures or things.

It was held in Northwestern Elev. R. Co. v. O'Malley, 107 Ill. App. 599, that the company could not be held liable under the doctrine of the Turntable Cases where an eight-year-old boy went under an elevated railroad structure in process of erection and was hurt by a piece of iron falling upon him, it appearing that he was not attracted to the place of danger by the structure, or by any work that was being carried on, and that he was not invited there expressly or by implication. The principle of the Turntable Cases, states the court, is that the child cannot be regarded as a voluntary trespasser because he is induced to come into the place of danger by the defendant's own conduct.

So, where a ten-year-old boy climbed upon an elevated railway structure in search of a ball, and while there stumbled against a live wire, the railroad company was held not liable in McAllister v. Jung, 112 Ill. App. 138, under the doctrine of the Turntable Cases, where there was no evidence tending to show that boys of tender years, or others, had been in the habit of climbing upon such a structure, and it appeared that the wire was not exposed, unguarded, or easy of access from the street, and that there was nothing on the surface of the roadbed or top of the structure attractive or alluring to childish instincts, and where it appeared that the company had no reason to anticipate that children or others would endeavor to resort to it at that place. The difference between the case at bar and the Turntable Cases, where the place was open, easy of access, frequented by children, and in itself attractive, observed the court, was so wide that it could discover no ground of comparison and no basis for the application of the doctrine of those cases.

So, where a child climbed a ladder and was killed by falling down a coal chute maintained on a city street by a coal company, the company was held not liable in Hermes v. Hatfield Coal Co. 134 Ky. 300, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 724, 120 S. W. 351, the infant being a trespasser, and the ladder and chute being in nowise defective. The court stated that this case fell within the principle of Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb, 129 Ky. 395, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 179, 130 Am. St. Rep. 469, 111 S. W. 712, supra, under "Telegraph Poles," and that the case did not fall within the principle of Branson v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193, a lumber-pile case.

So, the turntable doctrine was, in O'Hara v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 244 Mo. 395, 148 S. W. 884, held inapplicable to a large gas pipe left near the curb of a street by contractors, unblocked, and which started to roll, killing a boy nine years old, playing in the center of the street. "The length of time the pipe remained in position demonstrated it was securely laid, and no carelessness can be predicated in regard to the manner in which it was laid unless the defendant was bound to anticipate children would play about it, and guard against an injury to them. In my opinion this is invoking the doctrine of the Turntable Cases and applying it to an instance to which it had no application. There was nothing about these pipes in the street so attractive to children, or so dangerous to them if attracted, as to impose on defendant the duty of taking precautions with a special reference to accidents to children. Children will romp occasionally about any appliance, tool, or device they have access to; but only those which are apt to entice them into danger impose on the owner the duty of guarding against their intrusion. In fact, the Turntable Cases are anomalous, and it is the practice of the court to carry their doctrine no further than the previous decision compelled." So, of course (the court observed), the mere laying of the pipe on the slight incline proved in the case does not create a condition of things to invoke the turntable doctrine. Pipes placed in the street are not, of and within themselves, either so attractive to children and so imminently dangerous to children as to authorize the application of the rule applied to turntables and cases involving other inherently dangerous and inherently attractive objects. The application of the rule imposed the duty upon defendant to use special care as to children. This was a burden not imposed by the law under the facts of the case.

And while the doctrine of the Turntable Cases, states the court in Devine v. Armour & Co. 159 Ill. App. 74, is not limited in Illinois to those nuisances which are automatically dangerous to children seeking merely amusement, nevertheless the owner of a dilapidated house cannot be held to a duty to prevent children from coming on the premises to gather wood by tearing it down, especially in the absence of any proof that children, without express permission, were in the habit of indulging in such practice.

Where the owner of a tenement building was held not liable for the death of a nine-year-old boy who went out on the platform of a fire escape and fell through an insecure trapdoor, the court in McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126, 26 Am. Rep. 561, in distinguishing the Turntable Cases from this, stated that a child is permitted to go into the public streets, which are open to persons of all ages, without being chargeable with negligence, and, being there, if led by attractions into danger, even although it may be that, under some circumstances, an action would lie for injuries sustained thereby, such a case has no similarity to one where the child is left without anyone to take special charge of him, and escapes through an open, unguarded window to a place of danger, and sustains an injury without any allurements being held out to him. A wide distinction exists between the two cases, and while the one at bar is on the border line, and the point of difference is, perhaps, very close, this distinction is fully recognized in the best considered adjudications in the court, and is the turning point upon which cases of this character are to be determined.

Falling within the McAlpin Case, supra, is that of Martin v. Cahill, 39 Hun, 445, where it is held that a painter's ladder hung horizontally, and left under the window of a house while a coat of paint is drying, presents no invitation to a girl under nine years of age to let herself down upon it, so as to render the painter liable for injuries to the child by a fall therefrom, not occasioned by the insecurity of the ladder itself, the child having been warned by him to keep off.

Another case coming within the McAlpin Case, supra, is Kelly v. Smith, 29 App. Div. 346, 51 N. Y. Supp. 413, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 668, which holds that no liability attaches to one who, in compliance with a statute, has provided the fire escape on his building with a suitable ladder for reaching the ground, where the ladder is removed by boys from a place of safety on the second balcony and hung on the first balcony, from which it falls, causing fatal injuries to a seven-year-old child at play on it.

Where a child was injured while playing on a pile of stones in an unfenced lot belonging to defendant, the defendant was held not liable in Latham v. Johnson, 82 L. J. K. B. N. S. 258, [1913] 1 K. B. 398, 108 L. T. N. S. 4, 77 J. P. 137, 57 Sol. Jo. 127, 29 Times L. R. 124, the doctrine of attractive nuisance being held inapplicable, there being neither allurement, nor trap, nor invitation, nor dangerous object placed upon the land.

But where a railway company maintains in its freight yard an abandoned roundhouse on the roof of which it knew boys were in the habit of playing, the company was, in Osborn v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 86 Kan. 440, 121 Pac. 364, held liable on the theory of attractive nuisance where a boy was killed in the act of climbing the smoke-stack, which fell on him.

An owner was held not liable in Harris v. Cowles, 38 Wash. 336, 107 Am. St. Rep. 847, 80 Pac. 537, under the turntable doctrine, for injury to a child by being caught in a revolving door maintained at the entrance of a building, there being no allegation showing that the owner was, at the time, under any relations of duty to the child other than that which he owed to an ordinary trespasser, or, at most, to a mere licensee, and there being no allegation showing that the door was not so constructed as to safely answer the purposes for which it was intended when used for that purpose only; viz., for passage to and from the building. It would be difficult, said the court, to apply the turntable rule to a device of this kind, intended, as it was, for constant use in passing to and from the building. It could not be used for the purpose intended if it should be locked. The rule of the Turntable Cases requires that the device shall be kept locked or guarded when not in use, and it is well known that the ordinary turntable is used only occasionally. The purpose of this circular door, however, requires that it shall be subject to the uses of ordinary passage at any moment, and it is manifestly impracticable to keep it locked or guarded if it serves the purpose intended. The court further stated that it has already been made clear by former decisions that this court will not extend the application of the doctrine of the Turntable Cases beyond a turntable itself. Whatever may be said of the wisdom of that rule as applied to the one condition, established, as it was, by judicial decisions, but severely criticized by others refusing to follow it, still when we contemplate its extension to the manifold other relations and conditions which arise in the affairs of life, we must see that it would be productive of litigation to such an extent as would greatly endanger the security of property interests. It is aptly suggested by respondent in his brief, that swings, teeter boards, lumber piles, fences, gates, walls, buildings, trees, hanging on vehicles, and numerous other similar things are attractive to children. It will therefore be seen that if this doctrine should be made one of general application for the protection of children against everything that may be especially attractive to them, it would result in requiring all property holders to assume toward children who may be attracted to their premises a degree of duty and care which properly belongs to parents or guardians.

The fact that cross steps on a bridge pier could be used as ladders, and the fact that pigeons were in the habit of rearing their young on the beams and around the top of the bridge, rendering the bridge a place attractive to small boys, will not render an electric power company liable for injury to a boy who, in climbing the bridge, comes in contact with a live wire, 30 feet above the ground, and is thereby hurt, since the things that constitute the attraction are features connected with the river, the bridge, and the pigeons, which are matters for the existence of which the company is not responsible, and the accident is not one which the company should have anticipated. Graves v. Washington Water Power Co. 44 Wash. 675, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 452, 87 Pac. 956. In the above case the court stated that if the company's responsibility extended this far, it would be difficult to say where a limit could be fixed. In this state we see electric wires stretched on poles through our towns and cities, and along highways, through farms, orchards, and forests in the country. Can it be held that companies operating these wires must keep them out of reaching distance of every high tree, building, fence, wall, pole, or other place of elevation into or upon which a boy may possibly be allured by birds' nests or other attractions? Sup. L.R.A.1915D.

pose birds should build their nests under the eaves of a sawmill that had a ladder attached to its side, and a boy, attracted by said ladder and birds' nests should climb the ladder, and purposely or inadvertently thrust his hand through a window against a running saw, in the upper story of said mill, would the owner of the mill be liable for the boy's injuries? Suppose a merchant should keep dynamite (in order to have it out of the way of people) upon the roof of his store, and some boy, without the consent and against the wishes of the owner of adjoining premises, should climb a tree thereon for birds, and, while up in tree, reach over and explode some dynamite,—would the owner thereof be holden for the injury thereby occasioned to the boy? Regardless of what the name may be, it seems to us, said the court, that the contention of respondent is an invitation for the extension of the turntable doctrine beyond the limits permitted by the law as heretofore announced by this and the great majority of the courts.

The doctrine of the Turntable Cases was held inapplicable in Witte v. Stifel, 126 Mo. 295, 47 Am. St. Rep. 668, 28 S. W. 891, where the owner of a building in the process of construction was held not liable for the death of a seven-year-old boy who, while at play, pulled a loose stone over upon him in attempting to get upon a window sill and was thereby killed, no inducement or invitation, implied or otherwise, being held out to him. The court said that it was not shown in the case that the defendant knew of the dangerous condition of the stone, or that children were in the habit of resorting to the building for play; nor was there anything about the construction unusual or unique, which would be attractive to children. The child was a mere intruder and trespasser, and the defendant owed him no duty except the negative one not to wantonly or maliciously injure him.

The following cases do not discuss the attractive-nuisance doctrine, but their facts are such as to warrant their inclusion in the note:

Thus, where persons left stringers or boards across a canal where they had been working, and a child four and one-half years old wandered to the place, fell off of one of the boards, and was drowned, it was held in Blum v. Weatherford & C. Bros. 121 La. 298, 46 So. 317, that the stringers were not attractive to children, and that the defendants were not liable. The court stated that a person not in any way negligent, not suspecting and without cause to suspect that a child of tender years would leave the playground and attempt to cross on stringers that he had placed across the canal, cannot be held liable for damages. If the contrary were the rule, then all boards across a small stream, canal, or drain would have to be removed immediately after they had been used, although not intended as a crossing place, and not attractive at all as such.

It is held in Williamson v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 40 Tex. Civ. App. 18, 88 S. W.

279, that the fact that a railroad bridge abutment is constructed with stone steps which, to the knowledge of the company, are attractive to children, does not show an invitation, express or implied, for children to make use of them as a stairway, in the absence of evidence to show that this is not the usual and ordinary method of construction; and the company is therefore not liable for the death of a four-year-old boy who falls from the steps and is killed.

Actual knowledge that children resort to a railroad trestle to play is, in Dwyer v. Missouri P. R. Co. 12 Mo. App. 597, held immaterial in an action brought to recover for the death of a child killed by the fall of an iron placed thereon by the company, since it is bound to take notice of the habits of children, the character of the place, and the natural consequence of so placing the iron.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

Appt.,
v.

HARRY SMITH.

Intoxicating liquor — keeping — purpose.

1. A statute making it unlawful to keep, store, or possess any intoxicating liquors in any place other than a private residence will not be limited to a keeping for sale, where other provisions relate to a keeping for such purpose.

Constitutional law — property rights — storing liquors.

2. A statute prohibiting the keeping of intoxicating liquors which are not intended

Note. — Power to prohibit the keeping of intoxicating liquor irrespective of any intention to sell it in violation of law.

The earlier cases on this question are discussed in the note to Eidge v. Bessemer, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 394.

An ordinance making it unlawful for any person who is "keeper, owner, lessee, manager, inmate, employee, hiring, or watcher of a house of prostitution or assignation (or any house where a prostitute lives), or who is an habitual visitor thereto, or who loafs around such place or places, to keep or have intoxicating liquors in such house in any quantity whatever, or for any purpose whatever, except on a physician's prescription for medicinal purposes," is beyond the power of a municipality to enact. Shreveport v. Hill, 134 La. 352, 64 So. 137. It is stated in the opinion that the state had not made it a crime to have intoxicating liquors for sale at places other than private residences is an unconstitutional interference with property rights.

A PPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren County dismissing a warrant charging defendant with keeping intoxicating liquors at a place other than his private residence in violation of statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. W. Thomas and R. C. P. Thomas, for appellee:

The legislature of this commonwealth has never undertaken to prohibit the possession of liquor by the owner thereof, for a lawful purpose, in local-option territory.

in possession or for personal use, and that although in the parish in which the municipality in question was situated it appeared that it had been decided under a local-option statute, to withhold licenses from drinking saloons, and to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, this vote did not and could not have made the possession of intoxicating liquors for every purpose a crime. It is further stated that the ordinance is beyond the terms of any state statute in that it interferes with personal liberty; that although houses of prostitution may be regulated and may be closed by the council, yet the property of the keepers may not be confiscated and their personal liberty be interfered with so long as they and their property are not inimical to the public safety.

A statute making it unlawful "for any person to have or keep in excess of 1 quart of spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquors or any imitation thereof or substitute therefor, or in any manner permit any

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

At the 1914 session the general assembly passed an act entitled "An Act Prohibiting the Shipment of Liquors for Sale in Local-Option Territory and Prohibiting Persons from Having in Possession for Sale Liquors in Such Territory." Acts 1914, chap. 7, p. 25. The act was approved March 9, 1914.

Section 1 makes the payment by any person in prohibited territory of the United States internal revenue tax permitting the sale of intoxicating liquors, an intent to violate the prohibitory law, and makes it unlawful for any such person to buy, bargain for, accept, receive, hold, or possess intoxicating liquors.

Section 2 makes it unlawful for any person to consign, ship, or transport intoxicating liquors to any person in prohibited territory, or for any person residing in such territory to receive such liquors, unless the packages containing the same shall be marked and labeled in a certain manner.

Section 3 requires railroad, express, or other transportation companies doing business in the state to keep certain records of the transportation and delivery of all intoxicating liquors in prohibited territory.

Section 4 is as follows:

"In any county, district, precinct, town or city in this state where the sale of any of the liquors mentioned in § 1 is prohibited, it shall be unlawful for any person to keep, store, or possess any such liquors in any room, building or structure other than the private residence of such person, and which is not used as a place of public resort: Provided, that none of the provisions of this section shall apply to druggists authorized to sell such liquors, nor to persons possessing such liquors for medicinal, mechanical, chemical, scientific or sacramental purposes, nor apply to such liquors in the process of transportation or in the possession of a common carrier, nor any wholesale dealer in, or brewer, or distiller engaged in the manufacture of such liquors in said prohibition territory."

Section 5 provides that all liquors consigned, shipped, transported in any manner, received, held, or possessed contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be deemed contraband.

Section 6 defines the word "person" as used in the act.

Section 7 prescribes certain penalties for violation of the act.

Section 8 repeals all acts inconsistent with the provisions of the act.

Defendant, Harry Smith, was charged with a violation of § 4 of the act, and was fined by the county court. On appeal to the circuit court, § 4 of the act was held unconstitutional, and the defendant discharged. The commonwealth appeals.

The facts on which the prosecution is based are admitted, and are in brief as follows:

Between the 1st and 9th days of June, 1914, Harry Smith and three of his friends arranged to go camping. They made up a fund to purchase beer for the trip. The beer was ordered from the City Bottling Works of New Albany, Indiana, with directions to consign it to defendant. The beer arrived on June 11, 1914. The expenses incident to the purchase and transportation of the beer were paid by Smith and his three friends. When the beer was received, it was carried to a room in the rear of the office of a local physician, and in the latter's control, and placed there with his con-other person to have or keep any spirituous, vinous, fermented or malt liquors, or any imitation thereof or substitute therefor, or any liquors or compounds of any kind or description whatsoever . . . upon, in or about his place of business or any place of amusement or recreation or any public resort or any club room, whether such liquors be intended for personal use of the person so having and keeping the same or not," was held unconstitutional in Ex parte Wilson, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 457, 119 Pac. 596. The court states: "The only conclusion that we can legitimately arrive at is that the act in question is not within a reasonable exercise of the police powers of the state,—is unconstitutional and void. We may observe, however, that although the law cannot prevent one from having intoxicating liquors in his possession for his own use, yet this court has always held that the possession of an unusual quantity of intoxicating liquors is a circumstance which, together with other competent proof, L.R.A.1915D.

is admissible against the defendant in the trial of cases involving violations of the prohibitory statute. But such possession alone is insufficient to sustain a conviction."

On the contrary, in State v. Phillips, — Miss. —, post, 530, 67 So. 651, a statute providing "that no intoxicating liquor within the meaning of this act shall be kept in any locker or other place in any social club or organization for use therein, and all persons carrying such liquor to such club or locker for use therein or keeping the same for such use, shall be guilty of a violation of this act," was sustained as a valid exercise of the police power. It is stated that this statute does not deprive the members of the club or social organization affected, of the equal protection of the law.

The earlier cases on the power to prohibit or restrict one using intoxicating liquor or having the same in his possession for his own use are discussed in the note to Com. v. Campbell, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 172.

sent. The fishing trip was abandoned, and the parties proceeded to drink, and invite some of their friends to drink, the beer. The last few remaining bottles were drunk on June 16th, after the act above set out went into effect. No part of the beer was taken from the room where it was placed. No person became intoxicated from drinking any of the beer, and no person other than Smith and his three friends contributed any portion of the expense incurred in purchasing the beer or in its preparation for use.

It will be observed that § 4 of the act in question makes it unlawful for any person to keep, store, or possess intoxicating liquors in any room, building, or structure other than the private residence of such person, which is not used as a place of public resort, in prohibited territory. In view of the evident purpose of the legislature, as expressed in the title to the act, it is insisted that the words, "for sale," should be interpolated in § 4, and the act construed so as to prohibit the possession for sale of intoxicating liquors in any room, building, or structure other than the private residence of the person possessing them. It is also argued that where an act is susceptible of two constructions, one of which will render the statute unconstitutional and the other constitutional, that construction which sustains the constitutionality of the act should be adopted. It must be remembered, however, that we already have in force a statute making the possession of intoxicating liquors for the purpose of sale in local option territory unlawful. In view of this fact, and of the further fact that, if the words, "for sale," are interpolated in § 4, the necessary effect of that section will be to give persons the right to keep intoxicating liquors at their private residences for the purpose of sale in prohibited territory, we conclude that the section in question is not susceptible of such a construction, but that the legislature intended to make the possession of intoxicating liquors in prohibited territory at any other place than the private residence of the person possessing the same unlawful, irrespective of any purpose or intention to sell the same.

In view of this conclusion, it is necessary to determine whether or not under our Constitution the legislature has this power. For the commonwealth it is insisted that the act is aimed at the bootlegger, who generally hides or secretes intoxicating liquors at places other than his own residence, and in order to prevent sales by the bootlegger it is within the police power of the legislature to make unlawful the possession in prohibited territory of intoxicating liquors at places other than the private residence of the person owning the same. On the other hand, it is insisted for the defendant that under our Constitution the police power of the general assembly is somewhat restricted, and that the broad power of prohibiting or limiting the place of possession does not exist, unless the possession is for an unlawful purpose. A question very similar to the one here involved was before this court in the case of Com. v. Campbell, 133 Ky. 50, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 172, 117 S. W. 383, 19 Ann. Cas. 159. There the city of Nicholasville, where local option prevailed, enacted an ordinance making it unlawful for any person to deliver or distribute in the town of Nicholasville any intoxicating liquors; provided, however, that any person might bring into the town on his person and as his personal baggage and for his own use such liquors in quantities not exceeding 1 quart. The ordinance was held unconstitutional, on the ground that the police power did not extend to the deprivation of a citizen of his right to have intoxicating liquors in his possession for his own use, and on the further ground that our Constitution deprives the legislature of the power of forbidding citizens to have such liquors in their possession for their own use. In discussing this question the court said: "Now, can it be contended with any show of reason that the framers of the Constitution intended to leave the question of the retailing of liquor in a given district to a vote of the majority of the qualified voters in the district, and yet leave it in the power of the legislature upon its own motion to prohibit the possession of liquor by the citizen? Before the present Constitution, it was competent for the legislature to prohibit the sale of liquor by retail in any county, town, or district without any vote being taken by the citizens, or without giving them any voice in the matter; but no one doubts that, under the present Constitution, it is not competent for the legislature, without a vote of the citizens, to declare the retailing of liquor in any part of the state unlawful. How vain it would be, then, for the framers of the Constitution to thus take from the legislature the power to regulate the retailing of liquor, and place that question within the competency of the qualified voters, and yet leave within the competency of the legislature the greater power of prohibiting the citizen either from possessing liquor or using it for his own benefit or comfort. It is self-evident that, if the legislature may pass a general law prohibiting any citizen from possessing or using liquor in any quantity, this would in itself be the most perfect prohibition law possible, because no man could retail [liquor] without first having possession of it. We cannot believe that the framers of the Constitution intended to thus carefully take from the legislature the power to regulate the sale of liquor, and at the same time leave with that department of the state government the greater power of prohibiting the possession or ownership of liquor. The fact that the Constitution, by § 154, leaves with the general assembly the power of restricting or prohibiting the sale or gift of liquor on election days, clearly shows that the convention had it in mind that but for this special power the legislature could not even regulate the sale of liquor on election days. The history of our state from its beginning shows that there was never even the claim of a right on the part of the legislature to interfere with the citizen using liquor for his own comfort, provided that in so doing he committed no offense against public decency by being intoxicated; and we are of opinion that it never has been within the competency of the legislature to so restrict the liberty of the citizen, and certainly not since the adoption of the present Constitution."

The opinion concludes as follows: "The right to use liquor for one's own comfort, if the use is without direct injury to the public, is one of the citizen's natural and inalienable rights, guaranteed to him by the Constitution, and cannot be abridged as long as the absolute power of a majority is limited by our present Constitution. The theory of our government is to allow the largest liberty to the individual commensurate with the public safety, or, as it has been otherwise expressed, that government is best which governs the least. Under our institutions there is no room for that inquisitorial and protective spirit which seeks to regulate the conduct of men in matters in themselves indifferent, and to make them conform to a standard, not of their own choosing, but the choosing of the lawgiver,—that inquisitorial and protective spirit which seeks to prescribe what a man shall eat and wear, or drink or think, thus crushing out individuality and insuring Chinese inertia by the enforcement of the use of the Chinese shoe in the matter of the private conduct of mankind."

Black, in his work on Intoxicating Liquors (page 50), says: "But it is justly held that a provision in such a law that no person without a state license shall 'keep in his possession, for another, spirituous liquors,' is unconstitutional and void. 'The keeping of liquors in his possession by a person, whether for himself, or for another, unless he does so for the illegal sale L.R.A.1915D.

of it, or for some other improper purpose, can by no possibility injure or affect the health, morals, or safety of the public, and therefore the statute prohibiting such keeping in possession is not a legitimate exertion of the police power. It is an abridgement of the privileges and immunities of the citizen without any legal justification, and therefore void.'"

In Freund on Police Power, §§ 453, 454, quoting from an article on Personal Liberty in the Cyclopedia of Temperance and Prohibition, we find the following: "Even the advocates of prohibition concede that the state has no concern with the private use of liquor. 'The opponents of prohibition misstate the case by saying that the state has no right to declare what a man shall eat or drink. The state does not venture to make any such declaration. . . . It is not the private appetite or home customs of the citizen that the state undertakes to manage, but the liquor traffic. . . . If, by abolishing the saloon, the state makes it difficult for men to gratify their private appetites, there is no just reason for complaint.' . . . It is therefore significant that the policy of prohibition stops short of dealing with the private act of consumption."

In Ex parte Brown, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 295, 70 Am. St. Rep. 743, 42 S. W. 554, it was held that the keeping of liquors in one's possession, whether for himself or another, unless intended for illegal sale or for some other improper purpose, can by no possibility injure or affect the health, morals, or safety of the public, and therefore a statute prohibiting the keeping of such liquors in one's possession is not a legitimate exercise of the police power, but an abridgement of the privileges and immunities of the citizen, without any legal justification.

In the case of State v. Gilman, 33 W. Va. 146, 6 L.R.A. 847, 10 S. E. 283, a statute prohibiting a citizen from having in his possession for another intoxicating liquors was held unconstitutional. The decision was predicated on the principle that every person has a right to keep or use liquor for his own benefit or to keep it for another, provided he does not attempt to sell it or otherwise use it so as to injure the public. In the case of State v. Williams, 146 N. C. 618, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 299, 61 S. E. 61, 14 Ann. Cas. 502, a statute prohibiting the carrying of more than a half gallon of intoxicating liquor into prohibited territory in any one day was held void, on the ground that it deprived such person of his constitutional property right in case he had no intention to sell the liquor. To the same effect are the following cases:

Eidge v. Bessemer, 164 Ala. 599, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 394, 51 So. 246; Titsworth v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 268, 101 Pac. 288; Henderson v. Heyward, 109 Ga. 373, 47 L.R.A. 366, 77 Am. St. Rep. 384, 34 S. E. 590; Sullivan v. Oneida, 61 Ill. 242.

The power of a state to regulate and control the conduct of a private individual is confined to those cases where his conduct injuriously affects others. With his faults or weaknesses, which he keeps to himself, and which do not operate to the detriment of others, the state as such has no concern. In other words, the police power may be called into play when it is reasonably necessary to protect the public health or public morals or public safety. The mere fact that the legislature sees fit to enact a statute ostensibly for the purpose of promoting such ends is not conclusive of the question. When, therefore, the statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health or public morals or public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the court so to adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution. State v. Williams, supra; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273. We have in force a statute prohibiting the possession of intoxicating liquor in prohibited territory for the purpose of sale. Under this statute very slight evidence is sufficient to secure a conviction. Where, therefore, the purpose of the owner is unlawful, the above statute is effective. Here it is sought to go one step further, and make the possession for an innocent purpose considered from the standpoint of the police power as much of an offense as if the possession were for an unlawful purpose. Manifestly, if the legislature has the power to prohibit such possession at places other than one's private residence, then it has the like power to prohibit such possession even at a private residence, and this is exactly what was held in Com. v. Campbell, supra, could not be done. There must of necessity be limits beyond which the legislature cannot rightfully go. We think that limit is reached when it prohibits such possession for sale or other unlawful purpose. It cannot go further and prohibit such possession, or limit the place of possession, where the liquors are intended for one's own use, and therefore for a purpose with which the police power of the state is not concerned. It will not do to say that, because some persons may evade the law as it now exists, others who have no intention of violating the law should be denied their constitutional rights. L.R.A.1915D.

As this is the effect of § 4 of the act in question, we concur in the ruling of the Circuit Judge that the section is unconstitutional and void.

Judgment affirmed.

Martinez v. Vives's Succession, 32 La. Ann. 305.

Sommerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sues defendant to compel him to accept title to property located in the city of New Orleans, which defendant agreed to buy, and to which he refuses to accept the title tendered. Defendant appeals from an adverse judgment.

The property in controversy appears to have belonged to Victor Defoux at one time, who sold it to A. De Rosa May 4, 1837. It appears to have been assessed in the name of Defoux after the sale to De Rosa, and it was forfeited to the state under said assessments for the taxes of years 1871 to 1877, inclusive; and it was adjudicated to the state in 1885 for the taxes of 1882. The title of the state passed, in 1894, to plaintiff's author in title, and by mesne conveyances to the plaintiff in this suit, in 1904; and plaintiff and its authors have had possession of the property since 1894.

The defendant filed an answer, in which there are many defenses, alleging that the property had not been properly assessed in the name of De Rosa; that it was assessed in the name of Defoux, and illegally forfeited and sold to the state under those assessments; that De Rosa disappeared more than thirty years before the assessments were made, for which the property was forfeited and sold; that the presumption is and was that De Rosa died prior to 1871; that his succession was vacant, and the property thereof belonged to the state of Louisiana; that prescription does not run against the state, and if De Rosa were to return and demand the property, or, being dead, his heirs should demand the property from the state, that their rights would be prescribed by thirty years; that, if the court should declare the De Rosa succession not to be a vacant possession, then that the property had been abandoned, and had been, therefore, the property of the state prior to the time that the state acquired title by the forfeitures and sale to it; that if the property was in private ownership, at the time that the state took title for unpaid taxes, said forfeitures and tax sales are null, void, and of no effect, because the property was not assessed in the name of the real owner, and no notice of seizure was given to the owner of the property; and that plaintiff's title is therefore not good and valid, and that he is justified in refusing to accept the title tendered.

The defenses are numerous and contradictory; they destroy one another.

(1) The abandonment suggested by defendant would have to be in writing; and there is no allegation of the existence of any such document. The other allegations in the answer destroy the defense of abandonment. The abandonment referred to in article 3548, Civil Code, applies only to movables, and not to immovables. Hereford v. Police Jury, 4 La. Ann. 172.

(2) Defendant says: "Both plaintiff and defendant assume that A. De Rosa is dead, and this court must do likewise, for the reason that De Rosa purchased the property in 1837, when he must have been at least twenty-one years of age, and, if living to-day, would be ninety-eight years old. The death of a person one-hundred years old is always presumed."

The assumption of plaintiff and defendant that De Rosa is dead is not borne out by any evidence whatever. They assume that he was twenty-one years of age in 1837, when he bought the property in dispute, and that he would now be ninety-eight years old. But he would not be one hundred years old; and, in the language of counsel, "the death of a person one hundred years old is always presumed." But, until it is shown that an absentee is one hundred years old, his death will not be presumed; and, as one hundred years are not shown to have elapsed since De Rosa was born, the law does not presume him to be dead. "An absentee is presumed to live until the contrary is proved; otherwise the absence must be such that the life of a man, who may live one hundred years, should be presumed to have ended. 1 Ferriere, 13, Verbo Absens. . . . These principles are drawn from the Roman Law." Hayes v. Berwick, 2 Mart. (La.) 138, 5 Am. Dec. 727; Owens v. Mitchell, 5 Mart. N. S. 667; Babin v. Phillipon, 3 La. 374; Martinez v. Vives's Succession, 32 La. Ann. 305.

Defendant does not attempt to fix the date of the birth of De Rosa; yet he asks the court to assume the latter to be dead. He asks that we assume further that De Rosa did not part with title to the property after he acquired it; that he died intestate, and without heirs, leaving the property in dispute; that there was a succession, or that there is to be one in 1916; that said succession was, or is to be, irregular or vacant; or that the property was abandoned; further that the state became the owner when De Rosa died, or that it will become owner in 1916, when De Rosa may be presumed to be dead; and that De Rosa will not make a will before he dies, or before the time when he may be presumed to be dead.

These things we cannot do. The presumption is, in absence of any proof, that De Rosa is alive; and that he was the owner of the property at the date of the forfeitures and sale to the state of Louisiana for delinquent taxes on his property. He having been the owner at those dates, he, and one claiming through him, cannot be heard to attack the validity of the assessments or forfeitures or sale of his property for delinquent taxes.

If De Rosa or his heirs should reappear, they will be confronted with plaintiff's title, the forfeitures for taxes, and the adjudication of 1885, as muniments of title, and of plaintiff's actual possession of the property since 1894, supported by the prescription of ten years.

The prescription of three and ten years have rendered plaintiff's title immune from attack.

Defendant says that he relies upon the decision of this court in the case of Cordill v. Quaker Realty Co. 130 La. 933, 58 So. 819. But in that case a succession was under administration, whereas in this case there is no succession. Besides, the facts in that case, and the law applicable thereto, have no place whatever in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHN S. SUTTON, Appt.,

v.

DUNCAN BUIE et al.

(— La. —, 66 So. 956.)

Injunction — against waste of public money — right of taxpayer.

A citizen and taxpayer of a state has no standing as such to contest the expenditure of funds under an alleged unconstitutional statute.

(December 5, 1914.)

Note. — Right of citizen or taxpayer to enjoin waste or unlawful expenditure of state funds.

As to the right of taxpayer, in absence of statute, to enjoin the unlawful expenditure by municipalities, see the note to Pierce v. Hagans, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of East Baton Rouge, in defendants' favor in a suit to enjoin an investigating commission from doing its work at the expense of the state treasury. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walter Elder and Gilbert L. Dupre, for appellant:

The acts creating the commission are unconstitutional, and an injunction should issue to restrain further proceedings by its members and the payment of the money appropriated.

This note considers only the capacity to sue, and not the merits of the case.

There is a direct conflict in the decisions as to whether a citizen or taxpayer may or may not enjoin the waste or unlawful expenditure of state funds, but many of the cases do not directly discuss the question.

A few cases have been included in this note where the question of expenditure is not mentioned though necessarily involved and it should be borne in mind that the question of expenditure is perhaps of minor importance in cases, for instance, relating to the validity of elections or of the submission of constitutional amendments, etc.

Action by citizens or taxpayers sustained.

The action seems generally sustained in California, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee, and perhaps in Colorado and Kansas.

—California.

In Livermore v. Waite, 102 Cal. 113, 25 L.R.A. 312, 36 Pac. 424, an injunction was granted as prayed for by a taxpayer and a citizen of the state, restraining the secretary of state from submitting to the voters, and incurring expenses in connection with, a proposed amendment to the Constitution, on the ground that the same had not been legally adopted by the legislature, and that it was by its terms inefficient as an amendment to the Constitution, and would be inoperative if approved by the people. The court did not discuss the right of the plaintiff to bring the action, nor did it refer to the statute providing that "an injunction cannot be granted . . . to prevent the execution of a public statute by officers of the law, for the public benefit."

—Florida.

So. 963, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 916, the court refused a supersedeas to an injunction against the secretary of state, restraining him from publishing at public expense and certifying to the county commissioners for the vote of the people proposed amendments to the Constitution which were alleged not to have been lawfully adopted by the legislature, the suit being brought by the governor in his official capacity and also as a resident, taxpayer, citizen, and elector of the state. The court considered the case apparently as standing not only upon the status of the governor as such, but also upon his right as a citizen and taxpayer, and said: "A resident taxpayer has the right to enjoin the illegal creation of a debt which he, in common with other property holders and taxpayers, may otherwise be compelled to pay. . . . In this case the acts enjoined are ministerial in their nature; they involve no discretion; the interests and rights of all the people of the state are thereby vitally affected; the individual rights of the complainant as a citizen, a taxpayer, and an elector are also substantially affected in common with other taxpayers and electors by the indebtedness incurred and by the acts performed. There is no adequate remedy afforded by law. These considerations, in the light of reason and the authorities, clearly make the complainant, who sues as governor and also as a citizen, taxpayer, and elector, a proper party to these injunction proceedings."

—Hawaii.

In Lucas v. American-Hawaiian Engineering & Constr. Co. 16 Haw. 80, a citizen and taxpayer enjoined the superintendent of public works of the territory from signing or approving any vouchers for work done or materials furnished under a contract with the engineering company, and enjoined the auditor of the territory from issuing warrants for payments for work or labor done or materials furnished under said contract, and enjoined the engineering company from receiving any money under such contract, the contract being illegal on the ground

Board of Agriculture*, 111 N. C. 135, 15 S. E. 1032; Tate v. Salmon, 79 Ky. 540.

No one can question the constitutionality of a law unless he has an interest in the matter and shows some injury that will result to him by the enforcement thereof.

Reid v. Eatonton, 80 Ga. 755, 6 S. E. 602; Gibbs v. Green, 54 Miss. 592; Mason v. Rollins, 2 Biss. 99, Fed. Cas. No. 9,252; that the plans and specifications were too indefinite to be the basis for competitive bids. The court stated that the right of a taxpayer to bring suit to restrain a public officer from doing an illegal act had been settled in that jurisdiction since the case of Castle v. Kapena, 5 Haw. 27.

In Castle v. Kapena, supra, the court seemed to be of the opinion that at the suit of a citizen and taxpayer of the kingdom of Hawaii, an injunction might lie against the minister of finance preventing him from selling bonds at less than the statutory figure at which he was authorized to sell them; the court below had granted a mandamus, and the writ was discharged apparently on the ground that this was not the proper remedy. The defendant, however, denied that he intended to sell the bonds at less than the authorized rate.

—Illinois.

In Littler v. Jayne, 124 Ill. 123, 16 N. E. 374, it was held that a taxpayer suing for himself and for all other taxpayers of the state was entitled to an injunction restraining the state house commissioners from making, signing, or approving vouchers for any expense incurred under a certain contract for the making of statutes for the state house, and from using any portion of the money appropriated for the completion of the state house, for the purpose of procuring or placing such statutes in said building, on the ground that the contract was not publicly let in compliance with the statute, but let contrary to its provisions; and the fact that the vouchers required the approval of the governor did not prevent the relief.

In Burke v. Snively, 208 Ill. 328, 70 N. E. 327, the court sustained the right of a citizen and taxpayer to sue the commissioners of a certain canal, the auditor of public accounts of the state, and the treasurer of the state, to restrain the auditor from drawing his warrant in favor of the commissioners for certain sums of money appropriated by an act of the legislature for the maintenance and protection of the canal, and L.R.A.1915D.

for the necessary and extraordinary expenses thereof, and to enjoin the treasurer from paying any money out of the public funds of the state on any such warrant, should one be or have been drawn, on the ground that the legislature had no power to make any appropriations for the canal under the provisions of the state Constitution.

—Indiana.

In Ellingham v. Dye, 178 Ind. 336, 99 N. E. 1, the court sustained an action brought by a voter and taxpayer suing for himself as a citizen, elector, and taxpayer, to enjoin the secretary of state of the state of Indiana and certain other persons, the governor being one, constituting the board of election commissioners, from the performance of their ministerial duties in submitting to the people of the state a proposed new Constitution, on the ground that the legislature had no power thus to propose a new Constitution. The court stated that the fact that only a small proportionate part of the cost of the election would fall upon the appellee as a taxpayer was not of itself sufficient to destroy his competency to sue.

—Maryland.

In Christmas v. Warfield, 105 Md. 536, 66 Atl. 491, it was held that the plaintiff, who was a resident and taxpayer of the state, had such a special interest in the subject-matter as to entitle him to maintain a suit to restrain the unauthorized destruction of valuable state property, or the unwarranted expenditure of the funds of the state by the defendants, who, assuming to act as the state tobacco warehouse building commission under an act of the legislature pronounced unconstitutional by the court, proposed to tear down certain warehouses belonging to the state and build a new warehouse.

—Oregon.

There seems to be but a single case in Oregon where the payment of state funds.

Padelford v. Savannah, 14 Ga. 438; Hayes v. New Orleans, 34 La. Ann. 311; County Bd. of Edu. v. Kenan, 112 N. C. 566, 17 S. E. 485; State ex rel. Goodloe v. Lanier, 47 La. Ann. 568, 17 So. 130; Werges v. St. Louis, C. & N. O. R. Co. 35 La. Ann. 648; Fisher v. Steele, 39 La. Ann. 449, 1 So. 882; Jones v. Reed, 3 Wash. 57, 27 Pac. 1069.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By act No. 145, p. 259, and act No. 297, p. 607, of 1914, the legislature created a commission "to investigate the past and present conduct and management of the affairs of the government," and provided for the payment of the per diem of the members of this commission and of its other expenses.

The object of the present suit is to enjoin this commission from doing its said work, and to enjoin the state auditor and the state treasurer from paying the said per diem and other expenses out of the state treasury, on the ground that the said acts are unconstitutional.

Plaintiff brings the suit distinctly and solely in his quality of a citizen and taxpayer.

It is well settled that a citizen and taxpayer of a municipality has a standing as such to enjoin the making of an illegal disposition of the corporate funds. Bryant v. Logan, 56 W. Va. 141, 49 S. E. 21, 3 Ann. Cas. 1013.

has been enjoined at the suit of a citizen and taxpayer, but the courts have several times asserted the right of the citizen taxpayer to bring an action against officials, not distinguishing between municipal and state officials. Some of the cases are confusing, if not contradictory.

In Sears v. Steel, 55 Or. 544, 107 Pac. 3, the court sustained an action brought by a citizen and taxpayer against the secretary of state and the state treasurer to enjoin the issuance and payment of a warrant under an act in regard to highways claimed to be unconstitutional.

In Sherman v. Bellows, 24 Or. 553, 34 Pac. 549, an action brought by a citizen and taxpayer of the state against the trustees of the Oregon Soldiers' Home, the court said: "While there is an irreconcilable conflict in the decisions upon the right of a taxpayer in his own name to restrain by injunction a municipal corporation and its officers from illegally creating debts, or disposing of the corporate property or funds, we think the decided weight of authority supports the doctrine that he may invoke the aid of a court of equity to obtain such relief whenever it is made to appear that such illegal act of the corporation would increase his burden of taxation." And the court refused to restrain such trustees from purchasing land for a site and locating the Soldiers' Home at a certain place, on the ground that the plaintiff did not allege that, in consequence of the proposed location, his property would be subjected to any burden of taxation or that he would sustain any other special injury.

In State ex rel. Taylor v. Pennoyer, 28 Or. 205, 25 L.R.A. 862, 37 Pac. 906, an action brought in the name of the state by a citizen and taxpayer against the board of commissioners of public buildings, consisting of the governor and other officers, the court considered that the case was the same as if brought by an individual, and failed to distinguish between state and municipal officers (referring to the Carman Case, infra, which was against county officials in relation to county funds), and said: "It is the settled doctrine of this state that an individual taxpayer whose burdens would be increased by the wrongful acts of public officers, and where a fraudulent or illegal diversion or misapplication of the public funds is about to be consummated, has such an interest, by reason of the special and peculiar injury he would sustain, as would give him a standing in a court of equity by injunction to restrain such acts and prevent such diversion of the public funds. Carman v. Woodruff, 10 Or. 133. This doctrine is so well established and sustained by the undoubted weight of authority in the United States that it is unnecessary to enumerate the cases sustaining it. The taxpayer must, however, present such a case as will bring him within the ordinary equitable rules which govern when relief by injunction is sought. He must show that some act is threatened or imminent which will result in some material injury to himself, for which there is no adequate remedy at law." And the court declined to enjoin such board of commissioners from erecting a branch of the insane asylum at a place other than the capital, although the Constitution provided that "all public institutions should be located at the seat of government," it not appearing that there would be any additional cost from the erection of the building where it was proposed, over erecting it at the capital, or if so what the difference would be. Further proceedings in the same case came before the court in 28 Or. 498, 31 L.R.A. 473, 43 Pac. 471, wherein it was held that the relator had not shown that he would be damaged by reason of the location and construction of the building at the place proposed, the court also stating: "The judiciary acts, not upon its own motion, but only when some suitor duly authorized by law presents, in due form, a cause appropriate for its cognizance. Its machinery may be set in motion by private suitors, in some form or another, in all cases where civil or property rights are being invaded or intrenched upon to their injury or damage, be the suitor ever so humble, or the injury to be encountered ever so small; but in all cases of purely public concern, affecting the welfare of the whole

Whether this doctrine applies to state officers or to state funds in the state treasury has been considered but twice, so far as we have been able to ascertain. In the case of Jones v. Reed, 3 Wash. 63, 27 Pac. 1069, the supreme court of Washington held that the doctrine does not apply. Four of the justices concurred, and one dissented. In the case of Butler v. Ellerbe, 44 S. C. 283, 22 S. E. 437, the supreme court of South Carolina held that the doctrine does apply. Two of the justices concurred, and one dissented. Such a suit was entertained by the latter court in Evans v. Tillman, 38 S. C. 238, 17 S. E. 49; Robertson v. Tillman, 39 S. C. 298, 17 S. E. 678, but without the point here in question having been raised or considered.

Several courts have been unwilling to adopt this doctrine even in the case of a municipal corporation. As applied to a municipal corporation, it is founded in part upon the corporate relation supposed to exist, or in reality existing, between the inhabitants of the municipality and the municipality. The inhabitants are likened people or the state at large, the court's action can only be invoked by such executive officers of state as are by law intrusted with the discharge of such duties."

In Sears v. James, 47 Or. 50, 82 Pac. 14, a suit by a taxpayer to enjoin the superintendent of the state penitentiary from making certain expenditures, the court said: "For the purposes of this appeal the averments of the complaint must be taken as true, and the single question is whether plaintiff can maintain the suit. That a taxpayer may invoke the interposition of a court of equity to prevent the illegal disposition of public funds is no longer open to question in this state." But the injunction was denied on the ground that the defendant had no authority under the law to pay any bills, or handle or disburse any state funds, as his accounts must be presented to and audited by the secretary of state, who was not a party to the action, and the court must assume that he would discharge his duty.

In McKinney v. Watson, — Or. —, 145 Pac. 266, an action by a resident, citizen, and taxpayer to enjoin the secretary of state from auditing, and the state treasurer from paying, claims for salaries incurred by another defendant who was corporation commissioner, the act under which he was appointed being claimed to be unconstitutional, the court said: "It is well established by precedents in this state that a taxpayer whose enforced contribution to the public funds will be increased has a right to resist by litigation in his own name the enforcement of an unconstitutional statute, or the misapplication of public money." The court denied the injunction on the ground that the plaintiff did not show that his burden of taxation would be increased by the administration of the statute under consideration, as it did not appear that he contributed to the fees out of which the expenditures were to be made, or that his taxes would be otherwise increased.

—Pennsylvania.

In Mott v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 30 Pa. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 664, it was held that canal commissioners and taxpayers and loan creditors of the state had a right to enjoin the governor and other state officials from proceeding under a statute which enabled a certain corporation to make a contract by L.R.A.1915D.

which it would be exempted forever from taxation to the state.

—Tennessee.

In Bradley v. Powell County, 2 Humph. 427, 37 Am. Dec. 563, residents and citizens of a territory proposed to be included in a new county were allowed an injunction against the commissioners appointed by an act of the legislature to establish such new county, the grounds of the decision being that the new county did not contain the necessary area prescribed by the constitution, and that any person aggrieved might apply for the remedy. The court did not discuss the question of expense.

In Lynn v. Polk, 8 Lea, 121, it was held that resident citizens and taxpayers might enjoin a state board from carrying out the provisions of a refunding act which would increase the taxes, the court holding that the taxpayers properly brought the action, that they were not compelled to wait for the tax before attacking the act, and that the suit was not against the state, nor were the board acting by authority of the state.

—Colorado.

In Frost v. Thomas, 26 Colo. 222, 77 Am. St. Rep. 259, 56 Pac. 899, the court sustained a proceeding to restrain the defendant, in his capacity as governor of the state, from appointing officers for a recently created county, upon the ground that the act creating that county and providing for the appointment of its officers was unconstitutional. The status of the plaintiffs does not appear, but it seems that they alleged that injuries would result to them and others similarly situated if the act were carried into effect.

—Kansas.

In Martin v. Ingham, 38 Kan. 641, 17 Pac. 162, the court sustained on principle the right of a resident taxpayer and elector to enjoin the governor from the performance of certain acts in the organization of a new county, but denied the relief on the merits; the governor, however, while not waiving the authority of the court to inquire into the matter, did waive any objection as to the capacity of the plaintiff to bring suit.

This case was followed in the similar case to the shareholders of a private corporation, and the municipality is likened to their trustee. See Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 914 (731).

This foundation for the doctrine, needless to say, does not exist in the case of a suit involving state affairs. By no possibility can the state, in her relations with her citizens, be likened to a private corporation. Between the state and a private corporation there is in that connection no analogy whatever.

And, even apart from this, it is going very far already to allow mere private persons to invoke the aid of the judiciary to interfere with the management of public affairs, even in the case of a municipal corporation. Even that far the courts have gone only with hesitation, and some have refused to go. They ought not, we think, to extend the doctrine further, and apply it to the affairs of the state itself.

So far as plaintiff's interest as a mere citizen is concerned, apart from his interest as a taxpayer, nothing is better settled than that such a general interest as that, of Martin v. Lacy, 39 Kan. 703, 18 Pac. 951, where the plaintiff alleged, as a qualification to maintain the action, that he was a resident and legal elector; but the governor consented that the action might proceed in the name of the plaintiff, and waived objection to his capacity to prosecute the same.

The action not allowed.

The action is not allowed in New York, Louisiana, South Dakota, and Washington; the same has been held in a Federal court and in Porto Rico.

—New York.

In Thompson v. Canal Fund Comrs. 2 Abb. Pr. 248, the plaintiff sued to enjoin the commissioners from borrowing money, claiming that the act was unconstitutional and alleging that he was the owner of a considerable portion of a loan under an earlier statute, and also that he was a taxpayer. The court refused an injunction on ground that officers of the state ought not to be enjoined from carrying out the law of the legislature, even if it was unconstitutional, and stated that the plaintiff had attempted to sue in a double capacity, both in regard to an injury peculiar to himself and as a taxpayer. The court seems to think that these objections to such a course of proceeding must lead to a correction in the nature of his action if he intended to proceed.

In Schieffelin v. Komfort, 212 N. Y. 520, L.R.A. —, 106 N. E. 675, it was held that a citizen taxpayer could not bring an action against the officials of all the counties in the state, and against the secretary of state, to restrain them from taking steps preliminary to the nomination and election of delegates to a constitutional convention pursuant to an election for the purpose of determining whether such a convention should be held, which election was in accordance with an act of the legislature alleged to be void. The court said: "This court has not refrained, and will not refrain, from declaring a statute unconstitutional when it is asserted in a controversy where the question becomes a judicial one, but we repeat that the courts of this state have denied the right of a citizen and taxpayer to bring before the court for review the acts of another department of government, simply because he is one of many such citizens and taxpayers."

In Hutchison v. Skinner, 21 Misc. 720, 49 N. Y. Supp. 360, the court denied an injunction asked for against the superintendent of public instruction of the state, by a taxpayer, in relation to appointment of teachers in a certain locality and as to instructions to a local board of education as to proceeding with schools, etc., holding that the statute permitting taxpayers' actions should apply only to municipalities, and apparently taking the view that it was only the statutes that gave the taxpayer any right to bring an action.

The Hutchison Case was followed in Long v. Johnson, 70 Misc. 308, 127 N. Y. Supp. 756, where it was held that an individual taxpayer who has no special rights or grievances aside from the great mass of taxpayers cannot enjoin a state board or commission authorized by statute to select the site and build a prison (but the court did not seem to admit that the commission had done more than show favoritism or lack of economy or errors in judgment).

This case was followed in Whitbeck v. Hooker, 73 Misc. 573, 133 N. Y. Supp. 534, denying an injunction sought in a taxpayers' action against the state board of highway commissioners, to restrain them from entering into a contract covering the construction of a part of the state highway (but the court did not seem to think in this case that the injunction ought to have been granted on the merits).

—Louisiana.

SUTTON v. BUIE denies the right of a citizen and taxpayer to enjoin the payment of state funds.

—South Dakota.

In State ex rel. Cranmer v. Thorson, 9 S. D. 149, 33 L.R.A. 582, 68 N. W. 202, the court dismissed an action brought on the relation of an elector taxpayer to enjoin the secretary of state from certifying to the officials of the county a certain question as a constitutional amendment, on the ground that the legal steps necessary as a prerequisite therefor had not been carried out. The court gave as its reasons that any additional burden that might relate to the held by him in common with all the citizens of the state, does not afford him a basis for contesting the constitutionality of an act of the legislature. Cooley, Const. Lim. chap. 7, p. 196.

Having concluded that the plaintiff is without pecuniary interest, and therefore without standing, to maintain this suit, we do not reach, and therefore do not pass upon, the question of whether this is not a suit against the state, and therefore not maintainable even if plaintiff had a pecuniary interest in the premises.

relator as a taxpayer by reason of submitting the question to the people at a general election was too trifling, fanciful, and speculative for serious consideration; and that, having failed to show that he would be injured by the intended action of the defendant, he was not entitled to have the intended action of the defendant enjoined or its regularity investigated in this action; and also that the court had no jurisdiction to enjoin the making of an unconstitutional law, or the making of an unconstitutional amendment to the Constitution.

In Davenport v. Elrod, 20 S. D. 567, 107 N. W. 833, the court dismissed a writ of prohibition brought by a resident taxpayer against a state commission, holding that the statute under which they acted was constitutional, etc., but not it seems discussing the right of the plaintiff to bring the action.

—Washington.

In Jones v. Reed, 3 Wash. 57, 27 Pac. 1067, cited in SUTTON v. BUIE, it was held that the doctrine that a citizen and taxpayer might enjoin the officers of a municipality could not be extended to the state officers, as the state was sovereign.

In Birmingham v. Cheetham, 19 Wash. 657, 54 Pac. 37, the court declined to enjoin the state grain inspector and the state treasurer in regard to certifying and paying out inspection fees, on the ground that the plaintiff, a citizen and taxpayer, had not shown that he would be pecuniarily and directly injured by the acts complained of.

In Tacoma v. Bridges, 25 Wash. 221, 65 Pac. 186. it was held that a city, and a citizen taxpayer therein, could not enjoin the state commissioner of public lands from leasing them to parties who, it was alleged, were about to commit nuisances thereon which would operate injuriously to the health of the complainant individual and city, as the threatened injury was too remote. The court does not notice in its opinion a further allegation of the complaint, that the defendant threatened to file a plat of certain land of the state, dividing the same into blocks, streets, etc., apparently intending to dedicate the streets to the public without any right or authority, the land in question being the property of L.R.A.1915D.

It is therefore, ordered adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

O'Niell, J., concurs in the decree.

Monroe, Ch. J., concurring:

I am of opinion that, upon the case presented, the courts are vested with no authority to interfere in the manner proposed by the plaintiff, with another independent department of the state government in the discharge of its functions, and I therefore concur in the conclusion herein reached.

the state and belonging to the common school fund of the state.

In Bilger v. State, 63 Wash. 457, 116 Pac. 19, it was held that "courts of equity will not inquire into the action of state officers accused of misappropriating public funds on the complaint of a citizen and taxpayer, as the attorney general of the state is the proper person to institute suits where there has been a wrongful disposition of the public revenue."

—Federal cases.

This note does not consider the general question of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to enjoin state officers.

In Morgan v. Graham, 1 Woods, 124, Fed. Cas. No. 9,801, it was held that a citizen of New York who was a taxpayer of Louisiana could not restrain the governor of Louisiana and other state officers from executing and issuing certain state bonds which the legislature had by special act authorized and required them to issue,—on the ground that the state Constitution limited the debts of the state to an amount which had already been exceeded; that the bonds were donations to a railroad company, and that the legislature had no power to make such donations. The court stated that it was a general rule that a man could not maintain a private suit for an injury which he sustained in common with every other.

In Navarro v. Post, 5 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 61, the court, while holding that the acts intended were lawful, held also that "no private citizen or taxpayer,—and that is all that these two complainants are, because their allegation that they are members of the house of delegates adds nothing to their right to sue in this court,—has any right to sue or enjoin the state (insular) officials, or to in any manner impede or hamper them, in the exercise of their official functions."

Unsettled or doubtful jurisdictions.

The cases seem inconclusive or doubtful in a number of jurisdictions; in Wisconsin there is a local peculiarity not free from obscurity.

—Georgia.

In Peebles v. Byrd, 98 Ga. 688, 25 S. E. 677, where the plaintiff claimed a special interest, the court held he had not such special interest, and that, as a citizen and taxpayer, he could not enjoin the state reporter from carrying out a contract made by the reporter and the governor, because (1) the state would be a necessary defendant and it could not be sued, and (2) while the governor was not a nominal party, the injunction would suspend a contract which he officially participated in making in his discretion, and (3) that, further, the plaintiff had not shown that the act complained of would increase taxes, or make his taxes any higher.

In Smith v. Magourich, 44 Ga. 163, where the court affirmed the right of citizens to enjoin commissioners appointed by the legislature from locating the county seat of a new county at a place alleged not to be not validly selected, the commissioners were probably not considered as more than county officials.

—Michigan.

While the court did not seem to go into the question of the funds that would be necessary to carry out the provisions of the statutes declared to be invalid, reference may be made in this connection to Giddings v. Blacker, 93 Mich. 1, 16 L.R.A. 402, 52 N. W. 944, where it was held that a citizen and elector had a right to apply for a mandamus against the secretary of state to prevent him from giving notice of the election of senators under one apportionment act, and to compel him to give it instead under an earlier act, on the ground that the later act was unconstitutional. The court held, however, that both acts were invalid, and directed that the secretary must issue his notice under a still earlier act, unless a new apportionment should be made by the legislature before the time expired for giving the notice. It was insisted by the attorney general that the relator had no standing in court because, prior to filing his petition, he made no application to the prosecuting attorney of his county, the attorney general, or other public officer, to apply to the court for a mandamus touching the matter here in issue. This was overruled by the court on the ground that the attorney general himself appeared to be adverse to the position taken by the relator.

—Minnesota.

In Rippe v. Becker, 56 Minn. 100, 22 L.R.A. 857, 57 N. W. 331, the court sustained the right of a citizen, freeholder, and taxpayer to restrain the board of railway and warehouse commissioners from building a state elevator pursuant to a statute declared to be unconstitutional.

But in Secombe v. Kittelson, 29 Minn. 555, 12 N. W. 519, where the status of the plaintiff does not appear, the court, in denying on the merits a suit to restrain the state treasurer from paying out of the funds of the state the interest about to become due upon state bonds alleged to be illegal, said: "There was another ground L.R.A.1915D.

upon which we might have summarily disposed of it. It is the settled law of this state, if anything can be settled by repeated adjudications, that an executive officer of the state is not subject to the control or interference of the judiciary in the performance of duties belonging to him as an executive officer and that no act done, or threatened to be done, by him in his official capacity, can be brought under judicial control or interference by mandamus or injunction; that this is the rule, even when the act is purely ministerial."

—North Carolina.

The question was not litigated in Galloway v. Jenkins, 63 N. C. 147, where an injunction was granted restraining the state treasurer from subscribing for stock of a railroad, and delivering the bonds of the state to the railroad, on the ground that the statute under which he proposed to act was unconstitutional. It was admitted that, for the purposes of the action, the plaintiff, as a taxpayer and property owner, had a right to bring it, all parties wishing to have the constitutional question settled.

—Oklahoma.

In Coyle v. Smith, 28 Okla. 121, 113 Pac. 944, affirmed in 221 U. S. 559, 55 L. ed. 853, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 688, a resident of Guthrie, and a citizen and taxpayer of the state, was denied an injunction to prevent the removal of the capital from Guthrie, where he claimed to have large property interests, to Oklahoma city. The decision was on the ground that the removal was valid, and the court did not discuss the right of the plaintiff to bring the action.

—South Carolina.

It may be said in limine that, as will be seen below, the court in SUTTON v. BUIE goes too far in stating that in Butler v. Ellerbe, infra, the South Carolina court held that the doctrine of the right of the taxpayer to enjoin the illegal disposition of municipal funds "does apply" to state funds, for the question was waived in the Butler Case, although the chief justice, in his dissenting opinion, thought the plaintiff had a right to bring the action.

It will be seen that in the early case of Auditor v. Treasurer, infra, the court apparently recognizes the right of the citizen to bring the action, but the later cases do not seem to sustain it, and the Duncan Case, infra, apparently denies the right.

In Auditor v. Treasurer, 4 S. C. 311, where an action was sustained brought in the name of the state by the state auditor, relator, against the state treasurer and county treasurers, to enjoin the state treasurer from issuing and putting in circulation illegal scrip, and to enjoin him and the other defendants from receiving such scrip for taxes past due or to become due, and from paying out such scrip, it was claimed "that no right of action subsists in the plaintiff to pray the injunction sought for." The court said inter alia: "There is another view which may be taken of the objection thus urged. . . A public officer having the charge or care of the property or money of the state, as to its proper preservation and disposition, occupies, in regard to it, the relation of a trustee. He must hold it alone in strict devotion to the purposes of the agency which his office confers. The state, as a cestui que trust, may enforce the trust and save the subject of it from conversion to an object not within its scope. A private citizen and taxpayer has such an equity as will authorize him, on behalf of himself and all others who will be prejudiced by the proposed wrongful act of the officer, in respect either to the money or the property, to resort to judicial proceedings for its prevention. Even if the plaintiff, in his official capacity as auditor, could not sustain his complaint against the state treasurer and the county treasurers to the extent of the entire relief which he seeks under it, the court may still entertain his application, looking to his rights as a member of the community in the trust of which the principal defendants are trustees, holding the money of the state on conditions and for purposes subject only to the constitutional contract of the legislature. His absolute and personal rights in the premises cannot be lost, because he asks for their protection in an official, in place of an individual, relation."

In Evans v. Tillman, 38 S. C. 238, 17 S. E. 49, referred to in SUTTON v. BUIE, an injunction against the governor and state treasurer by a taxpayer was denied on the ground that the officers were not acting beyond their powers as laid down by the statute in question.

Robertson v. Tillman, 39 S. C. 298, 17 S. E. 678, also referred to in SUTTON v. BUIE, was an application by a citizen, bondholder, and taxpayer to restrain the issuance of state bonds under the contract adjudged valid in Evans v. Tillman, upon the ground that the act purporting to authorize such issue was unconstitutional and void, and the injunction was denied on the ground that the act was constitutional.

In McCullough v. Brown, 41 S. C. 220, 23 L.R.A. 410, 19 S. E. 458, the county board of control under the dispensary act were restrained from opening a dispensary, at the suit of taxpayers, residents, and freehold voters. The court stated that, without considering at any length the question of mere procedure, it seemed to it that the remedy by injunction was appropriate, and that the real object of the action was to prevent certain persons from engaging in a business involving the use of public funds derived from taxation, under an act of the legislature claimed to be unconstitutional. The authorities to which the court refers briefly on this question seem to be those relating to municipalities. The opinion was delivered by the chief justice, who, in his dissenting opinion in Butler v. Ellerbe, 44 S. C. 256, 22 S. E. 425, while stating that L.R.A.1915D.

the case of McCullough v. Brown had been overruled in so far as it held the dispensary law unconstitutional by the subsequent case of State ex rel. George v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 26 L.R.A. 345, 20 S. E. 221, stated also that that case did not affect the question of the right to sue; and in the Butler Case he refers to various authorities which seem, however, to relate simply to a right to proceed against the officers of municipalities or against a municipality.

In Butler v. Ellerbe, supra, cited in SUTTON v. BUIE, where the court denied an application by a citizen and taxpayer to restrain state officers from paying supervisors of registration and other officials for services in what was claimed to be an unconstitutional election, it appears that the decision was made waiving the question as to the right of the petitioner to equitable relief, although the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice McIver holds that the plaintiff had a right to bring the action.

In Duncan v. State Bd. of Edu. 74 S. C. 560, 54 S. E. 760, affirmed sub nom. Duncan v. Heyward, 78 S. C. 227, 58 S. E. 1095, where the court denied an injunction to prevent the state board of education from carrying out a contract which the court held to be not beyond their power, and the action was brought by a taxpayer and patron of the public school, the court said: "The injury which the petitioners allege they would suffer does not differ in kind from that which would be suffered by the people at large patronizing the public schools, and if there had been any cause of action, the suit should have been instituted by or on behalf of the state. Manson v. South Bound R. Co. 64 S. C. 120, 41 S. E. 834. That aside from that, the personal interest of the petitioners is exceedingly small, it being impossible that it could amount to more than five or six dollars each year." (The Manson Case, supra, related to a municipality.

—West Virginia.

In Slack v. Jacob, 8 W. Va. 612, where the statute attacked was held to be constitutional, it seems to have been held that a court of first instance could not enjoin the governor, at all events until the statute had been found to be unconstitutional.

—Wisconsin.

In Wisconsin the matter depends to some extent upon the constitutional provision that the supreme court "shall have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, and other original and remedial writs, and to hear and determine the same."

In State ex rel. Bolens v. Frear, 148 Wis. 456, L.R.A. 1915B, 569, 134 N. W. 673, 135 N. W. 164, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1147, the court, while dismissing the complaint, holding the income tax laws which were attacked to be valid, and refusing an injunction to restrain state officers from carrying out the statute, considered at great length the question of the right, under the Wisconsin Constitution, of taxpayers to bring actions, and seemed to hold that in some cases a taxpayer may, if the attorney general refuses, bring an action in the name of the state on his own relation originally in the supreme court under the above section of the Constitution, and that in that case the action is the same as if it were brought by the attorney general, and as if the state were the real plaintiff, and that the court would have authority in that case to prevent a misapplication of funds by a state officer, but seemed to consider that it would be only in cases of great exigency, that the court would grant such an injunction, stating that it did not find it necessary to decide whether the alleged illegal expenditure of funds alone presented a case of such exigency as to justify the use of the original jurisdiction of the court to prevent such an expenditure; this being apparently on the ground that there were other features in the statute which, if invalid, might have authorized the court to act. The theory was that actions of this kind brought by a taxpayer were not in any sense taxpayers' actions in the usual sense, and that taxpayers' actions in the usual sense, as brought in an inferior court, could not lie against the state officer, as, if it were necessary for any action to be brought against him, the supreme court had power to authorize an original action to be brought in that court upon the relation of a citizen if the attorney general would not act.

In State ex rel. Lamb v. Cunningham, 83 Wis. 90, 17 L.R.A. 145, 35 Am. St. Rep. 27, 53 N. W. 35, the supreme court sustained the right of a private citizen and taxpayer, after his application to the attorney general to proceed had been refused, to bring an action in the supreme court on his own relation in the name of the state, to restrain the secretary of state from putting into effect an apportionment act which the court held to be unconstitutional.

In State ex rel. Rosenheim v. Frear, 138 Wis. 173, 119 N. W. 894, where a taxpayer brought a petition to commence an action in the supreme court of Wisconsin for the purpose of preventing payment of expenses out of the state treasury, incurred or which might be incurred, by a joint committee of the legislature under a resolution clothing such committee with authority to investigate a certain matter, the court, in denying the application on the merits, said: "If the secretary of state and state treasurer were about to take such action as to disburse state moneys for illegitimate purposes, it would be within the competency of this court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, to entertain an equitable action to prevent it on the initiative of a taxpayer; the attorney general refusing, on proper request, to act in the matter."

In State ex rel. Van Alstine v. Frear, 142 Wis. 320, 125 N. W. 961, 20 Ann. Cas. 633, the court dismissed an action by a taxpayer brought in the circuit court after refusal to act by the attorney general to enjoin the secretary of state from enforcing the primary election law, and from auditing claims for expenses under it. This case is referred to in the Bolens Case as not discussing the question of jurisdiction.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

BELONIE BOUCHARD

v.

DIRIGO MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— Me. —, 92 Atl. 899.)

Insurance — gasoline — keeping or using.

1. The use by a farmer of a gasoline engine in his barn as part of an outfit for threshing his grain is not within the operation of a provision in a policy of insurance on the property making it void if burning fluids are kept or used by the insured on the premises.

Same — increase of risk — temporary use.

2. The mere temporary use in an insured barn of a gasoline engine to thresh grain is not within a provision in the policy making it void if the situation or circumstances affecting the risk shall be so altered as to cause an increase of the risk.

Same — barn — time of threshing.

3. A policy of insurance on a farm barn will be held, in the absence of express language to the contrary, to cover it during the ordinary uses to which it is put, such as the annual threshing of the grain gathered into it in the customary way.

Trial — question for jury — waiver of proof of loss.

4. Whether or not an insurer waived proof of loss by denying liability on the policy is a question for the jury.

(February 3, 1915.)

Note. — Fire insurance: use of engine on farm premises as violation of general provision in fire policy against increase of risk or specific provisions relating to engines.

This note does not cover the question of what constitutes a waiver of provisions alleged to have been violated by the use of engines; nor the question as to the effect of a temporary use of an engine which had ceased before the loss in question.

Generally as to the effect of a temporary condition which ceased before loss, under general provision against increase of risk, or specific provision against certain conditions, see notes to Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 736; Port Blakely Mill Co. v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 593; Clute v. Clintonville Mut. F. Ins. Co. 32

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a nonsuit granted by the Supreme Judicial Court for Somerset County of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Fred F. Lawrence, for plaintiff:

The use of the gasoline engine by the plaintiff for the purpose of threshing his grain was not a violation of either of the two clauses in the policy, relied on by defendant, as to the use of prohibited articles and increase of risk.

Provisions as to increase of risk, or change of risk of exposure.

The use of an engine on premises insured as farm property will not constitute an increase of risk if the particular use is one which the parties must have contemplated in view of the nature and ordinary use of the insured property.

Thus, in Siemers v. Meeme Mut. Home Protection Ins. Co. 143 Wis. 114, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1083, 126 N. W. 669, where farm buildings were burned while a threshing engine was being used for driving a feed cutter, it was held that it was fairly within the contemplation of the parties that cutting fodder might be carried on, and that a steam engine might be employed in doing such work unless its use was specifically forbidden, and that there was no error in refusing to submit to the jury the question whether the risk had been increased by the use of the steam engine, within a provision that if the risk should be increased by any means whatever, or be occupied in any way whatsoever so as to render the risk more hazardous, the policy should be void. The court said: "Fire hazard is a variable quantity. It changes constantly from day to day, and sometimes imperceptibly, from the operation of the laws of nature and from various circumstances beyond the control of the insured. Such influences must, in general, unless unusual or extraordinary, be considered as a necessary part or incident of the risk which the insurer has undertaken to bear. It is not to be supposed that the insured has guaranteed that no improvements or changes shall be made anywhere in the vicinity of the insured property during the life of the insurance, but it is reasonable to exact an obligation from him that he shall not allow or permit a change to be made in the structure, nature, or habitual use of the insured property materially different from that which the insurer has agreed to undertake. L.R.A.1915D.

. . . But trivial or temporary variations in the risk incident to the ordinary use of the insured property are presupposed by the contracting parties to be likely to occur. . . . Insurance must be presumed to be made with reference to the character of the property insured and to the owner's use of it in the ordinary way, and for the purpose for which such property is ordinarily held and used, or to cover risks incident to such use. . . . It is a matter of common knowledge that cutting fodder by hand, horse, steam, or gas-engine power is a very customary operation on farms. We think that when the contract was made it was fairly within the contemplation of the parties that such work might be carried on, and that a steam engine might be employed in doing such work unless its use was specifically forbidden by the policy, and that the court committed no error in refusing to submit a question to the jury asking whether the risk had been increased by its use. The clause in question has reference to some permanent change in the character or condition of the insured property, and not to a temporary change in the risk, which was a mere incident to the ordinary use of the property."

So, in German Ins. Co. v. Hart, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 344, a provision in a policy on a barn and its contents that if the hazard should be increased in any way whatever, except with the insurer's consent, it should be void, was held not violated by the placing and using of a steam thresher in close proximity to the barn. This use was held to be such a temporary use of the property in the course of the insured's business as must, from the nature and surroundings at the time the application was accepted and the policy issued, have been anticipated and intended by the contracting parties; and the fact that it caused the fire was held not to bring it within the prohibited clause.

In Johnston v. Dominion Grange Mut. F. Ins. Co. 23 Ont. App. Rep. 729, a condition providing for a forfeiture in case of any change material to the risk without notice to the insurer was held to refer to some structural change in the premises

Mr. S. W. Gould for defendant.

Cornish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action on a fire insurance policy for loss of plaintiff's farm buildings and personal property. The presiding justice ordered a nonsuit. The main issue is whether the fact that the fire was caused by the operation of a gasoline engine by the plaintiff for threshing grain, in the barn floor, avoided the policy either because it violated the or alteration in the work or business carried on, and not to a mere temporary and casual act, and it was held not to be violated by the use for but one day of a steam engine in connection with a grain crusher.

A like view was taken in Adair v. Southern Mut. Ins. Co. 107 Ga. 297, 45 L.R.A. 204, 73 Am. St. Rep. 122, 33 S. E. 78, where a provision declaring that the policy should be forfeited "by any change in the use or condition of the building, including additions or repairs, or by the erection of other buildings, or in any other manner by which the degree of the risk is increased, unless due notice is given to the company and a new agreement is entered into," was held to apply to such changes as were of a permanent nature, and not to mere temporary changes in the use and occupation of the premises; and it was accordingly held that a mere temporary use of a machine for threshing grain for a few hours on the premises would not per se work either a forfeiture or suspension of the policy. But see infra as to this case.

In Davis v. Western Home Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 496, 10 L.R.A. 359, 25 Am. St. Rep. 509, 46 N. W. 1073, however, a policy insuring corn in cribs, which provided that it should be void in case of any change in the exposure by the erection or occupation of adjoining buildings, or by any means whatever in the control or knowledge of the insured, was held to be avoided by the use with the insured's permission of an engine and boiler near the corncribs for the purpose of furnishing power to a corn sheller, the court taking the view that the general provision forbidding exposure by any means whatever did not have regard to the form, substance, use, or character of the thing creating the exposure, but included anything in which fire was used so as to be dangerous, although it was not of a permanent character the same as buildings.

And in Orient Ins. Co. v. McKnight, 96 Ill. App. 525, where it was contended that the hazard had been increased by the use of a steam sheller in violation of the terms of a policy covering corn in cribs which stood some distance from each other, it L.R.A.1915D.

appeared that the engines use corncobs for fuel, and that the parties were fearful of fire, and for the first week kept a watchman at night, and that several times during a period of two weeks fires had caught. The court said that if by increase of hazard was meant increasing liability to take fire and to be destroyed by fire, they could not doubt that the record showed that the hazard was increased. The condition as to increased risk, however, was held to have been waived in this case, and the decision upon the latter point was affirmed in 197 Ill. 190, 64 N. E. 339.

In Adair v. Southern Mut. Ins. Co. supra, construing a provision of the Code that the assured is bound to ordinary diligence in protecting the property from fire, and that gross negligence on his part will relieve the insurer, but that simple negligence by a servant or the assured will not relieve the insurer, with reference to another provision, that any change in the property or use to which it is applied whereby the risk is increased shall avoid the policy, it was held that the insurer is not liable if a loss directly results from a temporary change in the use of the property by the assured, or one to whom he had intrusted the entire custody of the property and given full freedom in its use, where such change so materially increases the hazard as to make it apparent to a person of ordinary intelligence and of reasonable or ordinary care and diligence that the danger from fire was thereby enhanced.

And it was held in that case that there was sufficient testimony to require the submission to the jury of the issue whether or not there had been such negligent use of the property as to materially increase the risk of insurance and cause the damage complained of, where there was evidence that a threshing engine which had no spark arrester was placed about 85 feet from the house which burned for the purpose of threshing wheat; that the separator was placed about half way between the engine and the house; that as the threshing progressed straw gathered near the separator and some within a few feet of the dwelling; that the threshing required about two "prohibited articles" clause or the clause against increase of risk.

1. Prohibited Articles.—The standard policy contains this provision, among others:

"This policy shall be void . . . if camphene, benzin, naptha, or other chemical oils or burning fluids shall be kept or used by the insured, on the premises insured"—with certain exceptions not material here. It is conceded that gasoline is within the prohibited list, and the crucial question is whether, under the facts of this case, it was "kept or used" within the inhibition of the contract. The record shows that the plaintiff had lived on this farm in Skowhegan since the spring of 1908, and had been insured by the defendant during that time, the policy in suit being a renewal of a former policy in the same company: that each year he had employed men to thresh his grain by the use of a gasoline engine in precisely the same manner as on the day of the fire; that these men traveled from farm to farm doing the work, and that practically all of the grain in that community is threshed in the same manner, the engine being placed within or without the barn according to the location of the grain; that in 1912 the plaintiff, with one Herbert, had purchased the engine and had hours, and when it was commenced there was a gentle breeze blowing from the house; that when the work was about half over there was an unexpected, sudden, and unusually violent gust of wind which blew from the engine towards the house; that at about the same time fire was noticed in the straw; that despite all efforts the straw was carried against the house, setting it afire; that a threshing machine of this same character had been used by the owner of the one in question for ten or fifteen years, and no fire had before resulted from its use.

In Siemers v. Meeme Mut. Home Protection Ins. Co. 143 Wis. 114, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1083, 126 N. W. 669, the jury found that the risk was not increased within the meaning of a clause providing for forfeiture if the risk was increased by any means, because the threshing engine which was being used to run a feed cutter was operated for five or six minutes without the spark arrester; and the court held that they would not be warranted in setting the finding aside, there being little evidence on either side bearing on the question, and none to show that the removal of the spark arrester was the proximate cause of the fire.

In Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Moyer, 97 Pa. 441, where an insured barn was burned by reason of the explosion of a boiler used with a threshing engine which was placed near the barn, it was held that the question whether the use of the machine in the vicinity of the barn constituted an increase of risk was properly left to the jury.

And in Long v. Beeber, 106 Pa. 466, 51 Am. Rep. 532, where the insured farm buildings were burned by reason of the use of a steam engine for threshing purposes, and the policy provided that it should be void if the premises should be occupied or used so as to increase the risk, or the risk should be increased by the erection or occupation of adjoining buildings or by any means whatever, it was held that the question whether the risk was increased by the temporary use of the steam thresher was properly submitted to the jury.

tenant provided that the insurer should not be liable for any loss "happening in consequence of an invasion . . . or from any locomotive engine or engines," and further provided that the policy should be avoided in case of any material increase of risk to the property insured, or in case of material alterations. The property was burned by reason of sparks from a steam thresher, and the insurer claimed that the use of such machine constituted a material increase of risk and avoided the policy because of a change of circumstances resulting in change of risk. The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts in which it was stated that the fire was communicated to the buildings "by sparks from a steam threshing machine used on the premises by a tenant for the purpose of threshing." The statement of facts, however, contained no statement that the assured himself used the engine either in or near to the insured buildings, nor was it stated that his tenant introduced the engine into the barn or corn house or under the sheds and used it for the purpose of threshing.

It was conceded that the exception as to locomotive engines did not include a threshing engine, and it was held that there was no condition of the policy and no principle of insurance law under which the insurer could be relieved from liability for the loss. The court said that, in deciding the case upon the facts, they did not wish to be understood as intimating that a different result would follow if the statement of facts showed that the tenant had actually introduced the engine into the building and used it there, but stated that they expressed no opinion on that question.

Specific provisions with reference to engines.

It has been held that a provision in a policy covering farm buildings, permitting the insured to use a steam thresher with an efficient spark arrester in good working order for the purpose of threshing crops, does not forbid the use of a steam engine in connection with a grain crusher, but that such provision is directed entirely to the use of a steam thresher and engine therewith. Johnston v. Dominion Grange Mut. F. Ins. Co. 23 Ont. App. Rep. 729.

set it up in his barn for the purpose of threshing his grain, and in about an hour after the operation began the fire occurred, in precisely what manner or from what immediate cause it does not appear. Under these circumstances, did the plaintiff "keep or use" gasoline, within the meaning of the policy? We think not.

In the first place, the words themselves usually import something more than temporary possession or possession for a temporary purpose. "To keep" implies something more than merely to have. It carries with it the idea of continuance and duration. Such is its common acceptance, as "to keep a secret," "to keep the peace," "to keep a promise," "to keep a certain line of goods," "to keep store," or to "keep house." Such is its definition by lexicographers. "To keep" is "to have and retain in one's control or possession" (Standard Dict.); "to continue to hold;" "to conduct or carry on;" "to have habitually in stock for sale" (Webster's New Int. Dict.).

The verb "to use" in this connection, and in collocation with "keep," naturally suggests the same idea of employment on more than a single occasion. It implies the customary or habitual rather than the accidental or the temporary. These definitions have the

And in Siemers v. Meeme Mut. Home Protection Ins. Co. supra, where a fire apparently resulted from the use of a steam engine generally used for threshing, to drive a feed cutter, it was held that a provision that the insurer should not be liable for loss caused by the use of steam-threshing machines unless a ladder was kept between the engine and the separator, and one barrel of water and two pails were kept between the engine and the barn, and a watchman was always in attendance, did not prohibit the use of threshing-machine engines for other purposes than threshing, but forbade their use in the ordinary operations carried on around farm buildings unless the required precautions were taken.

In Schaeffer v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 80 Md. 563, 45 Am. St. Rep. 361, 31 Atl. 317, where a policy insured a dwelling, farm buildings, and a tannery, it was held that an engine regularly employed in grinding bark for use in the tannery was not a "steam engine temporarily employed for the purpose of threshing out crops of any kind," within the meaning of a provision prohibiting such use, the court remarking that this provision was intended to prohibit the use of engines for the purpose of threshing in the vicinity of barns, and that as it imposed a penalty it should be strictly construed.

It has been held that where a policy insuring farm buildings provides for a forfeiture in case a "steam farm engine" is used within 100 feet of any insured building, and there is no kind or class of engines known as "steam farm engines," the words must be understood in their ordinary sense as descriptive of any engine adapted to farm purposes. Wilson v. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 75 Vt. 320, 55 Atl. 662.

And in this case it was held error to submit the case to the jury where the undisputed evidence showed that an engine which was being used within the prohibited distance of buildings to cut ensilage was an upright portable engine of four and one-half horse power originally purchased to draw logs and for use about a mill, but which had alternately been used for these purposes and for cutting ensilage and filling silos, and there was testimony that it was adapted to all farm purposes where only a small amount of power was required, and L.R.A.1915D.

there was no evidence that any other kind of engine was better adapted to general farm purposes than this one.

And on a subsequent appeal of this case 77 Vt. 28, 58 Atl. 799, it was held that the mere designation of some particular make of engine as a "farm engine" did not entitle it to recognition as a farm engine to the exclusion of other engines of the same style. The court said that the statement in the prior opinion, that where there is no kind of engine known as a "steam farm engine," the term must be understood to cover any engine adapted to farm purposes, did not imply that if the existence of such an engine were established the opposite conclusion would necessarily follow, but if it were shown that there was an engine so designated then would come the further inquiries as to whether the differences in construction and use between the kind so designated and other portable engines were so marked, and whether the application of the name to that particular kind was so general and exclusive, that the parties might reasonably be supposed to have used and understood the term as having reference only to that kind.

And it was held upon this appeal that this policy was avoided by the use of a portable engine adapted to all farm purposes, although there was another engine known as a steam farm engine which was capable of being used for farm purposes; it appearing that both were constructed alike so far as touched the danger from fire, and that both were frequently designated as portable engines, and that the main difference between them was in respect to their mobility. Ibid.

In Thurston v. Burnett & B. D. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 98 Wis. 476, 41 L.R.A. 316, 74 N. W. 131, it was held that the proper construction of a provision that the insurer would not hold itself liable "for loss caused by the use of steam engines on the premises, except steam threshing engines using coal as fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire," was a question for the court, and it was held error to leave its construction to the jury; the court holding that it came within the rule that where the language of a contract is plain and unambiguous, and where words or terms sanction of authority. In Thompson v. Equity F. Ins. Co. [1910] A. C. 592, 3 B. R. C. 1, 19 Ann. Cas. 412, a building was insured, and the words were "keep or store," instead of "keep or use," as here; and the court held that a small quantity of gasoline in a stove being used for cooking purposes, which caused the fire, no other gasoline being in the building, was not an infringement of the condition. The court say: "What is the meaning of the words, 'stored or kept,' in collocation and in the connection in which they are found? They are common English words with no very precise or exact signification. They have a somewhat kindred meaning and cover very much the same ground. The expression as used in the statutory condition seems to point to the presence of a quantity not inconsiderable, or at any rate not trifling in amount, and to import a notion of warehousing or depositing for safe custody or keeping in stock for trading purposes. It is difficult, if not impossible, to give an accurate definition of the meaning; but if one takes a concrete case it is not very difficult to say whether a particular thing is 'stored or kept,' within the meaning of the condition. No one probably would say that a person who had a reasonable quantity of tea in his house for domestic use was 'storing or keeping' tea there; or (to take the instance of benzine, which is one of the proscribed articles) no one would say that a person who had a small bottle of benzine for removing grease spots or cleansing purposes of that sort was 'storing or keeping' benzine. The learned counsel for the respondents contend that the presence of gasoline on the premises was enough to bring the statutory condition into operation, and he referred to the accident which did happen as an example of the danger against which precautions are required. But it is obvious that the danger guarded against is not ignition caused by the article itself, but the risk of spreading or increasing the conflagration when once started and in progress by the presence of highly inflammable or explosive material. The fact that the fire in the present case was caused by the gasoline is irrelevant. And the fatal objection to the defendant's contention is that it gives no effect whatever to the words, 'stored or kept,' . . . and the meaning which the defendants seek to attribute to it might possibly or even probably prevail if the words in question had been omitted altogether, and the condition had excluded liability for 'loss or damage occurring while . . . gasoline . . . is . . . in the building insured.' Some meaning must be given to the words, 'stored or kept.'"

While the words in the case at bar are "kept or used," instead of "kept or stored," as in the English case, and therefore the idea of storage is embraced in the one instead of use in the other, yet both have the word "keep," and, so far as the reasoning in the cited case refers to that word, it carries weight in our present discussion. "The word 'kept,' as used in the policy [of the may be reasonably construed in either of two ways, but extrinsic evidence is not resorted to for the purpose of aiding in the construction, the proper construction of the contract is for the court.

It was held in that case that the clause involved in that case prohibited the use of wood except to efficiently start combustion in the coal, and that the use of wood thereafter was within the excepted risk, and that when wood was so used up to a short time before the fire occurred, such fire was not caused by an engine "using coal for fuel with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire" merely because coal was the last fuel put into the fire box before the fire occurred.

The evidence in this case being to the effect that the engine was started and run for half an hour with wood for fuel exclusively, when a man was sent for coal, and he brought one lump, part of which was used about fifteen minutes before the fire occurred, and the engineer testified that he sent for coal because he thought it would be a helper, it was held that there was really no question for the jury, and that their finding that no more wood was used with the coal than was sufficient to kindle the fire was contrary to the undisputed evidence.

policy on farm buildings that in case of fire, or exposure to loss or damage thereby, it shall be the duty of the insured to use their best endeavors for saving and preserving the property, is not violated by taking off the spark arrester of a threshing engine for a few minutes while the machine is in operation, since the purpose of such provision is to define the duty of the insured when the property covered by the policy is on fire, or when it is menaced by fire. Siemers v. Meeme Mut. Home Protection Ins. Co. 143 Wis. 114, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1083, 126 N. W. 669.

In Siemers v. Meeme Mut. Home Protection Ins. Co. supra, the evidence as to compliance with provisions as to keeping a ladder, an abundance of water, and the required number of pails, was uncontradicted, and was held to present no question for the jury, and their finding that a watchman was employed was held to be supported by the evidence.

Miscellaneous.

In the absence of a condition excluding liability on account of the insured's negligence, his right of recovery will not be defeated because of his negligent use of a steam engine on his premises, where such same form as in the case at bar], implies a use of the premises as a place of deposit for the prohibited articles for a considerable period of time," says the Massachusetts court in First Cong. Church v. Holyoke Mut. F. Ins. Co. 158 Mass. 475, 19 L.R.A. 587, 35 Am. St. Rep. 503, 33 N. E. 572. A similar definition, excluding the idea of mere temporary presence, is given in Clute v. Clintonville Mut. F. Ins. Co. 144 Wis. 638, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 240, 129 N. W. 661; Smith v. German Ins. Co. 107 Mich. 270, 30 L.R.A. 368, 65 N. W. 236. And see note in 13 Ann. Cas. 542.

The definition of "use" was discussed by the court in Mears v. Humboldt F. Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 15, 37 Am. Rep. 647, as follows: "We are not disposed to give to the word 'use' in this policy the narrow construction claimed for it. It must have a reasonable interpretation, such as was probably contemplated by the parties at the time the contract was entered into. . . . What is intended to be prohibited is the habitual use of such articles, not their exceptional use upon some emergency. The strict rule claimed by the defendants would prevent the assured from painting his house or cleaning his furniture, as it would be difficult to do either without using some of the prohibited articles."

The court followed the same definition of "use" in Lebanon County v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 237 Pa. 360, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 148, 85 Atl. 419, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 130.

A careful definition of "kept or used" is negligence was not wilful. Johnston v. Dominion Grange Mut. F. Ins. Co. 23 Ont. App. Rep. 729.

In Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hull, 77 Md. 498, 27 Atl. 169, where the insured bought a portable steam engine, and placed it within 30 feet of his barn, and used it for chopping and threshing grain, the court said that the use of such engine under the circumstances, without the insurer's permission, beyond all question resulted in a forfeiture of the policy. The exact provision governing the forfeiture does not appear, and the question at issue was as to whether there had been a waiver of the forfeiture.

In Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Moyer, 97 Pa. 441, it was held that the use of a portable steam engine placed within 32 feet of the insured barn for threshing purposes did not constitute a violation of a provision of the by-laws prohibiting the insuring of any building "situated within 50 yards of a railroad on which steam power is employed, or of any forges, foundries, furnaces, rolling mills, powdermills, paper and oil mills, cotton mills, or, in general, any mills, factories, or machineries driven by steam power," or of another by-law providing for a suspension of the risk "if the owner of any insured building should convert it to some found in the recent case of Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wade, 95 Tex. 598, 58 L.R.A. 714, 93 Am. St. Rep. 870, 68 S. W. 977, where the words of prohibition were "kept, used, or allowed," and they were held not to cover a case where a gallon of gasoline was brought onto the premises for temporary use, although such act in fact caused the destruction of the property. "It is not enough," say the court, "that hazardous articles are upon the premises. They must be there for the purpose of being stored or kept. . . . As the word 'kept' means that the prohibited article must not only be upon the premises, but must be there for keeping or storing, and not merely upon a temporary occasion for a different purpose, it follows that there must be some degree of permanency in its continuance there. The word implies all this. The word 'used' is employed in immediate connection with the word 'kept,' in order, we think, to extend the provision so as to exclude the idea that the article must be stored or deposited on the premises. But the purpose in the use of each word is to provide against the same danger, viz., that which would arise from the habitual, constant, or continued exposure of the property through the presence or use of the article. One word forbids the permanent or habitual keeping of the dangerous thing, and the other a like use of it, without the actual depositing or storing of it." See also Hynds v. Schenectady County Mut. Ins. Co. 11 N. Y. 554; Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Simmons, 30 Pa. 299; other purpose, or should carry on therein any of the trades" specified in the preceding clause.

In Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 75 Vt. 320, 55 Atl. 662, a printed schedule described most of the property insured, but in writing there was an indorsement, "$50 on engines, shafting, and belting," and it appeared that the boiler house in which the boiler that propelled two engines was placed was within 100 feet of insured buildings, and the insured contended that the insurer must have contemplated that these engines would be used for ordinary farm purposes, and that the written portion of the contract should be construed to control the printed provision, and that so construed no forfeiture would result from the use of another engine which had been brought upon the premises to cut ensilage; but the court held otherwise, saying that if the question were in respect to the use of the engines insured by the policy the contract would be construed to mean that their use was contemplated by the insurer in view of their situation and the safeguards around them, but that the engine in controversy was not insured, and was not upon the premises when the policy was issued, and had not the protection of a boiler house when used.

Mears v. Humboldt F. Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 15, 37 Am. Rep. 647; Szymkus v. Eureka F. & M. Ins. Co. 114 Ill. App. 401; and Adair v. Southern Mut. Ins. Co. 107 Ga. 297, 45 L.R.A. 204, 73 Am. St. Rep. 122, 33 S. E. 78, the last involving the temporary use of a machine for threshing grain on the premises where the insured property was located.

2. Increase of Risk.—The language is that the policy shall be void if, without the written consent of the insurer, "the situation, or circumstances affecting the risk, shall, by or with the advice, agency, or consent of the insured, be so altered as to cause an increase of such risks." What constitutes an alteration of the situation or circumstances affecting the risk as to cause an increase of risk? Here we must distinguish between occasional negligent acts of the insured, which may not only tend to increase the hazard for the time being, but perhaps even cause the fire, and an alteration of the situation or circumstances. In a certain sense all negligent acts of the insured have a tendency to increase the risk, and yet the policy is not thereby avoided, because one's own carelessness is one of the very things insured against, otherwise insurance would afford little protection, and the policy holder would be insuring himself. The insured who works in his barn or upon the haymow, or in his woodshed, with a lighted pipe or cigar, evidently increases the risk; so does the housewife who builds too brisk a fire, leaves the stove filled with wood and the draughts wide open, or deposits hot ashes in a wooden receptacle. But acts like these, while they may temporarily increase the hazard, do not so alter the situation or circumstances affecting the risk as to avoid the policy. They may constitute negligence on the part of the owner, but neither the situation of the property itself nor the circumstances surrounding it can with reason be said to be altered.

"Those words imply something of duration, and a casual change of a temporary character would not ordinarily render the policy void under this provision." First Cong. Church v. Holyoke Mut. F. Ins. Co. 158 Mass. 475, 19 L.R.A. 587, 35 Am. St. Rep. 508, 33 N. E. 572.

See also Loud v. Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. 2 Gray, 221; Com. v. Hide & Leather Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 136, 17 Am. Rep. 72; King Brick Mfg. Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 164 Mass. 291, 41 N. E. 277.

One object in requiring the written consent of the company in case of increase of risk doubtless is to enable the company to charge an additional premium therefor, during the continuance of the increase, and this presupposes a period of substantial duration.

"An increase of risk which is substantial, and which is continued for a considerable period of time, is a direct and certain injury to the insurer, and changes the basis upon which the contract of insurance rests." Kyte v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 149 Mass. 116, 123, 3 L.R.A. 508, 21 N. E. 361, 362.

Here, then, as in the prohibited articles clause, the words themselves ordinarily import something more than a mere temporary exposure to additional hazard, and it is the opinion of the court that it could not be said, as a matter of law, that the act of the plaintiff constituted a breach of this condition.

Let us take another and broader view. Both the prohibited articles clause and the increase of risk clause must be construed in the light of the entire contract, the situation and character of the property insured, and the natural and necessary use to which it must be put, and the application of this universal rule of construction confirms the inferences already drawn from the precise language of the clauses themselves.

The buildings insured were not city property, but farm buildings, consisting of a dwelling house, storehouse, and frame barn, together with various farming machinery, implements, vehicles, etc. It could not have been in the mind of either the plaintiff or the defendant that the barn in which the fire started was to be locked and lie idle. Both the parties knew that the plaintiff was to continue to use his buildings in the ordinary course of husbandry, as the ordinary farmer uses them in the pursuit of his legitimate occupation. The policy was not intended, nor should it be permitted, to prevent such use. The threshing of grain is as much a necessary incident of farm work as is harvesting and storing in the barn. Formerly threshing was done by horse power, but that method has become well nigh, if not wholly, obsolete; and the uncontradicted evidence shows that practically all the grain in the plaintiff's community is now threshed with the aid of a gasoline engine. This is common knowledge. The defendant, which makes a specialty of farm risks, must have known it. Its local agent, through whom the first policy was issued, was himself a farmer and lived within 3 or 4 miles from the plaintiff's premises, and must have been familiar with the general situation and custom; and the local agent who issued the policy in suit, a renewal of the first, also resides in Skowhegan. Knowledge of conditions existing at the time the contract is made, is always taken into consideration in construing the rights of the parties thereunder, as in the case of vacancy. Guptill v. Pine Tree State Mut. F. Ins. Co. 109 Me. 323, 84 Atl. 529.

The plaintiff was making the same use of his barn and was carrying on his ordinary occupation in the same manner as when the policy was issued, and the same as all other farmers were customarily doing. It was a reasonable and necessary use. It was impracticable, if not impossible, to secure the threshing of his grain by any other process; and under such circumstances, which must have been known to the insurer when the policy was issued, we cannot hold that the plaintiff was thereby violating the conditions of his policy. If such an act constituted a forfeiture, then he had been uninsured, since the engine was used on the first occasion after the policy was issued, because a breach occurred then, if at all; and we have recently held that a policy once forfeited cannot be revived, except by waiver or mutual agreement. Dolliver v. Granite State F. Ins. Co. 111 Me. 275, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1106, 89 Atl. 8.

And not only under such a construction would this policy have been long since forfeited, but it is safe to assume that practically all the farmers in that section would find their policies in the same condition. If a fair and reasonable interpretation of the policy requires it, of course the injustice of the result must not be interposed to prevent it. Parties must be bound by the contracts they make. But a result so disastrous and universal raised a strong presumption that it was not within the contemplation of the parties, and the contract should not be so construed, except by compulsion of the language.

This rule that the policy is not avoided where the use made of the prohibited articles, or the general use and operation of the property was necessarily incident to the business of the insured, and therefore presumed to be recognized and impliedly permitted by the insurer, is well settled and of wide and general application.

Thus, in manufacturing establishments the keeping or using of an article necessarily incident to the manufacturing process or to the carrying on of the business will not avoid a policy, even though keeping or using be expressly prohibited, as the use of gasoline in a silver-plating factory, Lancaster Silver Plate Co. v. National F. Ins. Co. 170 Pa. 151, 50 Am. St. Rep. 753, 32 Atl. 613; keeping a small quantity of benzine for use in a furniture repair shop, Faust v. American F. Ins. Co. 91 Wis. 158, 30 L.R.A. 783, 51 Am. St. Rep. 876, 64 N. W. 883; keeping benzine for finishing purposes in a furniture factory, Davis v. Pioneer Furniture Co. 102 Wis. 394, 78 N. W. 596; keeping benzine in a wagon factory L.R.A.1915D.

for the purpose of mixing paints, Archer v. Merchants' & Mfrs. Ins. Co. 43 Mo. 434; keeping camphene in a printing establishment for use in cleaning type, Harper v. New York City Ins. Co. 22 N. Y. 441; petroleum in a flour mill for lubricating purposes, Carlin v. Western Assur. Co. 57 Md. 515, 40 Am. Rep. 440. In all of these instances, and in many more gathered in the note in 13 Ann. Cas. 540, the use of the prohibited article was not merely once a year for a short time, as here, but continuous; nevertheless, as it was necessary to the conduct of the business, its use for such a purpose was held to be within the implied permission of the insurer. The same reasoning and the same rule apply with equal force to agricultural pursuits and the ordinary and necessary use of farm buildings in connection therewith.

Based on the same principle is a class of cases growing out of the use of prohibited articles in making repairs. It is not to be presumed that, when an owner effects insurance on his building, he precludes himself from the right, not only to use it in the customary manner, but also to make the usual and ordinary repairs in a reasonable and proper manner, in the absence of anything in the policy expressly prohibiting the same. It has been frequently held that such repairs, thus properly made, do not avoid the policy, even where the fire hazard is obviously increased. In Dobson v. Sotheby, Moody & M. 90, 31 Revised Rep. 718, the policy was issued at a low rate payable on buildings in which no fire was kept and no hazardous goods deposited. The building required tarring; a fire was lighted in the inside; a tar barrel brought into the building for the purpose of performing the necessary operations. The tar took fire through the negligence of the workmen, and the premises burned. Lord Tenterden said: "The common repairs of a building necessarily require the introduction of fire upon the premises, and one of the great objects of insuring is security against the negligence of servants and workmen. I cannot, therefore, be of opinion that the policy in this case was forfeited."

The same rule has been applied where paint was being removed from the outside of a wooden building by means of a naphtha or gasoline torch, and these decisions well illustrate what we conceive to be the true legal principle.

In First Cong. Church v. Holyoke Mut. F. Ins. Co. 158 Mass. 475, 19 L.R.A. 587, 35 Am. St. Rep. 508, 33 N. E. 572, the plaintiff contended that the use of the torch and the change in conditions affecting the risk occurred through making ordinary repairs in a reasonable and proper way, and that in the prohibitive provision of the policy there was an implied exception of what is done in making ordinary repairs. Acting upon this, the trial judge submitted this single question to the jury: "Was the method used the method ordinarily pursued to remove the paint on the outside of a building preparatory to scraping it off to repaint it?"

Affirmative answer being returned, the presiding judge ordered a verdict for the plaintiff. The law court set aside the verdict on the ground, that the question submitted did not sufficiently present all the matters of fact in issue, including the material of which the outside of the building was composed, its character and condition, the season of the year, etc., but was too general in its form. The court held that "such provisions [in the policy] are not intended to prevent the making of necessary repairs and the use of such means as are reasonably required for that purpose;" and that if the use of naphtha, at the time and in the manner in which it was used, was reasonable and proper in the repair of the building, having reference to the danger of fire as well as other considerations, then the policy was not thereby forfeited.

In Garrebrant v. Continental Ins. Co. 75 N. J. L. 577, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 443, 87 Atl. 90, a torch was used for the same purpose, and the court held that the policy was not thereby avoided, as it permitted mechanics to be employed for a period of fifteen days in making repairs, that time had not expired when the fire occurred, the necessity of repairs existed, and the method was reasonable and proper.

In Lebanon County v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 237 Pa. 360, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 148, 85 Atl. 419, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 130 (1912), where the working of mechanics was prohibited in general terms, it was held not to cover a case of ordinary repairs necessary for the proper care and preservation of the property, and that, although a torch was used, the presiding judge did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant, either on the ground of keeping or using prohibited articles or of increase of risk, and that the case was properly submitted to the jury.

Our conclusion on this branch of the case, therefore, is that the plaintiff was neither keeping nor using gasoline, within the inhibition of this policy, nor did his acts constitute a breach of the increase of risk clause, as a matter of law. The most that the defendant can successfully claim is that the question of increase of risk is a question of fact and should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions. The L.R.A.1915D.

3. Failure to Furnish Proof of Loss.—The defendant also set up in its brief statement of defense the plaintiff's failure to furnish a proof of loss, but this point is not urged in argument.

It is proper, however, to say that, in view of the correspondence between the parties and of the fact that the defendant denied all liability, the jury might well have found that it had waived this requirement. Such waiver is a question of fact (Robinson v. Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. 90 Me. 385, 38 Atl. 320), and the court cannot say that, under the evidence in this case, the plaintiff is precluded from recovery on that ground.

Exceptions sustained.

JONATHAN AGAR et al.

v.

DANIEL W. STREETER et al., Appts.

(— Mich. —, 150 N. W. 160.)

Option — acceptance — tender of money.

1. Tender of the money is sufficient to make an option to purchase real estate binding upon both parties, and written acceptance is not necessary.

Vendor and purchaser — failure to name wife in contract — effect.

2. Failure to name the wife in a contract apparently made by the husband alone, to convey their joint property, does not, if the instrument is properly executed by her, prevent its binding her interest.

(December 19, 1914.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Tuscola County, in chancery, in complainants' favor in a suit to compel specific performance of a Note. — Effect of deed or mortgage on one who signs, but is not named in, it.

The court in AGAR v. STREETER frankly says: "It is probable that if the weight of authority depends upon the number of decisions, old and new, my conclusion is opposed to the weight of authority." There would seem to be no doubt as to the correctness of the statement. See note to Sterling v. Park, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 298, to which the present note is a supplement. To the cases there cited to the proposition that "a conveyance naming several grantors and signed by those named, as well as by another person who is not named therein as a grantor, will be ineffectual to convey the latter's interest in the land described in the conveyance," may be added the following later contract for the sale of real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. P. Black and Allan R. Black, with Mr. H. H. Smith, for appellants:

Equity will not decree specific performance of a contract that is uncertain.

Kimball v. Batley, 174 Mich. 544, 140 N. W. 915.

The complainants' possession of the premises does not authorize a decree for them.

In order to make a valid contract to convey the joint estate of husband and wife, the contract should show in the body of the same that it was a joint act, made by both parties at the same time.

The option was void under the statute of decided cases: Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Lollar, 170 Ala. 239, 54 So. 272 (merely a recognition of the principle, see same case infra for holding); Swindall v. Ford, 184 Ala. 137, 63 So. 651 (but it may operate as a valid contract to convey); Cordano v. Wright, 159 Cal. 610, 115 Pac. 227, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1044; Kidd v. Bell, — Ky. —, 122 S. W. 232 (married woman's property; husband's deed not naming her did not convey her interest, although she signed and acknowledged the deed); Parsons v. Justice, — Ky. —, 174 S. W. 725; LeBlanc v. Jackson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 161 S. W. 60; Jackson v. Craigen, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 1101. See remarks of the judge who wrote the opinion in this last case as quoted at end of this note, indicating that the decision would probably have gone on the opposite rule but for the binding authority of other decisions.

The rule here stated has been applied where one of the grantors named in a deed died without having executed it, and the deed was later signed and acknowledged by her heirs, they not being named in the body of the deed. LeBlanc v. Jackson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 161 S. W. 60; Jackson v. Craigen, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 1101.

In Perlman v. Perlman, 178 Ill. App. 382, where a man signed a contract both as agent for his wife and for himself individually, wherein it was stipulated that on failure of either of the parties to perform the contract (the contract was for an exchange of lands), the party so failing should pay to the other a certain sum as liquidated damages, it was held that, on failure of the wife to perform, the husband could not be held liable either severally or jointly in any amount, his name not appearing in the body of the contract.

in the body of the deed as grantors, and the signer, although not named particularly, falls within the class. Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Lollar, 170 Ala. 239, 54 So. 272; Bowles v. Lowery, 181 Ala. 603, L.R.A. —, 62 So. 107. In these two cases a grantor and "his heirs" were specified in the deed as grantors, and the signer was one of grantor's children.

Notwithstanding the fact that there are fewer decisions wherein the courts have taken the position of the court in AGAR v. STREETER than can be cited to the opposing rule, cases like Sterling v. Park, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 298, and AGAR v. STREETER appear to be based upon the better reasoning, and the conclusion reached seems to be better adapted to modern conditions. The reason for the early rule, i. e., need of identification, surely does not exist under the modern laws of conveyancing. The new rule amounts to nothing more than an application of a well-established principle of interpretation, i. e., the contract should be so construed as to give effect to the evident intent of the parties. When an owner of some interest in real property joins the owners of other interests in the execution of a deed or mortgage that purports to convey the property, he evidently intends that his act shall not be a mere useless ceremony, although he is not named or described in the body of the instrument. The courts, in all reason and justice, should assume that the parties intended the act of executing the instrument to have some force; and, in order to give it any force at all, it must have the same effect as if the signer's name had been written in the body of the instrument, at least to operate as an estoppel to claim title. In the ordinary case there is no middle ground between these two alternatives, i. e., either it was intended to perform a useless act, or the execution of the instrument was intended to have the same frauds because the acceptance was not in writing.

Buck v. Smith, 29 Mich. 166, 18 Am. Rep. 84; Hollingshead v. Morris, 172 Mich. 126, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 310, 137 N. W. 527; Mier v. Hadden, 148 Mich. 494, 118 Am. St. Rep. 586, 111 N. W. 1040, 12 Ann. Cas. 88; Wilcox v. Cline, 70 Mich. 523, 38 N. W. 555; Gustin v. Union School Dist. 94 Mich. 505, 34 Am. St. Rep. 361, 54 N. W. 156; Abell v. Munson, 18 Mich. 305, 100 Am. effect, so far as the signer's title to the property is concerned, as if all the signers' names had been mentioned in the body of the instrument.

But in cases where husband and wife are the signers, one not being named in the body of the deed (possibly there might be other exceptional cases involving the same principle), there may be middle ground. Whether there is middle ground or not depends upon the effect that the courts in the particular jurisdiction would give to the deed if both names had been inserted in the body of the deed. (That question is not within the scope of the present note, but was covered in note to W. F. Taylor Co. v. Sample, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 289. Only cases turning upon the fact that a signer's name was not inserted in the body of the deed are cited in the present note.) To exhaust the possibilities we may infer that one spouse intends, by joining in a complete conveyance of the other's separate property, to (1) merely show consent to the real grantor's conveyance; (2) to enable the real grantor to make the conveyance; (3) to bar the marital interest of the one joining; (4) to convey all interest and become bound by the covenants. (This supposition refers to a deed in which both are named, and is merely for illustration. See the note to W. F. Taylor Co. v. Sample, cited, supra, for the holdings.) Now, suppose that the name of the spouse who merely joined in the deed does not appear in the body of the instrument. Evidently, the deed could be given some effect without giving it the full effect of a complete deed, if the complete deed is to be given the effect stated as (3) and (4), supra; but if the effect of the complete deed is as stated in (1) and (2), supra, then there would appear to be no middle ground between its effect, and no effect at all. So, in jurisdictions where the effect of a complete deed by husband and

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill is filed for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. So far as the facts are concerned, the defense is predicated upon the denial of defendant Annie E. Streeter that she ever signed the instrument relied upon by complainants, or was a party thereto. The lease and option relied upon describes the premises as a strip 40 feet wide and 8 rods long. It is so described in the bill. The decree, which recites that the trial court finds that defendant Annie E. Streeter signed the lease and option understandingly and with the intention and purpose of uniting therein as one of the lessors and optioners, orders the defendants to execute and deliver to the complainants a sufficient conveyance of the premises described in the option and lease upon payment to them of the sum of $449.70, which is the amount of the purchase price less the amount allowed wife to the separate property of one of them is to bar the marital rights of the one joining, or to convey that one's interest, with binding covenants, the courts could consistently adopt the new rule, and yet hold that, if the one merely joining in the deed was not named in the body of the instrument, that fact would give rise to the presumption that the intention was merely to give consent to or to enable the conveyance of the real grantor's property. Or, as a practical matter, it could be consistently held that such signer is in the position of one who had expressly released marital rights without joining in the granting clause. (See cases of this sort cited in the note to W. F. Taylor Co. v. Sample, cited, supra.) It will be observed that the court in AGAR v. STREETER could not well take a middle ground, for the reason that the grantors, husband and wife, were in effect joint owners.

In Runyan v. Snyder, 45 Colo. 156, 100 Pac. 420, the court seemed disposed to favor the doctrine that the deed is valid without the grantor's name appearing in the body of the deed, but did not decide the question for the reason that the grantor was sufficiently named in the body of the deed, i. e., he was described as "the party of the first part," and his name was given in the warranty clause.

In Jackson v. Craigen, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 1101 (see citation of this case, supra, for holding), the court said: "The writer is not prepared to agree to the proposition that the rule announced in Stone v. Sledge, 87 Tex. 49, 47 Am. St. Rep. 65, 26 S. W. 1068, is based upon the soundest reason, but that it is well settled in this state, and is based upon the great weight of authority, cannot be questioned." For holding in Stone v. Sledge, see citation of the case in note in 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 299.

to complainants as costs. The defendants appeal, insisting that the defendant Annie E. Streeter never signed the instrument, asserting also that it and what was done in respect to it is insufficient in law: (a) Because the undisputed testimony shows that they owned but 33 feet by 8 rods, and not 40 feet by 8 rods. (b) Because the option and lease on its face purports to be made by Daniel W. Streeter alone. (c) Because (and this is predicated upon the last-stated contention) the husband signed the lease in the forenoon and the wife in the afternoon, neither being present when the other executed the instrument, the contract appearing on its face to have been made by the husband alone and as his individual act; the wife could not join with him in a valid contract to sell the property by the simple act of signing her name thereto. (d) Because the option was void under the statute of frauds, because not accepted in writing.

I am satisfied, after reading the record and after an examination of the handwriting of the defendant Annie E. Streeter and of her alleged signature to the lease and option, that she signed the lease, and that the finding and conclusion of the trial court as to this fact must stand. The giving of the option was part of a single transaction agreed upon between the parties. The tender of the money within the time limited was sufficient to make the contract otherwise evidenced by the option mutual and binding upon both parties. I have no doubt that both defendants undertook to do whatever was necessary to be done, and that complainants relied upon what defendants did as securing to them what they had bargained for. The serious question is whether the instrument relied upon as giving an option is, for that purpose, legally effective. Assuming the bargain to have been that defendants were to convey to complainants certain property, and give them a lease for five years of the strip of land in question and an option that the vendees might buy the strip at any time during the five years for $500, for which the complainants paid $4,000, the necessary legal evidence of the bargain must have been contemplated. A properly drawn and properly executed lease and option was a part of the necessary legal evidence of the bargain.

There are many decisions to be found which sustain the proposition that the estate of one who signs, seals, and acknowledges a deed, but is not described therein as grantor with apt words to indicate the estate and interest intended to be conveyed, does not pass by the deed, and it has been many times held that a joint deed executed by husband and wife, which omits the name of either as grantor, is inoperative as a conveyance of the interest of the one whose name is omitted. A considerable collection of cases has been made by counsel, and such a collection is to be found in a note to Sterling v. Park, 129 Ga. 309, 58 S. E. 828, 121 Am. St. Rep. 224, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 298, as reported in 12 Ann. Cas. 201, 203. See also 13 Cyc. 538; 21 Cyc. 1203. No analysis of these cases is attempted, although it may be remarked that a considerable number of them are based upon some statute requirement as to the form of the conveyance, others follow the early decision in Catlin v. Ware, 9 Mass. 218, 6 Am. Dec. 56. In that case a wife signed and sealed a deed in which she joined with her husband for the purpose evidently of releasing or barring her dower; she having no other interest. She was not otherwise mentioned in the deed. The conclusion that the deed was ineffectual to bar dower was rested upon the ground that a deed cannot bind a party signing and sealing it unless it contains words expressive of an intention to be bound.

The statute requisites of a deed in Michigan are that it be executed in the presence of two witnesses, who shall subscribe their names to the same as such. 3 Comp. Laws, § 8962; 4 How. Stat. 2d ed. § 10824. But as between the parties deeds not witnessed are good. Fulton v. Priddy, 123 Mich. 298, 81 Am. St. Rep. 201, 82 N. W. 65; Carpenter v. Carpenter, 126 Mich. 217, 85 N. W. 576. As to lands owned by the husband, the wife joins in his deed for the purpose of releasing dower, and if the homestead is conveyed she is a necessary party to the deed because she has a peculiar interest in the premises by reason of the family relation and must join with her husband in conveying it. In practice it is usual, in every case where a married man conveys real estate, to name his wife in the body of the deed, in which, usually, she appears to have joined in making all of the covenants of the deed. Whether the purpose is to release the homestead interest, or to bar dower, the form of the deed is usually the same. The Constitution (article 14, § 2) provides that the alienation of the homestead by the owner, if a married man, shall not be valid "without the signature of the wife to the same." A married woman may bar her dower in any estate conveyed by her husband by joining in the deed of conveyance and acknowledging the same. 3 Comp. Laws, § 8930, 4 How. Stat. 2d ed. § 10922; Maynard v. Davis, 127 Mich. 571, 86 N. W. 1051. It would not be entirely safe, however, to conclude that the signature and acknowledgment by the wife to a deed in which she joined with her husband as grantor in conveying land owned by him amounted to no more than barring her dower. Where a wife joined with her husband in a warranty deed of his land, and the sole consideration was paid to her, she was held jointly liable with her husband for a breach of the covenant against encumbrances. Arthur v. Caverly, 98 Mich. 82, 56 N. W. 1102. Decision was put upon the ground that she was contracting with respect to property to be held and owned as her separate estate. A married woman who held a recorded mortgage upon her husband's land, which they occupied as a homestead, joined with him in a second mortgage upon the land. In a foreclosure of the second mortgage, it was claimed that, in joining with her husband in giving the mortgage, the wife had subjected her own mortgage interest to the lien of the junior mortgage. It was held that the execution by the wife of her husband's deed of any sort implies that she executes it for the purposes for which the statute requires such execution in order to make the husband's deed effective; that if the intention is to affect any independent interest of her own, it is reasonable to expect some special provision in the instrument showing specifically in what manner and how far her separate interests are intended to be affected. Kitchell v. Mudgett, 37 Mich. 81. A wife joined with her husband in giving a warranty deed of land in which he had a life estate, and the wife had a contingent interest as heir of her husband, created by the will of the husband's ancestor, by which the life estate was also created. It was said: "In Arthur v. Caverly, 98 Mich. 82, 56 N. W. 1102, it was held that a married woman uniting with her husband in a warranty deed of his property is liable on the covenant when she obtains all the consideration, which, in that case, was a conveyance to her of other property. The record in the instant case does not disclose for what purpose the wife signed the deed, as she had no dower interest; the husband's interest being simply a life estate. The burden was upon the complainant to show for what purpose she joined in the instrument, and to prove it clearly, and to show that she had brought herself within the rule above set forth. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Wayne County Sav. Bank, 68 Mich. 116, 35 N. W. 853. This complainant has failed to do, and it necessarily follows that the wife's signature to the instrument was a nullity, and did not bind her subsequently acquired estate." Menard v. Campbell, 180 Mich. 583, 147 N. W. 556.

From these cases I deduce the following rules: (1) Usually, when a wife joins in the deed of her husband of his property, the covenants in the deed being in form L.R.A.1915D.

the joint covenants of both of them, the covenants are not hers, but are his only. (2) If, however, it is made to appear that the sole consideration for the deed was received by her, and was by her husband so intended, the covenants will be treated as the joint covenants of husband and wife. The fact may be shown by evidence aliunde the deed. (3) While a wife may convey her separate interest in land as though she were unmarried, if the deed she executes with her husband is a proper and suitable instrument for the release of her dower, or for consenting to the alienation of the homestead,—such an one as she would be expected to execute if she had no independent interest,—no purpose to affect her independent interest can be implied. It is perceived that, as affecting the wife, the declarations in the body of the instrument are usually of no significance. The significant thing is that she joins her husband in executing the deed.

Neither the husband nor the wife can alone alien an estate held by them by the entireties. A deed or mortgage of such an estate executed by either alone is a nullity, before and after the death of the nonconsenting spouse. Naylor v. Minock, 96 Mich. 182, 35 Am. St. Rep. 595, 55 N. W. 664. At least, if the conveyance is to a third party. Wilkinson v. Kneeland, 125 Mich. 261, 264, 84 N. W. 142. A wife has no dower interest in such an estate, or in such interest as her husband has therein. To convey such an estate, one of them joins in the deed for the same reason that the other joins in it, and to accomplish the same purpose, namely, to alien the estate. Nothing can be accomplished except by joint action, and therefore they act jointly.

Defendants stand in the position of joint grantors, who must act jointly or not at all if the estate or any interest in it is to be aliened. In the instrument relied upon as conveying an interest therein one is named as grantor; the other is not named. Both have signed it, and both signatures are witnessed by two witnesses. Following the reasoning of our own decisions, to some of which I have referred, the implication is, and it is the only reasonable one, that the wife, one of the joint owners, signed the deed in order to make the instrument effective. We are permitted to adopt, and I think should adopt, the rule that in such a case the failure to name the wife as grantor in the body of the deed or other instrument of conveyance is not fatal. I quote and approve the language and conclusion of the Georgia supreme court in Sterling v. Park, supra. After referring to a large number of authorities, it is said (page 312 of 12th Ga.) "Most of these decisions were based upon the ground that a wife could not relinquish her right of dower unless the conveyance contained apt words expressive of such intent. But the weakness of the reasoning, in our judgment, is the clinging to an ancient rule of the common law which grew out of the environment and civilization of the sixteenth century, when such conditions do not exist in our own civilization. As was very pertinently said by Woodbury, J., in Elliot v. Sleeper, 2 N. H. 525, decided as early as 1823: 'Here, however, a deed must by statute be attested; and since seals have ceased to be distinguished by peculiar devices, and education has become more generally diffused, signing would seem to be proper and indispensable. When a deed is signed, the utility of naming the grantor in the premises or any part of the body of the instrument appears in a great measure superseded; for "know," says Perkins, § 36, "that the name of the grantor is not put in the deed to any other intent but to make certainty of the grantor." Bacon, Abr. "Grant" C. This certainty is attained whenever a person signs, seals, acknowledges, and delivers an instrument as his deed, though no mention whatever be made of him in the body of it; because he can perform these acts for no other possible purpose than to make the deed his own. In a deed poll, like that under consideration, where only the grantor speaks or signs or covenants, there is still less danger of mistake and uncertainty concerning the party bound, then in deeds indented.' In agreement with the New Hampshire case are Armstrong v. Stovall, 26 Miss. 275; Ingholdsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 564; Hrouska v. Janke, 66 Wis. 252, 28 N. W. 166. Text writers now very generally discard as unsound the proposition that the grantor should be named as such in the deed, and approve those cases which hold that the conveyance is operative when signed by the grantor, though his name be omitted from the body of the instrument. 3 Washb. Real Prop. 2120; 1 Devlin, Deeds, § 204. The requisites of a deed under the Code are that it must be in writing, signed by the maker, attested by at least two witnesses, and delivered to the purchaser or someone for him, and be made on a valuable or good consideration. No prescribed form is essential to the validity of a deed, and the instrument will be deemed sufficient if it make known the transaction. Civil Code, §§ 3599, 3602. We think that the deed under discussion measures up to these statutory essentials, and is effective as a conveyance of the defendant and her coremainderman, though their names are not mentioned in the body of the instrument. See, L.R.A.1915D.

in this connection, Ball v. Wallace, 32 Ga. 170."

See also Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Lollar, 170 Ala. 239, 54 So. 272.

It is probable that if the weight of authority depends upon the number of decisions, old and new, my conclusion is opposed to the weight of authority. See Cordano v. Wright, 159 Cal. 610, 115 Pac. 227, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1044, and cases cited in opinion. I conclude that the instrument creating the option was not, for that purpose, invalid.

It is singular that there should be a dispute, at least a failure to agree, about the width of the strip defendants own. Record evidence of title does not appear to have been produced by either party. Complainants can gain no title through a deed from defendants, to land defendants do not own. The bill is framed according to no theory of an abatement of the purchase price to correspond with the quantity of land defendants own. The evidence upon the subject, aside from the oral statements of defendants, or one of them, is found in the lease and option, in which defendants assert title to 40 feet. If the defendants own but 33 feet, there ought not to be two suits to adjust differences which should be settled in one. However, as the record stands, there appears to be no warrant for modifying the decree.

It is therefore affirmed, with costs to appellees.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA
v.

CHARLES A. LESTER.

(127 Minn. 282, 149 N. W. 297.)

Homicide — negligence of physician.

1. A medical man, or a person assuming to act as such, will be held guilty of "culpable negligence," within the meaning of Gen.

Headnotes by PHILIP E. BROWN, J.

Note. — Homicide: negligence of physician.

The general question of negligent homicide is discussed in a note to Johnson v. State, 61 L.R.A. 277, and the reader is referred to pages 287-290 of that note for the earlier cases upon negligence of a physician as homicide.

For civil liability of a physician or surgeon where foreign material is left in an incision, see notes in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1174, and 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 611.

And cases involving the civil liability of a physician for injuries resulting from elec-

Stat. 1913, § 8612, subdiv. 3, defining manslaughter in the second degree as homicide committed without design to effect death, "by any act, procurement, or culpable negligence" not constituting a higher crime, where he has exhibited gross incompetency or inattention, or wanton indifference to his patient's safety.

Indictment — homicide — negligence of physician.

2. An indictment under this statute need not allege knowledge on defendant's part of probability of consequences from the acts or omissions charged; nor is it necessary to charge defendant's duty in the premises, nor set up a specific standard of duty, nor to allege "culpable" or any other degree of negligence eo nomine, nor set out defendant's acts in any other than general terms and as ultimate facts.

Evidence — judicial notice — danger from X-ray.

3. The court takes judicial notice that X-ray machines sometimes inflict serious burns.

Indictment — sufficiency.

4. An indictment against a physician, under the statute cited, for manslaughter in the second degree committed in connection with the operation of an X-ray machine, sustained as against a demurrer on the ground that the facts charged were not stated with sufficient certainty to, and did not, constitute a public offense.

(November 6, 1914.)

CERTIFICATION to the Supreme Court of a question arising upon an order by the District Court for Douglas County overruling a demurrer to an indictment charging manslaughter in the second degree. Order affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George L. Treat and Durment, Moore, & Oppenheimer, for defendant:

The mere fact that the act complained of resulted in death is not sufficient to make the defendant guilty of manslaughter; nor would the fact (if true) that he was negligent in committing the act from which death resulted, in itself, be sufficient to make him guilty of manslaughter.

Whart. Homicide, 681; Fitzgerald v. State, 112 Ala. 34, 20 So. 966; Thomas v. People, 2 Colo. App. 513, 31 Pac. 349; Caywood v. Com. 7 Ky. L. Rep. 224; Com. v. Pierce, 138 Mass. 165, 52 Am. Evidence that the patient was burned will not justify the finding that the defendant is guilty of this offense, or at fault in permitting the burn to occur.

Messrs. Lyndon A. Smith, Attorney General, and John C. Nethaway, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

The operation was not carried on for medical purposes, but for defendant's personal purposes.

An indictment should be held sufficient if it fairly advises the defendant of the charges made against him.

State v. Staples, 126 Minn. 396, 148 N. W. 283.

Defendant was guilty of gross and culpable negligence.

Mr. Hugh E. Leach also for the State.

Phillip E. Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant demurred to an indictment accusing him of the offense of manslaughter the trical or X-ray treatment will be found in notes in 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 262, and 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 734.

The effect of failure to provide medical attendance to render one guilty of manslaughter is treated in notes in 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 685, and 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559.

And for homicide in the commission of or attempt to commit abortion, see State v. Harris, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580 and note.

The only case found since the publication of the earlier note is Hampton v. State, 50 Fla. 55, 39 So. 421, in which it is held that manslaughter may be established by proof that the death of a person was caused by the culpable negligence of a physician, under a general statute providing that "the L.R.A.1915D.

killing of a human being by the act, procurement, or culpable negligence of another, in cases where such killing shall not be justifiable or excusable homicide or murder, according to the provisions of this article, shall be deemed manslaughter," though there is another statutory provision that "if any physician, while in a state of intoxication, shall without a design to effect death administer any poison, drug or medicine, or do any other act to another person which shall produce death of such other, he shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter," the latter provision being designed as an addition to the former, rather than to supersede it in cases of malpractice by physicians.

in the second degree, on the ground that the acts or omissions charged were not stated with sufficient certainty to, and did not, constitute a public offense. The court below overruled the demurrer and certified the case here.

The indictment was found under Gen. Stat. 1913, § 8612, subdiv. 3, declaring manslaughter to be of this degree when committed without any design to effect death, "by any act, procurement, or culpable negligence" not constituting a higher crime. Omitting formal parts, it alleged that defendant, "without authority of law, but without a design to effect her death, did feloniously use and employ upon the body of one Ruth Nass an electrical machine or instrument commonly known as an X-ray machine (a more particular description of said instrument or machine being to said grand jury unknown) for the purpose of taking an X-ray picture of the hip of the said Ruth Nass for the sole use and purpose of said Charles A. Lester, with her consent, extracted from her upon his assurance that the exposure of such X-ray would do her no harm; and she relying upon his assurance as a medical man, and not otherwise, said Charles A. Lester did then and there attempt to take such picture by subjecting the body of said Ruth Nass to the rays of the said machine, and did then and there turn and apply said X-ray upon the body of the said Ruth Nass in and over the region of her right hip, the said machine being a dangerous instrument, except when operated by a skilful manager it was not necessarily dangerous, which danger the said C. A. Lester knew, or, in the exercise of the care required under the circumstances, he should have known, and said Charles A. Lester did then and there place the tube of the said X-ray unreasonably close to the body of her, the said Ruth Nass, and disregarding the duty he owed her, he did negligently and carelessly fail to give her, during the time of such exposure to such X-ray as aforesaid, such proper and requisite attention as was requisite and proper to prevent burning her, and did operate such X-ray in an unskilful manner, and did keep her body so exposed for an unreasonable length of time, thereby inflicting upon the body of her, the said Ruth Nass, in the region of the right hip, as aforesaid, a mortal burn and injury known as an X-ray burn, from which mortal burn so caused as aforesaid she, the said Ruth Nass, died."

This court has frequently declared that an indictment must set out the complete criminal offense charged, and every essential element must be alleged directly and certainly; the omission of an allegation without which a criminal offense would not be described being fatal. State v. MacDonald, 105 Minn. 251, 117 N. W. 482. And the essential, ultimate facts alleged must not be consistent with innocence. State v. Erickson, 81 Minn. 134, 83 N. W. 512. Furthermore, the indictment must protect accused from a second prosecution for the same offense. State v. Tracy, 82 Minn. 317, 84 N. W. 1015. It cannot, however, be overturned by technicalities which do not prejudice the substantial rights of defendant. State v. Staples, 126 Minn. 396, 148 N. W. 283.

The only question necessary to be considered in applying the foregoing tests is whether the criminality of defendant's acts as constituting the crime of homicide by "culpable negligence" is sufficiently alleged.

Numerous definitions of this term may be found. 2 Words & Phrases, 1780; 1 Words & Phrases, 2d series, 1174. But these would be of little, if any, value in the premises, for the term does not appear in the indictment. Moreover, culpable negligence—that is, criminal negligence—is largely a matter of degree, and, as has well been said, incapable of precise definition. Whether it exists to such a degree as to involve criminal liability is a question that must be left, to a great extent, to the common sense of the jury. Hampton v. State, 50 Fla. 55, 64, 39 So. 421; Stehr v. State, 92 Neb. 755, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559, 139 N. W. 676, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 573; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 2d ed. 810. But not every careless or negligent act whereby death ensues comes within the statute, and something more must appear than the essentials necessary to impose civil liability for damages. 21 Cyc. 766. When considered as the basis of a charge of manslaughter against a medical man, or person assuming to act as such, culpable negligence exists where he exhibits gross lack of competency or inattention, or wanton indifference to the patient's safety, which may arise from his gross ignorance of the science, or through gross negligence in either its application or lack of proper skill in the use of instruments. Where, however, he does nothing that an ordinarily skilled and careful practitioner might not do, and death results merely from an error of judgment or accident, no criminal liability attaches. Hampton v. State, supra, decided under a statute like ours; Ferguson's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 181; Reg. v. Ellis, 2 Car. & K. 470; note in 124 Am. St. Rep. 330; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 810; 21 Cyc. 769. "Gross," as here used, is intended to convey the idea of recklessness with regard to the safety of others, or, as expressed by Mr. Justice Holmes in

Com. v. Pierce, 138 Mass. 165, 52 Am. Rep. 264, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 391, "foolhardy presumption."

The failure to allege knowledge on defendant's part that his acts involved probability of serious consequences to the deceased is not fatal to the indictment; the defect, if any, in this regard, being cured by the presumption of contemplation of probable consequences. Ibid. Neither was it necessary to allege defendant's duty to deceased under the circumstances, nor to set up a specific standard by which his acts might be measured; these being matters of law. If, then, the facts alleged sufficiently show such incompetency or inattention or indifference to the safety of deceased as has been indicated as necessary to give rise to criminal liability, the indictment must be upheld, though it charges neither "culpable" nor any other degree of negligence eo nomine, nor defendant's acts in other than general terms and as ultimate facts. To state more as to the latter would be to plead the evidence, which is not required, and "negligence" prefixed by adjectives could not aid the former, unless the facts stated justified such expressions (State v. MacDonald, supra), in which event they would be surplusage.

We must take judicial notice that X-ray machines sometimes inflict serious burns, and the indictment characterizes the instrument used as dangerous, unless skillfully handled, and presumptively known by defendant to be such, notwithstanding which, he placed it too close to his subject, and also failed during an excessive exposure to give her the attention requisite to prevent injury. These allegations import criminal negligence, and the questions raised thereby are for the jury. State v. Hardister, 38 Ark. 605, 42 Am. Rep. 5. We sustain the indictment, though it is not a model one.

Order affirmed.

LOWELL A. LAMOREAUX et al., Respts.,
v.

LOUIS ANDERSCH et al., Exrs., etc., of Charles Andersch, Deceased, et al., Appts.

(128 Minn. 261, 150 N. W. 908.)

Mechanics' lien — for architect's plans.

1. An architect who, under contract with the owner of land, furnishes plans and specifications for the construction of a building thereon, is entitled to a lien upon the building and land upon which it is constructed, though he does not supervise the construction.

If the owner, after the plans are furnished, of his own volition and without fault of the architect, abandons the construction of a building on the land, the architect has a lien on the land. An actual improvement is not necessary to a lien.

Same — time for filing.

2. The contract between the architect and the owner was that the former should furnish plans and specifications for and supervise the construction of the building for an entire consideration, based on a percentage of the total cost. The lien statement was filed within ninety days after the owner repudiated the contract. It is held that such statement was filed in time, though the last work on the plans and specifications was done more than ninety days prior thereto.

(January 29, 1915.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to foreclose a mechanics' lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lancaster, Simpson, & Purdy and James E. Dorsey, for appellants:

An actual improvement to the premises is necessary for a lien, and here there was no improvement.

Note. — Right of architect to mechanics' lien.

This note supplements the earlier notes to Stephens v. Hicks, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 354, and Hughes v. Torgerson, 16 L.R.A. 600.

It is held in a recent Washington case that an architect has a lien on a building for furnishing plans for it and superintending its construction, under a statute providing that every person performing labor upon or furnishing material for a building has a lien upon the building therefor. Gould v. McCormick, 75 Wash. 61, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 765, 134 Pac. 676, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 710. Alluding to the conflict of authority on this point, the court said that, while the decisions are by no means harmonious, the great weight of authority as well as the better reason appears to support the view that the lien exists where the language of the statute is general.

Norris, 13 Minn. 473, Gil. 438; Gardner v. Leck, 52 Minn. 522, 54 N. W. 746; Wentworth v. Tubbs, 53 Minn. 388, 55 N. W. 543; Waganstein v. Jones, 61 Minn. 262, 63 N. W. 717; Rinn v. Electric Power Co. 3 App. Div. 305, 38 N. Y. Supp. 345; Thompson-Starrett Co. v. Brooklyn Heights Realty Co. 111 App. Div. 358, 98 N. Y. Supp. 128; Spannhake v. Mountain Constr. Co. 137 N. Y. Supp. 900; Swasey v. Granite Spring Water Co. 158 App. Div. 549, 143 N. Y. Supp. 838; Foster v. Tierney, 91 Iowa, 253, 51 Am. St. Rep. 343, 59 N. W. 59; Parsons v. Brown, 97 Iowa, 699, 66 N. W. 880; Fitzgerald v. Walsh, 107 Wis. 92, 81 Am. St. Rep. 824, 82 N. W. 717; Howes v. Reliance Wire Works Co. 46 Minn. 44, 48 N. W. 448.

But the Washington court lays down the general proposition that where no building is erected the architect has no lien for drawing plans, saying that the law contemplates that the lien is to attach to the building and upon only so much of the land as may be necessary for its use and occupation. Lipscomb v. Exchange Nat. Bank, 80 Wash. 296, 141 Pac. 686. In this case there was some excavation, but the workmen employed thereat ceased work for nonpayment of wages, and the undertaking was abandoned. It is to be noted that this decision is not in harmony with LAMOREAUX v. ANDERSCH, unless the fact, given so much weight in the latter case, that the abandonment of the work was due to the owner himself, is to be regarded as sufficient completely to distinguish them. In connection with the point as to abandonment of the work it is pertinent to refer to the note as to the right to a mechanics' lien for labor or material furnished on the order of an architect before abandonment of the contract by the contractor, appended to Sternberg v. Ft. Smith Refrigerator Works, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 89.

In Sanguinett v. Colorado Salt Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 150 S. W. 490, the court held architects entitled to a lien for both plans and superintendence, under a statute giving a lien to any person, firm, corporation, artisan, laborer, or mechanic who may labor or furnish material to erect any improvement on land. The court said that even if the plaintiff, a firm of architects, was not an artisan, laborer, or mechanic within the meaning of the statute, the act included the plaintiff by the significant phrase, "any person or firm . . . who may labor," which showed a legislative intent to provide a lien for any and all persons whether artisans, laborers, mechanics, or not, who may labor "to erect any house or improvement."

Upon the authority of earlier New York cases cited in the earlier notes, it has been held in later New York decisions that while an architect is not entitled to a mechanics' lien for drawing plans alone, yet when he both draws plans and superintends construc-

No lien existed here because the lien statement was not filed within ninety days from the date of furnishing the last item of service.

Hurlbert v. New Ulm Basket Works, 47 Minn. 81, 49 N. W. 521; Voigtmann v. Wilmington Trust Bldg. Corp. 7 Penn. (Del.) 265, 78 Atl. 920.

Messrs. Lind, Ueland, & Jerome for respondents.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien. There was a trial before the court without a jury and a decision for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal from the judgment entered on the decision.

tion he is entitled to a lien for the value of both plans and superintendence. Spannhake v. Mountain Constr. Co. 159 App. Div. 727, 144 N. Y. Supp. 968, reversing 137 N. Y. Supp. 900. Swasey v. Granite Spring Water Co. 158 App. Div. 549, 143 N. Y. Supp. 838, indorsed this doctrine, but denied judgment in favor of the lienor upon the ground that evidence was insufficient to show the relation between plans and specifications, on the one hand, and superintendence, on the other, or to establish that the plans were used.

In Thompson-Starrett Co. v. Brooklyn Heights Realty Co. 111 App. Div. 358, 98 N. Y. Supp. 128, indorsing the doctrine referred to in the preceding paragraph, the court further held that visiting the premises and inspecting the ground and the party wall to make possible the preparation of the plans was not such an active participation in the manual function of constructing the building as would entitle the plaintiff to a lien therefor, and carry with it the claim for preparing plans and specifications.

Attention is also directed to Federal Trust Co. v. Guigues, 76 N. J. Eq. 495, 74 Atl. 652, in which the question was whether during a delay in the work the architect did anything within the scope of his duties which was sufficient to keep his lien alive; and in which it was held that his visit to the premises when no work was being done, and none had been done for three months, was insufficient; but that another visit when things were practically at a standstill, to see that things were safe, to take care of the place, to see if anyone was working, and to serve notice on the contractors to finish their work, was sufficient to give vitality to the lien, as they were a part of the architect's duties.

Some benefit in this connection may be derived from a reference to the note appended to Munroe v. Clark, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 82, on the right to a lien for labor in preparing materials in manufactured form, under a statute giving a lien for work or labor performed on the building or structure.

L. A. W.

The facts are as follows: Plaintiffs are architects. In September, 1912, defendants Louis and Julius Andersch and Charles Andersch, since deceased, entered into a contract with plaintiffs by the terms of which plaintiffs agreed to make plans, with details and specifications, for a building to be erected on two lots in Minneapolis owned by defendants, and to superintend the construction of the building. Plaintiffs were to receive as compensation for their services a sum equal to 4 per cent of the cost of the building. The plans and specifications were prepared, submitted to contractors for bids, and delivered, with the bids received, to defendants in November, 1912. Prior to this time defendants had a survey of the land made and furnished to plaintiffs for their use in preparing the plans, and tore down an old barn that was standing on the lots. The plans and specifications were retained by defendants without objection, but they did not accept or reject the bids, or take any action in the matter until May 27, 1913, when they repudiated the contract with plaintiffs, and abandoned the project of constructing a building on the lots. Prior to this time nothing was done either towards the construction of the building, or to discharge plaintiffs as architects, or release them from their obligation to perform their contract.

After the bids were received plaintiffs prepared details. The last work on these was done March 27, 1913. On May 23, 1913, one of the plaintiffs devoted some time to an examination of the details, which had been drawn by an employee, to ascertain whether they had been properly prepared. The lien statement was filed August 18, 1913.

The questions argued by counsel are these: (1) Are plaintiffs entitled to a lien notwithstanding there was no improvement on the land? (2) Was the lien statement filed in time? (3) In case it be held there is no lien, was it error to refuse defendants' demand for a jury trial on the issue of their liability for breach of contract?

1. The first question is one of doubt and difficulty, and the conclusion reached is not the unanimous opinion of the court. It appears conclusively, we think, that there was no improvement on the land. The removal of the old barn by defendants and the making of the survey cannot be considered as an improvement. This was done entirely independently of the contract with plaintiffs, and clearly plaintiffs contributed nothing to this work. Architects are entitled to liens for services in preparing plans and superintending construction where there is an actual improvement to which their work contributes. Knight v. Norris, 13 Minn. 473, Gil. 438; Gardner v. Leck, 52 Minn. 522, 54 N. W. 746; Wentworth v. Tubbs, 53 Minn. 388, 55 N. W. 543; Waganstein v. Jones, 61 Minn. 262, 63 N. W. 717. In each of the cases cited, there was an actual improvement, and in each the architect not only made the plans, but supervised the construction. It has been held that an architect's services in preparing plans only are not lienable, but we confess our inability to see why plans and specifications do not as much contribute to the construction of a building as does the supervision by the architect, and well-considered cases so hold. Henry & C. Co. v. Halter, 58 Neb. 685, 79 N. W. 616; Parsons v. Brown, 97 Iowa, 699, 66 N. W. 880; Fitzgerald v. Walsh, 107 Wis. 92, 81 Am. St. Rep. 824, 82 N. W. 717; Freeman v. Rinaker, 185 Ill. 172, 56 N. E. 1055; Ehlers v. Wannack Bros. 118 Cal. 310, 50 Pac. 433; Field v. Consolidated Mineral Water Co. 25 R. I. 319, 105 Am. St. Rep. 895, 55 Atl. 757. We think plaintiffs would have been entitled to a lien if their plans had been used in the construction of a building on the premises.

Is this right to a lien lost when the owner, through no fault of the architect, does not use the plans or make the contemplated improvement? Liberal construction of the lien statute is the settled policy in this state. But the right to a lien in any case is still wholly dependent upon the language of the statute. There is no lien except where the statute gives one. The answer to the question, therefore, depends upon the words of the statute, liberally construed to further the object of its enactment.

Gen. Stat. 1913, § 7020, the first section in the chapter relating to liens for labor and material, and the one giving the lien, provides in substance that "whoever contributes to the improvement of real estate by performing labor, or furnishing skill for the erection of a building thereon, shall have a lien upon such improvement, and upon the land on which it is situated, for the price or value of such contribution."

By § 7021, a lien extends to the interest of the owner in "the premises improved." By § 7022, a person contributing labor, skill, materials, or machinery for the construction or alteration or repair of railway lines, etc., is given a lien upon "the line so improved." Section 7023, providing when a lien shall attach, says that as against the owner, it shall take effect "from the time the first item of material or labor is furnished upon the premises for the beginning of the improvement," that as against a bona fide purchaser, mortgagee, or encumbrancer, no lien shall attach "prior to the actual and visible beginning of the improvement on the ground," except when a contractor files in the proper office a brief statement of the nature of his contract, such statement is notice of his lien for the contract price or value "of all contributions to such improvement thereafter made by him." Section 7024 speaks of liens attaching "by reason of such improvements," of "liens for improvements," and provides for a notice to be served by an owner upon persons doing work or "otherwise contributing to such improvement," when improvements are made upon his land without his authority. Section 7026 requires the lien statement to be filed in the county "in which the improved premises are situated," and provides that it shall set forth, among other things, "for what improvement" the labor, etc., was done or supplied. Section 7027 provides that a lienholder who has contributed to the erection, etc., of two or more buildings or improvements situated upon one lot or upon adjoining lots, under one contract with the owner, may file one statement for his entire claim, embracing the entire area "so improved," or may apportion his demand between the several "improvements," and assert a lien for a proportionate part upon each, and upon the ground appurtenant to each. Section 7028 requires an action to enforce the lien to be brought in the county in which the "improved premises" are situated. By § 7029, the summons is required to contain a brief description "of the improvement out of which the lien arose."

It must be conceded that the lien statute, if construed literally, does not expressly give a lien when no improvement is begun on the ground. Can we, by liberality of construction, nevertheless say that a lien may attach under such circumstances? To answer this question correctly, a review of our past decisions is necessary. We have no case where a lien has been granted when there was no tangible improvement on the ground. In Smith v. Barnes, 38 Minn. 240, 36 N. W. 346, the lien claimant supplied material for a building to be erected on lot 5. This material was diverted to lot 6, and no building was constructed on lot 5. It was held that, as against a mortgagee, a lien could not be enforced against lot 5. The court said that the statute "seems to contemplate that there must be or have been a building situated upon the land against which the decree is demanded." In Burns v. Sewell, 48 Minn. 425, 51 N. W. 224, lumber was furnished on the ground, but not used in the building. A lien was allowed, and the case distinguished from Smith v. Barnes, in that there was no building in that case. There are a number of cases in this state where liens have been allowed for material furnished for but not used in the construction, but in each case there was an actual improvement. Howes v. Reliance Wireworks Co. 46 Minn. 44, 48 N. W. 448; Hickey v. Collom, 47 Minn. 565, 50 N. W. 918; Burns v. Sewell, supra; Combination Steel & I. Co. v. St. Paul City R. Co. 52 Minn. 203, 53 N. W. 1144; John Paul Lumber Co. v. Hormel, 61 Minn. 303, 63 N. W. 718; Berger v. Turnblad, 98 Minn. 163, 116 Am. St. Rep. 353, 107 N. W. 543; Thompson-McDonald Lumber Co. v. Morawetz, — Minn. —, 149 N. W. 300. In the last case, it was decided that an actual delivery upon the premises of material sold to a contractor for use in the construction of a building was not necessary to a right to a lien, but that a good-faith delivery of the material to the contractor is sufficient. This is an exception to the general rule that, to entitle a mechanic or materialman to a lien for work performed or materials furnished at the request of the contractor, the work must be done or the material delivered on the premises upon which the building is being erected, as are the cases of Howes v. Reliance Wireworks Co. and Berger v. Turnblad, in which the material required was specially prepared for the building at the shop of the contractor with the consent of the owner, but was not in fact delivered on the premises, the delivery being prevented by the owner. Logically it is perhaps a stretch to say that one "contributes to the improvement of real estate" whose labor or material does not go into the improvement or enhance the value of the real estate. It should also be noted that the lien statute read, "Whoever performs labor or furnishes skill or material for the erection" of a building, instead of as it does now, at the time the cases above cited, except the Thompson-McDonald Case, were decided. But the last case is ample authority for holding that the change in the language of the statute does not change the settled rule in this state that actual use in the building or actual delivery to the premises is not essential to a lien. If, in the case at bar, the building had been actually constructed or its construction begun, on the plans furnished therefor by plaintiffs, their right to lien would be clear. The owner could not defeat the lien by abandoning the project after the improvement was actually begun on the ground, nor would the destruction by fire of a partially completed building destroy the lien.

Nothing can be added to what has been said in our past decisions of our policy as to the construction of lien laws. Emery v. Hertig, 60 Minn. 57, 61 N. W. 830; John- son v. Starret, 127 Minn. 138, L.R.A. 1915B, 708, 149 N. W. 6. While it is perhaps difficult to see how the value of property is enhanced in any case by labor or material that does not go into the improvement, or how such labor or material "contributes to the improvement," our liberal policy has led to this result where there is an actual improvement. Is it an unwarranted extension of this doctrine to include cases where no improvement is made, when that is no fault of the laborer or materialman? There is little light on this question in the reported cases. The case of Smith v. Barnes, 38 Minn. 240, 36 N. W. 346, would be authority for the position that there must be an improvement on the land, except that the lien in that case was sought to be enforced against a mortgagee, while here the defendants were the contractors. The case of Foster v. Tierney, 91 Iowa, 253, 51 Am. St. Rep. 343, 59 N. W. 56, is valuable for the reasoning of the opinion, but the Iowa statute reads somewhat differently from ours, and Iowa is classed as a strict construction state. The case does hold, however, that architects are not entitled to a lien for plans and specifications where no improvement is made. In Freeman v. Rinaker, 185 Ill. 172, 56 N. E. 1055, the court said that an architect was entitled to a lien for preparing plans and specifications for a building which was not erected, but the case was decided against plaintiff on another point. The Illinois statute specifically gives a lien to one who performs services as an architect for the purpose of building a house, etc. These cases are the only ones cited that bear at all directly on the precise point involved here. We place our decision on the language of the lien statute of this state, as it has been construed in the cases referred to, and hold that there may be a lien without an actual "improvement," and that we can fairly say that plaintiffs "constructively" contributed to an improvement of defendants' land in this case. We must not overlook the fact, as found by the trial court, that defendants prevented the improvement, thus of their own volition and through their breach of contract preventing the work of plaintiffs from actual contributing to the construction of an actual improvement on the land. We do not mean that the breach of contract created the lien. Of course it could not, but it is rather hard on those who have performed labor or furnished material in reliance upon the lien statute, if the owner can defeat their liens by refusing to go on with the building. It is true that the statute, in the various sections above noted, speaks of an "improvement" as an accomplished fact, and in every case that has L.R.A.1915D.

heretofore come before this court there has been some actual improvement wholly or partly constructed or the construction begun. This would naturally be so in almost every case where liens are asserted. Clearly the right to a lien exists when an improvement has actually been begun, be the start no more than the beginning of an excavation. If the owner of land contracts for cut stone or woodwork for a building thereon, and the material is prepared in the shops of the contractors and delivered to the premises, should we say that the owner may defeat the right to liens by then abandoning the construction of the proposed building? Though the question is not free from doubt, we have reached the conclusion that the owner cannot, in this way, destroy the right to a lien. This conclusion is strengthened by the language of § 7023 of the lien statute, providing that "all such liens, as against the owner of the land shall attach and take effect from the time the first item of material or labor is furnished upon the premises for the beginning of the improvement."

The balance of the section, providing that, as against bona fide purchasers and mortgagees without notice, no lien shall attach "prior to the actual and visible beginning of the improvement on the ground," seems to further justify the idea that, as against the owner, an actual beginning of the improvement upon the ground is not necessary, providing the first item of labor or material is furnished upon the premises, or specially prepared for the building in the shop of the laborer or materialman, or, as in this case, in the office of the architect. We, therefore, hold that plaintiffs had a right of lien on the land of defendants.

2. Was the lien statement filed in time? In deciding this question we will assume that the last work on the plans, specifications, and details was done March 27, 1913. If the ninety days run from this date the lien statement was clearly filed too late. But plaintiffs had no right to file a lien at that time, as they had not completed their contract, which called for supervision of the construction, as well as for plans and specifications. It was an entire contract, and had the building been constructed, plaintiffs could not have recovered their compensation or filed a lien therefor until the construction was completed, as their contract would not be fully performed until that time. Bentley v. Adams, 92 Wis. 386, 66 N. W. 505; Richardson v. Central Lumber Co. 112 Ill. App. 160, following Freeman v. Rinaker, 185 Ill. 172, 56 N. E. 1055. There can be no doubt that this is correct, and it is claimed therefore, that the date of defendants' repudiation of the contract, May 27th, is the date from which the statutory ninety days begins to run. But our statute is plain and explicit:

"The lien shall cease at the end of ninety days after doing the last of such work, or furnishing the last item of such skill, material, or machinery, unless within such period a statement," etc., shall be filed. Gen. Stat. 1913, § 7026.

The time for filing the statement does not run from the completion of the building, as it does in many states, but from the doing of the last work or furnishing the last item of skill or material by the lien claimant. Under statutes which do not permit a lien to be filed until the building is completed, and which give a stated time thereafter in which it may be filed, it is manifestly logical to hold, as the authorities uniformly do, that the date of abandonment of the work is deemed the date when it is completed. 27 Cyc. 139, and cases cited. Otherwise lien claimants would be out entirely. But under statutes like ours, one who does work or furnishes skill or material may file a lien when his work is done or contract performed; he need not wait until the building is completed, unless his contract is not performed until then. And in such cases, when the work is abandoned or suspended without the fault of the lien claimant, he may immediately file a lien for the work already done or the skill or material already furnished, though he has not fully performed his contract. Knight v. Norris, 13 Minn. 473, Gil. 438. The present case clearly falls within this rule, and the only matter of doubt is: Within what time after the abandonment of the project by defendants could plaintiffs file their statement? Though in this particular case the ninety days from the date of furnishing the details had not expired when defendants repudiated the contract, there being some thirty days still to run, there might well be cases where the ninety days had already expired when the contract was repudiated or work of construction abandoned. The manifest injustice in such cases of holding the right to a lien lost is apparent. Clearly plaintiffs had some length of time after May 27th in which to prepare and file their lien statement. We cannot say that it must have been done within the thirty days remaining, for such a rule would be, in many cases, an impossible one to apply. We must either say that they had a reasonable time thereafter in which to file their lien, or say that they had the full ninety days thereafter. A majority of the court favors the latter view. The case of Voightmann v. Wilmington Trust Bldg. Corp. 7 Penn. L.R.A.1915D.

(Del.) 265, 78 Atl. 920, is opposed to this conclusion, and the authorities in support of it are not entirely satisfactory, but a definite rule is better than one which leaves the question of what is a "reasonable time" to be litigated in each case.

Deciding as we do that plaintiffs had a lien and that the statement was filed in time, it is plainly unnecessary to determine the other question argued.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF ROCHESTER, Resp't.,

v.

EDWARD C. GUTBERLETT, Appt.

(211 N. Y. 309, 105 N. E. 548.)

Municipal corporation — ordinance — garbage collection — reasonableness.

1. An ordinance limiting the collection of garbage in the city to one licensed collector is not void for unreasonableness.

Constitutional law — limiting garbage collection.

2. No constitutional property rights of one desiring to procure garbage for stock are infringed by limiting the right to collect it in a particular city to one licensed collector.

Same — exclusive privileges.

3. An ordinance limiting the collection of garbage in a particular city to one licensed collector is not unconstitutional as granting exclusive privileges.

Jury — suit to enjoin violation of ordinance.

4. There is no right to a jury trial in a proceeding to enjoin the violation of a municipal ordinance.

(May 12, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Monroe County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enjoin defendant from collect-

Note. — Power of municipal corporation to grant exclusive right or create monopoly for removal of substances inimical to health.

This note is supplementary to the note to Landberg v. Chicago, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 830; and for the earlier cases as to monopoly in a contract for the removal of garbage, see also note to Smiley v. MacDonald, 27 L.R.A. 540.

Generally, as to ordinances with respect to the disposal of dead animals, including the right of a municipality to grant the exclusive privilege of removing carcasses ing garbage without a license in violation of an ordinance of the city. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wile & Oviatt, for appellant: The ordinance, if held to apply to the acts of the defendant, would be unreasonable and void as to such acts, even though it might be good as to other situations.

The ordinance is unconstitutional because it is in conflict with the Constitution of the state of New York, prohibiting the grant-

All the recent cases in point, including ROCHESTER v. GUTBERLETT, affirming 151 App. Div. 900, 135 N. Y. Supp. 1104, which affirmed without opinion 73 Misc. 607, 133 N. Y. Supp. 541, are in accord with the earlier weight of authority, to the effect that a city, in the exercise of its police power, may regulate the collection and disposal of garbage and other substances inimical to health, and in so doing may, by ordinance or contract, grant an exclusive right or create a monopoly for the removal of such substances. As stated in Smith v. Spokane, 55 Wash. 219, 104 Pac. 249, 19 Ann. Cas. 1220: "Ordinances conferring the exclusive right to collect garbage and refuse substances upon some department of the city government, or upon a contractor with the city, have almost universally been sustained."

So, in this case, it was held that a city having authority, under its charter and the general laws of the state, to define and abate nuisances, regulate and prohibit the carrying on of occupations which were of such a nature as to affect the public health, and make all needful rules and regulations for the health, comfort, and well-being of the city and its inhabitants, had power to pass ordinances creating a crematory department in the city government, and providing that such department should collect and dispose of all manure, garbage, offal, refuse, rubbage, dead animals, or any vegetable or animal matter detrimental to health, and making it "unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, or any agent or employee thereof, other than the authorized officers, agents, and employees of the crematory department, to haul, carry or convey, through, along, or upon any public street, alley or sidewalk within the city, any garbage, night soil, ashes, or any waste or refuse substances, except manure;" and that such ordinances were not unconstitutional as denying to one previously engaged in hauling garbage and refuse in the city, the right to engage in a lawful occupation to earn a livelihood for himself and his family, but were a proper exercise of the police power, as tending directly to promote the public health, comfort, and welfare, and did not deny to such person any right or privilege guaranteed to him by either the Federal or the state Constitution. Ibid.

Likewise, under provisions of a city charter that the city council shall elect, among other officers and employees, one or more city scavengers, that the city shall have power to abate, in any manner it may deem expedient, all nuisances which may injure or affect the public health or comfort, to do all acts and make all regulations which may be necessary or expedient for the promotion of health or the suppression of disease, and to pass all constitutional ordinances that may be necessary or proper to carry into effect the powers vested in it,—the city has authority to pass and enforce an ordinance creating the office of city scaving of a monopoly or an exclusive franchise.

enger and providing that the scavenger work within the city shall be done exclusively by him, and that it shall be unlawful for any other person or corporation to do such work, etc.; and such an ordinance is a valid exercise of the city's police power, and is not unreasonable or oppressive in that it prohibits any other person save the city scavenger from doing the work in question. Ex parte Howell, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 158 S. W. 535.

And under the provisions of a city charter that the city council shall have power to take such lawful measures as they may deem effectual to prevent the entrance of any pestilential, contagious, or infectious disease into the city, and to adopt any sanitary measures whereby the health of the city may be protected and improved, the city has power to pass an ordinance creating a garbage department and the office of superintendent thereof, and prohibiting any other person engaging in the business of carting trash, slops, and night soil for others; and such an ordinance is neither unreasonable nor violative of a constitutional provision against monopolies. Ex parte London, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 163 S. W. 968.

In Board of Health v. Vink, — Mich. —, 151 N. W. 672, a suit by the board of health of a city to enjoin the defendant from engaging in the business of a scavenger in the city and removing garbage therefrom, in violation of an ordinance which authorized the board of health to contract with a suitable person for the collection and removal of all garbage, etc., and provided that such person should receive a license for that purpose, and that no license should be issued to any other person, firm, or corporation for the gathering of such garbage, and that no person, firm, or corporation, excepting the city, should collect or convey through the streets of the city any garbage, etc., or any other unsanitary matter, without having first received a license therefor, —the court said: "The right of a city, in the reasonable exercise of its police power, to enact an ordinance covering the collection and disposal of garbage, is not, as we understand it, questioned by counsel for appellant [who contended that a court of equity was without jurisdiction to entertain the bill]. Indeed, in view of the decisions of this and other courts, such right could not well be questioned."

And under a charter giving a city the right to exercise within its limits the full police power of the state, the city has the power to pass an ordinance providing that no person except its employees engaged in public work, or persons under contract with it engaged in public work, shall convey any garbage, house offal, or other refuse, animal or vegetable matter, through any street or public way of the city without having first obtained a permit so to do; and that the commissioner of health may revoke the permit at any time when, in his judgment, the public health will suffer by the continuance thereof. Public Health & Safety, ¶ 256, 257.

The city is without adequate remedy at law to restrain the defendant from a continuance of his unlawful acts, and the injunction restraining the defendant from such continuance was properly granted.

Storm v. Bennett, 91 Hun, 303, 36 N. Y. Supp. 290.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The charter of the plaintiff, a municipal corporation, provides generally and expressly for the enactment of ordinances to preserve the health, safety, and welfare of its inhabitants, and for such other purposes as the interests of the municipality and its citizens require. Charter City of Rochester, L. 1907, chap. 755, § 85.

It also provides: "The board of contract and supply is authorized to let contracts for periods exceeding one year and providing for the payment of specified annual amounts thereon, for the collection, removal and disposal of ashes, garbage and dead animals, for the cleaning and sweeping of streets. . . ." Charter City of Rochester, § 235.

It also provides: "The city of Rochester may maintain actions in courts of record of competent jurisdiction to restrain violations of penal and other ordinances of the common council." Charter City of Rochester, § 126.

In 1907 said city duly enacted an ordinance, the material part of which is as follows: "No person shall collect or carry on the business of scavenger, collector of garbage, bones, or kitchen refuse . . . without a license from the bureau (bureau of health), but no license for the collection of garbage, dead animals, bones, or kitchen refuse shall hereafter be issued except to the person or persons, firm or corporation, having a contract with the city for the collection of garbage therein. . . . The bureau of health is hereby directed to revoke and cancel all licenses heretofore issued and unexpired for the collection of garbage within the city, except the license issued to the Genesee Reduction Company, the city garbage contractor."

This action was brought April 14, 1909, to enjoin the defendant from violating such ordinance. Prior to 1907 said city had an ordinance relating to the collection of garbage, by which licenses to collect garbage were issued to a number of persons, including the defendant. On the 12th of December, 1906, the plaintiff entered into a contract with certain persons doing business under the name of Genesee Reduction Company, for the collection and removal of garbage and dead animals in said city for five years from January 1, 1907, and for the disposal of such garbage and dead animals in a plant without the corporate limits of the city, for which it agreed to pay said company the sum of $70,000 per year. The license theretofore existing to the defendant was canceled. The court in this action found, among other things, as follows:

"Third. That the defendant is a farmer living just outside of the city of Rochester in the town of Gates, Monroe county, New York, and is engaged in raising hogs. That in pursuance of this business he purchased from a number of the clubs, restaurants, and larger hotels within the city, such portions of food as had been rejected for human consumption, consisting generally of bread crumbs and scraps, meat scraps, orange peel, banana skins, chicken bones, potato scraps and peelings, cabbage leaves, egg shells, onions, and carrot trimmings, and other similar materials. That such materials so purchased by the defendant consisted in part of food refuse and trimmings unsuitable for human consumption and rejected in the preparation of food for the table; and some consisted of scraps of food which had been actually served, remained uneaten, and scraped from plates into the cans provided in such hotels and restaurants for food stuffs so rejected.

"Fourth. That the defendant from time to time, and usually several times a week, sent his wagons into the city, where they proceeded from place to place to the several hotels, clubs, and restaurants with the proprietors of which he had contracted for such materials, where such materials were collected and transported to the defendant's farm for use in feeding hogs. . . . That the materials so collected by the defendant from such hotels and restaurants were commonly mingled in the cans in which they were placed awaiting collection by the defendant, and were unfit for human consumption. That such materials were commonly of a kind and character calculated to undergo rapid fermentation and decomposition at ordinary temperatures, and required frequent, regular collections and careful handling and disposition in order to avoid the development in such materials of physical and chemical conditions that would make such materials a menace to the health and safety of people in the vicinity where they were kept or taken.

"Fifth. That the defendant had been continuously collecting such materials from such hotels and restaurants in the manner above stated for a period of more than six months prior to the commencement of this action, during all of which period he had no license for the collection of garbage, bones, and kitchen refuse within the city as required by said ordinance. That defendant was notified on a number of occasions, prior to the commencement of this action, by the police officers of the city of Rochester, that he was violating the provisions of the health ordinance by making such collections without a license, and was, on a number of occasions prior to the commencement of this action, directed by said police officers to stop the making of such collection; and said defendant failed and refused to comply with such directions."

The findings show that the defendant is continuously and wilfully disobeying the ordinance. A large part of the specific things collected by the defendant consists of bones and table refuse. To that extent the things collected are within the express language of the ordinance. The defendant, who speaks with knowledge and experience, recognizes all of the specific things collected by him as garbage, as appears from his testimony, in which he says: "I have been engaged in the collection of garbage for ten years, and was one of the private collectors in the city who procured a license under the old system when licenses were issued to a number of private collectors."

Property rights cannot be lawfully invaded under the pretense of protecting the public health. If, however, a municipality provides that garbage, bones, and kitchen refuse which are, or may be reasonably expected to become, a nuisance and a menace to public health. If not promptly collected and removed in a sanitary manner, shall be collected and removed at specified times and in a particular manner and by a particular contractor, it is not necessarily unconstitutional, even if private rights are thereby incidentally invaded. Such supervision, when reasonable, is not only lawful, but an affirmative duty imposed upon municipalities. An ordinance affecting personal rights must be a reasonable regulation, in good faith designed to accomplish the general public good for which its adoption is authorized.

It is conceded that garbage, bones, and kitchen refuse, particularly when mingled in a common receptacle, will ferment and decompose at ordinary temperatures within a comparatively short time, and that when so fermented and decomposed they constitute a menace to public health. Because they are a menace to public health, they are subject to the control of the municipality in which they are situated. It is for the municipality, within reasonable bounds, to determine how they shall be collected and removed, or rendered harmless. Where it appears that the officers of a municipality act in good faith and in a reasonable manner in enacting ordinances to preserve the public health, their action should be upheld by the courts, even if its result is somewhat arbitrary in particular cases.

The validity of a statute or ordinance is not to be determined from its effect in a particular case, but upon its general purpose and its efficiency to effect that end. When a statute is obviously intended to provide for the safety of a community, and an ordinance under it is reasonable and in compliance with its purpose, both the statute and the ordinance are lawful and must be sustained. Rochester v. West, 164 N. Y. 510, 53 L.R.A. 548, 79 Am. St. Rep. 659, 58 N. E. 673. The ordinance of the plaintiff is not unreasonable.

All of the garbage, bones, and kitchen refuse collected by the defendant had been discarded as human food. The specific things collected by the defendant and mentioned in the ordinance are wholly worthless except as they have a nominal value when removed to some point without the city limits where they can with safety to the public health be fed to hogs. If they are not an existing menace to the public health when first placed in the receptacles provided for them, they must necessarily soon become such. Whether they become an existing menace to public health depends upon the care with which they are kept in the receptacles in which they are placed, and in the frequency with which the contents of such receptacles are removed without the boundaries of the municipality and away from human habitation. The city is not required in a case where danger is constantly to be apprehended, to wait until a nuisance actually exists before taking action to safeguard the public health. The duty of the city includes such supervision and direction as will prevent the danger to public health which will necessarily and surely arise if the things mentioned in the ordinance are not only properly cared for, but promptly removed. The specific things mentioned, which are so discarded for human food and for all use within the municipality, demand constant vigilance and oversight on the part of the health department of the municipality. Experience has shown that, when there are many collectors of garbage within a municipality, acting independently although under license, it is difficult to maintain the supervision necessary to preserve the public health; while, with one contractor acting under a contract pursuant to which he is paid and for the faithful performance of which he is required to give a bond with sureties, the public health can be and is better and more surely protected. It will be observed that there is nothing in the ordinance now under consideration to prevent the owner of a restaurant or hotel from removing the garbage, bones, and kitchen refuse on his property to a place where it will not be a nuisance to the public health, there to be fed to hogs or otherwise disposed of in such manner as to such owner may seem desirable.

The ordinance relates solely to scavengers and collectors of garbage. The proprietors of restaurants and hotels from whose places of business the defendant collects the garbage, bones, and table refuse are not parties to this action. Their nominal property is not taken without compensation. Their compensation rests in the general good to the municipality. If the defendant is allowed to collect garbage, bones, and kitchen refuse from seven places in the city, any other person can collect from seven other places, and so the number may be increased indefinitely without the municipality having any means of controlling or supervising a work which concededly is one of great public concern.

Ordinances regulating the removal and disposition of garbage, bones, and kitchen refuse have frequently been sustained by state and Federal courts. The late Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, 5th ed. § 678, referring to decisions of the courts, says: "Garbage matter and refuse are regarded by the decisions as inherently of such a nature as to be either actual or potential nuisances. By reason of the inherent nature of the substance, it is therefore not a valid objection to an ordinance requiring disposal in a specified manner, that garbage has some value for purposes of disposal, and that the effect of the ordinance is to deprive the owner or householder of such value. That the owner suffers some loss by destruction or removal without compensation is justified by the fact that the loss is occasioned through the exercise of the police power of the state, and the loss sustained by the individual is presumed to be compensated in the common benefit secured to the public. Founded upon the foregoing considerations it is therefore within the power of the city not only to impose reasonable restrictions and regulations upon the manner of removing garbage, but also, if it seems fit, to assume the exclusive control of the subject, and to provide that garbage and refuse matter shall only be removed by the officers of the city, or by a contractor hired by the city, or by some single individual to whom an exclusive license is granted for the purpose. An exclusive right so created is not open to the objection that it is a monopoly."

The United States Supreme Court in Gardner v. Michigan, 199 U. S. 325, 328, 330, 50 L. ed. 212, 215, 216, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106, 108, had under consideration an ordinance of the city of Detroit which gave to a contractor with the city the exclusive right to collect and remove garbage, which was "understood to consist of all refuse animal or vegetable matter, including dead animals, found within the city limits, coming from private or public premises within the city." The defendant gathered and transported refuse from the tables of hotels of the kinds described in the statute as garbage, acting in such matter not for the city contractor, but for the person who bought such materials from the proprietors of the hotels. The court sustained a conviction under the ordinance, and say: "It is manifest that, were individuals permitted to escape the regulation fixed by the common council, and dispose of garbage as they severally saw fit, all system in the collection and removal of refuse matter would be destroyed. Even if this garbage have some value for some such use as that to which the respondent's employer put it, the feeding of hogs, the courts will not, at the expense of the public health, recognize that this refuse matter, in its legal aspect, is property. . . . The court may well take judicial notice that table refuse when dumped into receptacles kept for that purpose will speedily ferment and emit noisome odors, calculated to affect the public health. If, in providing against such a nuisance, the owner of such material suffers some slight loss, the inconvenience or loss is presumed to be compensated in the common benefit secured by regulation. . . . The defendant insists that it is part of the common knowledge of the country that the refuse from kitchens, tables, hotels, and restaurants is valuable as food for swine, and is property within the meaning of the constitutional provision which forbids the taking by any state of private property for public use without compensation. Of course, all know that such a use of refuse is not uncommon in some localities, although modern investigation shows that a good deal may be said against such a practice. . . . Touching the suggestion that garbage and refuse are valuable for the manufacture of merchantable grease and other products, it is sufficient, in view of what we have said in the other case, to remark that it was a controlling obligation of the city, which it could not properly ignore, to protect the health of its people in all lawful ways having relation to that object; and if, in its judgment, fairly and reasonably exercised, the presence of garbage and refuse in the city, on the premises of householders and otherwise, would endanger the public health by causing the spread of disease, then it could rightfully require such garbage and refuse to be removed and disposed of, even if it contained some elements of value."

The same court in California Reduction Co. v. Sanitary Reduction Works, 199 U. S. 306, 318, 50 L. ed. 204, 209, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100, 103, approved the enforcement of an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco pursuant to which a contract had been made with certain persons and their successors and assigns by which they were given the exclusive right and privilege to cremate and destroy garbage as therein defined, within said city and county for the period of fifty years, and charge therefor not exceeding 20 cents per load. The court say: "If a regulation enacted by competent public authority avowedly for the protection of the public health has a real, substantial relation to that object, the courts will not strike it down upon grounds merely of public policy or expediency. . . . 'It is not the province of the courts, except in clear cases, to interfere with the exercise of the power reposed by law in municipal corporations for the protection of local rights and the health and welfare of the people in the community.'"

The appellant's contention that the ordinance is unconstitutional because, as it alleges, it grants an exclusive privilege or franchise, has been sufficiently answered in what we have said herein. See Gardner v. Michigan, and California Reduction Co. v. Sanitary Reduction Works, supra; Atlantic City v. Abbott, 73 N. J. L. 281, 62 Atl. 999; Grand Rapids v. De Vries, 123 Mich. 570, 82 N. W. 260; Smiley v. MacDonald, 42 Neb. 5, 27 L.R.A. 540, 47 Am. St. Rep. 684, 60 N. W. 355.

The right to maintain an action to restrain violation of penal and other ordinances is expressly given to the plaintiff, as we have seen, by its charter. Such right of action is concurrent with the legal action to recover for a violation of the ordinance. It is based upon the inadequacy as a remedy of successive actions following a series of violations. The equitable action is designed not only to prevent a multiplicity of legal actions, but to prevent a continuous injury to public health that might exist unabated while wilful violations of the ordinance were continued.

As equity has jurisdiction of the action to restrain the defendant from violating the ordinance, he has no constitutional right to a trial of the issues by a jury. The constitutional provision relating to a trial by jury is: "The trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate forever." Constitution State of New York, art. 1, § 2.

It had not been theretofore used in chancery.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

MATTHIAS AALHOLM et al., Exrs. etc., of William A. Kenneally, Deceased,

v.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

RE PETITION OF JOHN KENNEALLY
as Heir at Law, etc., of William A. Kenneally, Deceased, Appt.

v.

SAME, Respnt.

(211 N. Y. 406, 105 N. E. 647.)

Evidence — declaration of pedigree — status of declarant.

1. Declarations by a person since deceased, of relationship to a particular family, are not of themselves sufficient to establish such relationship, so as to render admissible evidence of his declarations with respect to the pedigree of persons claiming to be members of such family.

Appeal — dismissal of action — inability to furnish necessary proof.

2. It cannot be said as matter of law that one claiming the estate of a deceased person upon evidence of declarations as to pedigree, but failing to establish the relationship of declarant to the family, cannot do so on another hearing, so as to justify a dismissal of the petition without new trial.

(June 2, 1914.)

Note. — Admissibility of declarations of relatives of claimant upon the issue of his relationship or heirship to decedent.

This note is supplementary to the one appended to Re Hartman, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 530, where the earlier cases will be found.

It is assumed, for the purposes of these notes, that, to render declarations admissible as relating to pedigree or family history, not only must the declarant have since

A PPEAL by petitioner from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of a Special Term of New York County, directing the state treasurer to pay to the petitioner as sole heir and next of kin of William A. Kenneally, deceased, certain moneys and personal property, pursuant to an order of the Supreme Court. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Louis Marshall, J. Van Vechten Olcott, Edward K. Sumerwell, and Nelson H. Tunnickliff, for appellant:

The court erred in dismissing appellant's petition on the theory that, even if the declarations on which he relies were admissible, the finding that he is the son of Sergeant John Kenneally and the half-brother of the decedent was not supported by evidence sufficient to uphold the determination of the special term.

died, or at least be beyond the reach of process, and the declarations have been made ante litem motam, but also that there must have been some evidence dehors the declarations themselves, of the relationship of the declarant to at least one of the branches of the family in question. The important point for the purpose of this question is that considered in the AALHOLM CASE, whether the relationship of the declarant to the claimant, or to the person through whom the claimant traces his relationship, is sufficient, or whether there must be extrinsic evidence of relationship of the declarant to the other branch of the family.

The view taken in AALHOLM v. PEOPLE, and cases in the earlier note, that relationship of the declarant to the claimant is not sufficient to render the declarations as to pedigree admissible, without some evidence independent of the declarations that declarant was related to the family of which he speaks, is supported by Vantine v. Butler, 240 Mo. 521, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1177, 144 S. W. 807; though in that case it was held that there was sufficient independent evidence of such relationship to make the declarations admissible.

The contrary position taken in Re Hartman, supra, was followed in Re Clark, 13 Cal. App. 786, 110 Pac. 828, holding that the relationship required to be shown before declarations are admissible is the relationship of the claimant to the declarant, so where it was admitted that the declarant was the father of the claimant, it was not necessary to also show by extrinsic evidence that the declarant was related to the decedent.

In Terry v. Brown, 142 Ga. 224, 82 S. E. 566, refusing to reverse a decree against an administrator in an action to recover land, because of the exclusion of declarations by the intestate's mother, since deceased, and the intestate himself, made before any controversy had arisen, to the effect that he was the only son of one to whose orphans the land had been granted,—the court said: that it felt itself bound by the former decision in Greene v. Almand, 111 Ga. 735, 36 S. E. 957, which held that L.R.A.1915D.

the sayings of a deceased person cannot be rendered competent evidence on a question of pedigree by merely proving that such person said he was a kinsman or relative of the person whose pedigree is the subject of the inquiry, but that the fact of relationship must be shown by other evidence, although Judge Lumpkin, in writing the opinion of the court in Terry v. Brown, expressed, as his personal opinion, that the court fell into error in its former decision, and that where the question is whether any or what relationship exists between two supposed branches of the same family, it is sufficient to establish the connection of the deceased declarant with either branch in order to render such declaration admissible. Continuing, he said: "Relationship is mutual; and the question of whether A is related to B, or a member of B's family, also involves the question whether B is related to A, or is a member of A's family. Where the question is whether A and B are related, it is just as competent to prove that A's circle of relationship includes B, as to prove that B's circle of relationship includes A. Proof of pedigree by statements of deceased relatives and reputation in the family is recognized as an exception to the hearsay rule, based on necessity. Where the question is whether a person now living is related to or descended from another, dead for many years, perhaps a century or more, to hold that, before declarations of deceased persons could be admitted in evidence, their relationship to the dead person with whom it is sought to connect the living person must be shown, and that it is not sufficient to show the relation of the declarant to the living person, would often be practically destructive of the rule itself, and would be to disregard the basis on which the rule is founded. If it should be held that there must be evidence of the relationship of the deceased declarant with both families or branches, then there would be no need for the declaration to be admitted, because the evidence required as a basis for the admission of the declaration would show the very thing to prove which the declaration would be admissible. In Blackburn v. Crawford,

Y. 247, 51 L.R.A. 951, 59 N. E. 5; Erie R. Co. v. Steward, 170 N. Y. 172, 63 N. E. 118; Yeoman v. McClenahan, 190 N. Y. 123, 82 N. E. 1086; Dixon v. James, 181 N. Y. 129, 73 N. E. 673; Riker v. The testimony of the appellant and of his Cleveland relatives as to his pedigree, derived as it was from the declarations of his mother and half-sister made ante litem motam, was competent within the well-recognized exception to the rule relating to hearsay evidence.

3 Wall. 175, 18 L. ed. 186, Mr. Justice Swayne quoted from the opinion of Lord Brougham in Monkton v. Atty. Gen. 2 Russ. & M. 156. But in the same case Lord Brougham said: 'I cannot go to the length of holding that you must prove him to be connected with both the branches of the family touching which his declaration is tendered.' (The original report is not accessible to the writer at this time, but the quotation made is copied in several text-books and opinions.) It is illogical to hold that pedigree must be proved by starting at the top and coming downward, instead of by starting at the bottom and going upward. In Greene v. Almand, supra, several of the authorities cited in support of the decision, when thoroughly considered, do not, in the opinion of the writer hereof, sustain it. It may be remarked that in the second edition of one of the works cited (18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 260), the rule is stated substantially as here contended, as to two supposed branches of a family. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 643." The language quoted is followed by a quotation from 2 Wigmore on Evidence, 1491.

In Re McClellan, 20 S. D. 498, 107 N. W. 681, a letter written by a brother, since deceased, of petitioners for letters of administration on an intestate's estate, who claimed as children and grandchildren of the intestate, to the effect that he saw and conversed with his father in Dakota, was held admissible, under the rule in relation to pedigree and family history, as tending to establish the fact that the father and grandfather of the claimants was in Dakota at the time referred to, and thus tending to establish his identity with the deceased, who was a resident of Dakota.

The blood relation usually thought of in connection with the rule is that between the declarant and the person whose pedigree is in question; yet such relationship is not always essential, but it is sufficient if the declarant is related to the family with which the person in question seeks to connect himself. State v. McDonald, 55 Or. 419, 103 Pac. 512, 104 Pac. 967, 106 Pac. 444.

The declarations of the sister of the father of an illegitimate intestate are admissible to prove who his mother was, although the sister's relationship to intestate was de facto, and not de jure, especially when this relationship is coupled with the fact that the intestate was in fact a member of the declarant's family from his birth to early manhood. Ibid.

In Re Kennedy, 82 Misc. 214, 143 N. Y. Supp. 404, under the rule that hearsay evidence is permissible to establish relationship if it is the declaration of a deceased member of a family, or the husband or wife of a member of the family, the treatment of claimant by intestate and those conceded to be of his family was admitted as some evidence on the question of pedigree.

In Jarchow v. Grosse, 257 Ill. 36, 100 N. E. 290, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 820, the court makes a distinction between cases where an attempt is made to set up some right or claim to be derived through the declarant, and by the declarant's own statement to establish the right to share in the property of a family or individual to which he or she claimed to be related, and where it is sought to reach the estate of the declarant himself, and holds that where the claimant is seeking to reach the estate of the declarant, such declarations, from the very necessity of the case, are admissible without extrinsic proof of the relationship thus declared.

In Re Lyle, 93 Neb. 768, 141 N. W. 1127, where the evidence showed beyond any question that the petitioners were the children and grandchildren of declarant, who lived in Scotland, and that the declarant was also the cousin of another person who was a relative of the petitioners and who left Scotland, so that the only question in establishing kinship to decedent was as to whether decedent was the same person who left Scotland, concerning whom the declarations were made, it was not necessary that the identity of the cousin in regard to whom the declarations were made, with the decedent, should be established before the declarations in regard to the conduct

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The state has in its possession money and property aggregating over $50,000 in amount and value, which it received from the estate of one William A. Kenneally, who died testate in the city of Brooklyn in 1868. No person entitled to this property could be found, and it was turned over to the state to await the appearance of claimants. Many persons, to the number of one hundred or more, have at different times presented their claims based on their alleged relationship to the testator, but none was successful until the present petitioner ap-and habits of the cousin could be received in evidence.

Questions of pedigree, such as marriages, births, and deaths of members of a family, making family history, may be proven by declarations of the members of a family which go to make family tradition and history, and there is no reason why the affidavit of a deceased heir, who is properly accredited and identified as a member of the family of decedent, may not be used to prove the declaration as to family history, but such hearsay testimony should not be used when the same facts may be shown by living witnesses whose testimony may be produced on the trial, or by deposition subject to the ordeal of cross-examination. Wolf v. Wilhelm, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 216.

The declarations or acts of the intestate tending to show his own illegitimacy are admissible as against those claiming under him. State v. McDonald, supra.

Declarations of a father as to the paternity of an illegitimate child may be shown upon an issue as to the child's parentage. Robertson v. Campbell, — Iowa, —, 147 N. W. 301.

In Hubatka v. Maierhoffer, 81 N. J. L. 410, 79 Atl. 346, where the right of plaintiff in an action of ejectment depended upon the contention that, at the time of the conveyance of the property to her mother and defendant, they were not husband and wife, it was held that the admission of declarations to prove pedigree is restricted to declarations of deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage to the person L.R.A.1916D.

concerning whom the declarations were made, and so, where the declarations of the mother, since deceased, tended to show that at the time in question she was not the wife of defendant, they showed that she was not within the restricted class referred to, and carried with them the evidence of their own inadmissibility as to matters of pedigree.

In State v. McDonald, supra, however the court said that there was no reason, at least in near putative relationships, why the negative of the fact of relationship or the degree of relationship should not be as much a part of the family history as the affirmative of such proposition, and so, where the claimants of an estate attempted to show their right thereto by proving that the intestate was a legitimized brother of the whole blood, a prior declaration made by one of the claimants, who at the time of the trial was out of the state so as to come within the rule the same as if he were deceased, to the effect that intestate was an illegitimate half-brother, was admissible, not only against himself as being a declaration against interest, but also against the other claimants as a declaration as to pedigree.

In Re Fail, 56 Misc. 217, 107 N. Y. Supp. 224, upon the issue whether a contestant of a will was the son of the testator, the declarations of the testator and of his wife, who predeceased him, and of a brother, since deceased, of the contestant, to the effect that the contestant was not the son of the testator, but the nephew of his wife, were held admissible as declarations as to pedigree.

The petitioner and appellant, John Kenneally, asserts that he is a half-brother of the testator, and entitled as such to at least one half of the fund held by the state. He instituted this proceeding in November, 1910, under the provisions of § 2747 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A referee was appointed to hear and determine the issues. After a careful and painstaking review of the evidence, the referee reached the conclusion that the petitioner had proved his relationship to the testator, and that he was entitled to the whole of the fund because there appeared to be no other persons in existence who had any right to share therein. The court at special term confirmed the referee's report. Upon appeal to the appellate division this determination was reversed upon the facts and the law, and the petition was dismissed.

The principal reason assigned by the appellate division for its reversal was that the referee had erred in receiving incompetent evidence, consisting of declarations said to have been made by the petitioner's mother and his half-sister, for the purpose of proving the petitioner's relationship to the testator's father, one Sergeant John Kenneally, and, through this connection, his relationship to the testator. The ground on which these declarations were held to be incompetent is that there was no evidence, except the declarations, to prove the declarant's relationship to the testator's family. This presents the important question on this appeal. The referee and the court at special term held that these declarations were competent evidence of the petitioner's claim of relationship to the testator. The appellate division took the contrary view, and further held that, even if the declarations were competent, the evidence was yet insufficient to prove the petitioner's claim. This latter question we need not consider for reasons to which we shall advert further on.

The testator, William A. Kenneally, was the son of a sergeant in the British army named John Kenneally, by a wife whose maiden name was Mary Finn. The petitioner says he is also a son of the same Sergeant John, but by another wife. If this claim is well founded, it follows that he is a half-brother of the testator. The only evidence of the petitioner's relationship to Sergeant John, and through him to the testator, consists of declarations made to the petitioner by his mother, who has been dead many years; and by the petitioner's half-sister, who is also dead, to her children, who are the petitioner's nephews and nieces. The testimony as to these declarations is given by the petitioner and these nephews and nieces.

The question at issue will be the better understood if we separate the evidence into two parts, dealing first with that which relates to the pedigree of the testator, and then with so much as bears upon the pedigree of the petitioner, for the purpose of determining whether there is any evidence by which the two are connected.

First. The testator, William A. Kenneally, died in Brooklyn in 1868, leaving a will in which he stated: "It is now about forty years since I parted with my brother Edward. The separation took place in Canada at a place called Amherstburg. He was going to the state of Michigan. Edward was born on the 30th of July, 1813, in England. Our father's name was John. Our mother's maiden name was Mary Finn. Our parents were both natives of Ireland. I desire particularly my executors to make diligent inquiries and search, particularly about Ann Arbor, Michigan, and to discover if possible my long lost brother."

It is not disputed that the testator's father was one John Kenneally, a sergeant in the British army, attached to the Sixty-Eighth Infantry. He was married in Ireland to Mary Finn. After his marriage, and from 1827 to 1829, he was stationed at Amherstburg in Canada, where he had with him his wife and two sons; William, then about fifteen years of age, and Edward, about three years younger. In 1829 Sergeant John returned to England with his regiment, leaving his wife and two sons in Amherstburg. Shortly after his departure, his wife left Amherstburg for Ann Arbor, Michigan, taking with her the younger son, Edward, and no trace has since been discovered of either. The son William remained in Amherstburg, in the care of a Catholic priest called Father Fluett, until 1831, when he came to this country. Sergeant John, upon his return to England, entered a hospital as an invalid. He was discharged from the hospital on January 30, 1830, on a pension of 6 pence per day. In the same year he was transferred to Quebec. After his return to Canada, and in 1832, he commuted his pension at York (Now Toronto) for 200 acres of land on the Penetanguishene road. Here ends all authentic evidence relating to Sergeant John.

Second. The petitioner, John Kenneally, is a resident of Idaho City, Idaho. He has there occupied various public positions and is evidently a man of good repute. According to his testimony he was born in 1833 at Falls View, Canada, just opposite the present city of Niagara Falls in this state. His mother was Margaret Kearns Hardiman. He lived with his mother, who moved to Cleveland, Ohio, where she died in 1845 or 1846, when the petitioner was twelve years of age. The petitioner has no recollection of his father, who died when the petitioner was between two and three years of age. The petitioner testified that his mother had told him that she had married John Kenneally, who was a soldier in the British army; that she was then a widow, and he a widower who had two sons by a former wife, whom he had left at Amherstburg, Canada; that when they were married she was a laundress and he was a waiter for a man named Adam Crysler at Falls View; that they subsequently moved to Cleveland; that he had a patent for Crown lands in the locality of Georgian bay which he was anxious the petitioner should have; and that she had been possessed of certain personal belongings of his, such as a soldier might have, which had been destroyed in a conflagration in Cleveland.

The petitioner had a half-sister, Mary Hardiman, who died in Cleveland in 1885. She and the petitioner lived with their mother in Cleveland for two years prior to the mother's death. This half-sister married a man by the name of Moan, and by him had five children. These children testified to the declarations of their mother concerning declarations made to her by her mother. To state it differently, these witnesses repeated the declarations of their mother, Mary Hardiman, as to matters which she said had been told by her mother, Margaret Hardiman Kenneally. These declarations were to the effect that Sergeant John had been the second husband of Margaret Hardiman Kenneally and was the father of the petitioner.

Thus we have the statements of the petitioner as to declarations made to him by his mother concerning his relationship to Sergeant John, and the statement of the children of petitioner's half-sister as to similar declarations made by her in repetition of what she had been told by her mother. This is all the evidence which in any wise tends to prove petitioner's relationship to the testator, and it is of course apparent that, if the declarations of petitioner's mother are not alone sufficient to prove her marriage to Sergeant John, the petitioner's claim cannot be sustained. These declarations were duly objected to on behalf of the state, and the exceptions taken to their admission in evidence raise the question to be determined.

Declarations in regard to pedigree, although hearsay, are admitted on the principle that they are the natural effusions of persons who must know the truth and who speak on occasions when their minds stand in an even position without any temptation to exceed or fall short of the truth. White-locke v. Baker, 13 Ves. Jr. 514, 9 Revised Rep. 216; Berkeley's Petition, 4 Campb. 401, 14 Revised Rep. 782. The admissibility of such declarations is subject to three conditions: (1) The declarant must be deceased. (2) They must have been made ante litem motam, i. e., at the time when there was no motive to distort the truth. (3) The declarant must be related either by blood or affinity to the family concerning which he speaks. The declarations which we are considering concededly conform to the first two of these conditions. The question here is whether they come within the third. The learned counsel for the respondent contends, and the appellate division has held, that the declarations of the petitioner's mother, Margaret Kearns Hardiman, as to her marriage to Sergeant John Kenneally, are not alone sufficient to bring them within that part of the rule requiring the declarations to be made by a member of the family concerning which they are advanced. More concretely stated, the decision is that such declarations are not competent, unless there is some proof dehors the declarations themselves that the declarant was related to the family which the declarations are intended to affect. Counsel for the appellant insists, on the other hand, that these declarations, if taken as true, are shown to have been made by a member of the family of Sergeant John; and the contention in this regard seems to be that the declarations themselves supply the necessary corroborative testimony.

In Blackburn v. Crawford, 3 Wall. 175, 187, 18 L. ed. 186, 191, it was sought to prove that certain persons were nephews and nieces of one Dr. Crawford, whose estate they claimed. They were children of a woman who, it was claimed, had married a brother of Dr. Crawford. This marriage was disputed. The declarations of a sister of the mother of the claimants were received in evidence to the effect that the mother had told her that she had married a brother of Dr. Crawford. These declarations were objected to on the ground that the declarant was not shown to be related to the family of Dr. Crawford. In sustaining this objection the United States Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Swayne, said: "It is well settled that, before the declarations can be admitted, the relationship of the declarant to the family must be established by other testimony. Here the question related to the family of Dr. Crawford. The defendants in error claimed to belong to the family, and to be his nephew and nieces. To prove this relationship, it was competent for them to give in evidence the declarations of any deceased member of that family. But the declarations of a person belonging to another family—such person claiming to be connected with that family only by the intermarriage of a member of each family—rest upon a different principle. A declaration from such a source of the marriage which constitutes the affinity of the declarant is not such evidence aliunde as the law requires.”

In Fulkerson v. Holmes, 117 U. S. 389, 397, 29 L. ed. 915, 918, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 780, the heirs of one John Holmes claimed to be the owners of land patented to Samuel C. Young. Their claim rested upon recitals in a deed by Samuel C. Young to John Holmes in which Samuel C. was stated to be the son of Samuel Young, the original patentee. This deed, which was many years old, was found among the papers of John Holmes after his death, and had been acknowledged before a United States district judge. In that case the court said: “The rule is that declarations of deceased persons who were dejure related by blood or marriage to the family in question may be given in evidence in matters of pedigree. [Citing cases.] A qualification of the rule is that, before a declaration can be admitted in evidence, the relationship of the declarant with the family must be established by some proof independent of the declaration itself. [Citing cases.] But it is evident that but slight proof of the relationship will be required, since the relationship of the declarant with the family might be as difficult to prove as the very fact in controversy.”

It was there held that the recitals in the deed, supported by the age of the instrument and the manner of its execution, furnished slight but sufficient evidence tending to establish the fact set forth in the recitals. A similar situation was presented to this court in Young v. Shulenberg, 165 N. Y. 385, 388, 80 Am. St. Rep. 730, 59 N. E. 135. The rule in the Fulkerson Case was there followed, and was thus stated by Judge Vann: “While the law required that her [the declarant’s] relationship to the Ellice family should be shown by evidence independent of her own declarations, still, as was recently held in an important case, ‘but slight proof of the relationship will be required, since the relationship of the declarant with the family might be as difficult to prove as the very fact in controversy,’”—citing Fulkerson v. Holmes, supra.

This important qualification as to the degree of proof required to establish a declarant’s connection with the family which is the subject of his declarations is based upon sound reason, and is supported by the weight of authority. If such declarations, in and of themselves and without other evidence, are to be held sufficient to establish a declarant’s relationship to a particular family, we may as well frankly ignore the third condition of the rule, to which we have adverted, requiring that a declarant must be shown to be a member of a family before his declarations concerning its pedigree are competent. The reason of the matter is very felicitously stated by Mr. Wharton, where he says of a declarant: “It would be a petitio principii to say that his declarations are receivable because he is a member of the family, and he is a member of a family because his declarations are receivable.” Whart. Ev. § 218.

The qualification is one of growing importance. Without it a person may establish his relationship to any family he chooses by simply stating that he has heard from a member of his family a recitation of the facts establishing the desired connection. In this country, filled with densely crowded cities in which large fortunes are no longer rare, it will be wiser and safer to maintain this rule, circumscribed by this qualification, than to relax it even in cases that appear to be meritorious. It may prove a hardship now and then to require even slight evidence of the relationship of a decedent to the family of which he declares before his declarations will be received, but the consequences of the contrary rule would inevitably be much more serious.

With a single exception, the English cases sustain this qualification. Plant v. Taylor, 7 Hurlst. & N. 211, 237, 31 L. J. Exch. N. S. 289, 8 Jur. N. S. 140, 5 L. T. N. S. 318; Hitchins v. Eardley, L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. 248, 40 L. J. Prob. N. S. 70, 25 L. T. N. S. 163; Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 354, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 35, 15 L. T. N. S. 594, 15 Week. Rep. 562; Atty. Gen. v. Kohler, 9 H. L. Cas. 660, 8 Jur. N. S. 467, 5 L. T. N. S. 35, 9 Week. Rep. 933, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 186. It is also the rule in other states. Northrop v. Hale, 76 Me. 306, 49 Am. Rep. 615; Wise v. Wynn, 59 Miss. 588, 42 Am. Rep. 381; Anderson v. Smith, 2 Mackey, 281; Lanier v. Hebard, 123 Ga. 633, 51 S. E. 632. The exception referred to is found in a case cited by counsel for the appellant, which seems in theory to uphold the qualification above set forth, but in fact ignores it. In Monkton v. Atty. Gen. 2 Russ. & M. 147, a narrative written by one John Troutbeck, purporting to give a genealogical account of his family, was admitted in evidence as a declaration to prove the relationship of the claimants to the testator, Samuel Troutback. John Troutbeck, the declarant, who had died prior to the trial, was a member of the family of the claimants; but if we read the facts aright there was no other evidence connecting the two families. Lord Brougham there said: "I entirely agree that in order to admit hearsay evidence in pedigree, you must, by evidence dehors the declarations, connect the person making them with the family. But I cannot go the length of holding that you must prove him to be connected with both branches of the family touching which his declaration is tendered. That he is connected with the family is sufficient; . . . to say that you cannot receive in evidence the declaration of A, who is proved to be a relation by blood of B, touching the relationship of B, with C, unless you have first connected him also by evidence dehors his declaration with C, is a proposition which has no warrant either in the principle upon which hearsay is let in, or in the decided cases."

This case is often cited and has been the subject of much comment, and it seems to have produced most of the confusion in which this subject of pedigree is involved. When that case came before the House of Lords upon an appeal in a subsequent proceeding (sub nom. Robson v. Atty. Gen. 10 Clark & F. 471), this question was not passed upon, and, in respect of the admissibility of the narrative of John Troutbeck, the court plainly stated that it desired to be "understood as not expressing any opinion as to the admissibility of it in point of law." In Wise v. Wynn, 59 Miss. 588, 42 Am. Rep. 381, the Monkton Case was commented upon as follows: "The same doctrine [i. e., requiring proof dehors the declarations] is announced in Monkton v. Atty. Gen. supra, though it may perhaps be doubted whether the conclusion reached in that case does not offend against the doctrine."

Sitler v. Gehr, 105 Pa. 592, 51 Am. Rep. 207, and Re Hartman, 157 Cal. 206, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 530, 107 Pac. 105, 21 Ann. Cas. 1302, are in the same category with the Monkton Case. That case also appears to be vouched for by no less an authority than Prof. Wigmore in his well-known work on Evidence, vol. 2, § 1491. If we read him aright, he expresses the view that the Monkton Case sets forth the true doctrine, and he argues, in effect, that when a declarant is shown to be connected with the family whose relationship with another family is in dispute, his declarations are competent without any independent evidence connecting the two. This statement of the rule, it seems to us, is too broad. When a declarant who claims relationship by consanguinity has been shown to be a member of one branch of a family, it is of course not necessary to prove him also related to the other branch in order to make his declarations competent; but, until there is some independent evidence connecting his family with the other family, the case is not brought within the qualification of the rule which is supported by the great weight of authority. Much more is this qualification to be observed in cases of asserted relationship by affinity, as in the case of the declarant upon whom the petitioner relies to prove his consanguinity to the testator. Proof of the marriage of the petitioner's mother to Sergeant John Kenneally is essential to establish the petitioner's relationship to the testator. There is no such proof in the case at bar, unless we accept the mother's unsupported declarations as evidence of the asserted relationship, and this we regard as inadmissible.

There are a few jurisdictions in which it has been held that the declarant need not be related, either by blood or marriage, to the family of which he declares. It is of course the logical corollary of this unqualified rule that the declarations of any person who claims to know the facts are to be regarded as competent, whether he is or is not related to the family of whose pedigree he speaks. The reasoning in support of this relaxed rule is well illustrated in Carter v. Montgomery, 2 Tenn. Ch. 216, 227, 228, where the prevailing English and American rule is very clearly stated.

"In England," says Chancellor Cooper, of Tennessee, "it is now well settled that hearsay evidence is resorted to in matters of pedigree, upon the principle of declarations forming a part of the res gesta, and therefore original evidence, upon the ground of the interest of declarants in knowing the connections of the family. The rule is, consequently, restricted to the declarations of deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage to the person from whom the descent is claimed, and general repute in the family proved by a surviving member. Vowles v. Young, 13 Ves. Jr. 140, 9 Revised Rep. 154; Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. Jr. 514, 9 Revised Rep. 216; Doe ex dem. Banning v. Griffin, 15 East, 293, 13 Revised Rep. 474, 86 Eng. Rul. Cas. 554. This doctrine is comparatively recent, even in that country, and, although the weight of American authority is tending in the same direction, there are many respectable decisions which make no such limitations. Banert v. Day, 3 Wash. C. C. 243, Fed. Cas. No. 836; Boudereau v. Montgomery, 4 Wash. C. C. 186, Fed. Cas. No. 1,694; Jackson ex dem. Ross v. Cooley, 8 Johns. 128; Pegram v. Isabell, 2 Hen. & M. 193; Walkup v. Pratt, 5 Harr. & J. 51. It is obvious that while the English rule may be most consonant to sound principle, and may answer the ends of justice in a dense population and settled community, yet it scarcely suffices in a sparsely inhabited country with a migratory and rapidly changing population. It would be utterly inadequate in matters relating to a slave population, where the family is not legally recognized, and, for the same reason, to the settlement of the rights of illegitimates. Where would the negro have been in suits for freedom, after a few years, on a change of domicile by the master, with the presumption of slavery against them by reason of color, if the English rule had been rigidly adhered to? In this state we have departed from it, and allow hearsay from other than members of the family, and public repute in the community."

This Tennessee case is fairly typical of a few others, which we deem it unnecessary to cite.

We live in a state where the social conditions, no less than the rapid growth of our population and the constant increase of similar family names, are urgent reasons for preserving the rule in its integrity. Identity of names, religion, and nativity are too common to be alone sufficient evidence of family connections. Any extension of the hearsay rule in regard to pedigree, permitting declarations by persons not related by blood or marriage to the person from whom descent is the matter in issue, would open the door to frauds and uncertainties, which should not be invited or encouraged.

The petitioner's case, whatever its merit, fails at the point of greatest importance, because it lacks the support of any evidence, aside from the declarations testified to by him and his nephews and nieces, which tends to establish his relationship to Sergeant John Kenneally, and through him to the testator, William A. Kenneally. We agree therefore with the appellate division in the conclusion that the petitioner has not proved his right to the money and property of William A. Kenneally's estate, now in the custody of the state.

The appellate division not only reversed the order of the special term, but dismissed the petition. If the appellate division intended to exercise the power which it now has under § 1317 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it should have made findings of fact which would support such a final determination. Bonnette v. Molloy, 209 N. Y. 167, 102 N. E. 559. We think this is not a case in which the courts can hold as matter of law that it will be impossible for the petitioner to succeed upon a new hearing, for he may be able to adduce additional facts to support his claim.

The order of the Appellate Division should be modified by directing a new hearing, and as so modified affirmed, without costs to either party in this court.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
ON COMPLAINT OF CARMINE E. PUGLIESE, Resp.,

v.

HAGBARD EKEROLD, Appt.

(211 N. Y. 386, 105 N. E. 670.)

Appeal — allowance in criminal case.

1. A criminal proceeding originating in an inferior court is within the provision of a constitutional provision that the appellate division in any department may allow an appeal upon any question which, in its opinion, ought to be reviewed by the court of appeals.

Same — certification of question.

2. The appellate division, in allowing an appeal in a criminal case to the court of appeals, is not bound to formulate and certify a specific question.

School — exclusion for lack of vaccination — effect on compulsory education law.

3. The exclusion of a child from school because of failure to comply with the law making vaccination a condition to admission does not justify the parents' neglect to comply with the compulsory education law.

(June 2, 1914.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of General Sessions for New York County, which affirmed a judgment of the City Magistrate's Court, Note. — Expulsion or exclusion of child from school as excuse or justification for noncompliance with compulsory education law.

As to the power of school authorities to require attendance at a particular school as affected by location, accessibility, or distance, see note to Williams v. Board of Education, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 584.

As to what instruction constitutes compliance with compulsory education statute, see note to State v. Counort, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 95.

Many states have enacted laws or made provisions for regulations requiring the vaccination of children as a condition to their admission to, or attendance upon, public schools (as to the power of the state to enact such laws, see notes to Duffield v.

convicting him of violating the compulsory education law. Affirmed.

The question certified by the appellate division was as follows:

"When a father who does not believe in vaccination sends his child to school unvaccinated, but the school authorities refused to allow said unvaccinated child to attend school, and thereafter the father does not cause said child to attend on instructions as provided in § 624 of chapter 140 of the Laws of 1910, is such father subject to the penalty provided in § 625 of said act?"

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Harry Weinberger, for appellant:

There was no violation of the compulsory education law.

Williamsport School Dist. 25 L.R.A. 152, and People ex rel. Jenkins v. Board of Education, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 710). In most of the cases on the subject under annotation, as in PEOPLE v. EKEROLD, failure to comply with these vaccination laws has been the ground of expulsion or exclusion, and the basis of the subsequent court controversy. There is a sharp conflict of opinion on this point.

The importance of the decision of the question under investigation in this particular class of cases is not to be minimized, for, as pointed out by one of the courts passing thereon it may readily result in making compulsory a thing which the parent or guardian does not believe to be for the child's benefit. Thus, in State v. Turney, 31 Ohio C. C. 222, Allread, J., holding that the exclusion of the child from the public schools for failure to comply with the vaccination law relieved the parent from the obligation under the compulsory education law of seeking its admission into a private or parochial school, said: "While it is true that the parent is required by the act to send his child to a public, private, or parochial school, yet the election is with the parent. The character of our system of public schools and the manner in which they are sustained do not justify us in holding that where a child is excluded from the public schools—because in some degree supposed to be an 'undesirable citizen,'—that the parent is compelled to seek its admission in a private or parochial school. There is no presumption that the child, if rejected by the public schools, would be received in a private or parochial school or a school of some other district; and therefore, in the last analysis, the question of compulsory vaccination comes up. If exclusion for failure to comply with the rule of a public school as to vaccination is no defense to a prosecution under the compulsory education act, then the exclusion for violation of a similar rule as to private or parochial or other district schools would be no defense, and we would then be face to face with a compulsory vaccination law. Besides, the father elected to send his child to the public school, and claims that he did so and offers to continue to do so. The validity of his convictions must rest upon proof of his sending or failing to send his child to the public schools. There is no claim that the violation of the rules was a colorable pretext to justify a child of truant disposition and screen an indifferent parent. The evidence shows the child was willing to go to school and the parent anxious to have it go. In this state of facts the conviction was unlawful, and the judgment of the court of common pleas, reversing the conviction and discharging the defendant, is affirmed."

So, too, in the following cases, it is likewise held that the expulsion or exclusion of a child from school for failure of the parent to comply with vaccination regulations affords the parent an excuse and justification for noncompliance with the compulsory education act: Com. v. Smith, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 625; Com. v. Bauman, 33 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 109; State ex rel. O'Bannon v. Cole, 220 Mo. 697, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 986, 119 S. W. 424.

The compulsory education acts, it has been held, are penal in their nature, and must be construed strictly and according to their letter. Com. v. Smith and Com. v. Bauman, supra.

In the Smith Case, the court said: "It must be remembered in construing this statute that it does not make it the duty of the persons covered by it to obtain a certificate for presentation to the teacher that the child has been successfully vaccinated or had previously had smallpox; and unless you can read that into the statute, we are at a loss to see how this judgment can be sustained. The defendant discharged all the duties expressly enjoined by the statute by sending his son to school; and while another statute required the teacher to refuse him admission, in default of the certificate, the discharge of that duty by the teacher added nothing to the duties prescribed by the statute under which this judgment was entered. This is a penal statute and must be construed strictly and according to its letter. The meaning of this rule of construction is that penal statutes, such as the one under consideration, are not to be regarded as including anything which is not within their letter as well as their spirit, which is clearly and intelligently described in the very words of the statute, as well as manifestly intended by the legislature. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, 454. We must conclude from the foregoing that the compulsory education act, by its terms, did not make it obligatory upon the defendant to obtain a certificate. His sole duty prescribed by it was to send his son to school. He did this. The teacher refused the son admission simply because he did not present a certificate. There is nothing in this statute making vaccination mandatory in any case; neither does it require the child to produce a certificate that it has been successfully vaccinated or had smallpox. In order to sustain this judgment, we must say that the defendant was obliged by the terms of the statute to procure, and his son to present, a certificate. We cannot say this. The defendant made a complete answer to the case of the commonwealth when he showed that he had sent his son to school until he was denied admission by the teacher."

And in the Bauman Case, in answer to the contention of the commonwealth that the compulsory education act and the act requiring the vaccination of school children must be considered as in pari materia, and that, when so considered, not only required attendance at school, but also made compulsory the vaccination of all children required to attend school, the court said: "We cannot agree with that contention. The act of 1901 contains no reference whatever to a certificate of vaccination. It merely enacts that parents shall send their children to school, and provides a penalty for their neglecting so to do. The act of 1895 makes it the duty of school principals to refuse admission to schools of children who do not present a physician's vaccination certificate. This act imposes a penalty upon the principal for admitting a child without such certificate, but inflicts no penalty upon either parent or child for

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was duly convicted before a magistrate in the city of New York of violating the duty imposed on him as a parent by § 624 of the education law (Consol. Laws, chap. 16; Laws of 1910, chap. 140) to cause his son "to attend upon instruction," in accordance with the provisions of § 621 of that chapter, and which violation is made a misdemeanor. His child was between the ages of seven and fourteen years, and therefore came within those provisions of said latter section, which read as follows: "1. Every child within the compulsory school ages, in proper physical and mental condition to attend school, residing in a city or school district failure to furnish the certificate, except that the child is deprived of the privilege of attending school with other children of the neighborhood. These acts, at least the parts thereof material to this case, being penal in effect, must be strictly construed, and cannot be held to include anything not clearly and manifestly intended by their language. The act of 1901 required the defendant to send his children to school. This he attempted to do, by presenting them at the schoolhouse nearest his home, and asking that they be enrolled. In doing this, he complied with the provisions of the act. His children were not refused admission to the school because of either his or their failure to comply with any of the provisions of the act. Their admission was refused solely because of inability to present physicians' vaccination certificates required by the act of 1895, which relates to an entirely different subject. These acts are not in pari materia, and, even if they were, there is nothing in them either separately or read together which can reasonably be construed to make the vaccination of school children compulsory. The defendant, not having neglected any duty imposed upon him by the 1st section of the act of July 11, 1901, was improperly convicted, and the judgment of the magistrate must be reversed and set aside."

It will be observed that since in these cases the compulsory education acts were construed strictly without reference to the vaccination acts, which they failed to mention, they are not necessarily authority in a case where the education act requires the presentation of a vaccination certificate to entitle a child to admission to school.

The view taken by the court in PEOPLE v. EKEROLD, where it does not appear that the compulsory education act made any reference to the vaccination act, is sustained by People v. McIlwain, 151 N. Y. Supp. 366. And in the same connection, see Shappee v. Curtis, 142 App. Div. 155, 127 N. Y. Supp. 33.

And in Walker v. Cummings, 107 L. T. N. S. 304, 76 J. P. 375, 28 Times L. R. 442, 23 Cox, C. C. 157, 10 L. G. R. 728, it was having a population of five thousand or more and employing a superintendent of schools, shall regularly attend upon instruction as follows: (a) Each child between seven and fourteen years of age shall attend the entire time during which the school attended is in session, which period shall not be less than one hundred and sixty days of actual school."

The important facts involved in the controversy were precipitated by the subject of vaccination in the public schools. The boy had been in attendance at a public school and had not been vaccinated. Acting under and in accordance with the provisions of § 310 of the public health law (Consol. Laws, chap. 45), providing "no child or person not vaccinated shall be admitted or received into any of the public schools of the state, and the trustees or other officers having the charge, management or control of such schools shall cause this provision of law to be enforced," the board of education of the city of New York had adopted by-laws in substance providing that no pupil should be allowed to attend the public schools unless he had been vaccinated. Because of a refusal to comply with this statute and these by-laws, the defendant's son was excluded from the school which he had been attending, and defendant urges this exclusion as a valid reason why he should not comply with the provisions of the education law requiring the attendance of his son, and therefore as a defense to this proceeding to punish him for failure to cause such attendance on the part of said son.

The first proposition urged upon our consideration is that no appeal will lie from the judgment of the appellate division, but we think this cannot be sustained.

Section 94 of the act in relation to the inferior courts of criminal jurisdiction of the city of New York (Laws of 1910, chap. 659) in substance enacts that all provisions applicable to appeals to the court of general sessions of the peace in the county of

New York from any judgment of a city magistrate, or of any court held by a city magistrate, in force when said act took effect, shall apply to and regulate all appeals, and the right of appeal in all cases hitherto existing was preserved.

Section 72 of said act provides that the magistrates of said court are magistrates, and said magistrates' courts are police courts, within the meaning of the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Penal Law. Under these provisions an appeal from the decision of a city magistrate's court to the court of general sessions, and thence from a judgment of affirmance to the appellate division, was matter of right. Code Criminal Procedure, §§ 749, 751, and § 770. In the absence of permission to appeal, the judgment of the appellate division was final. Code of Criminal Procedure, § 771; People v. Johnston, 187 N. Y. 319, 79 N. E. 1018.

While the act already referred to (Laws of 1910, chap. 659, § 40) secured without permission the right to appeal to the court of appeals from a judgment of the appellate division in the case of a prosecution originating in the court of special sessions in New York, thereby changing the law, no such amendment seems to have been made in the case of city magistrates' courts.

Under the Constitution, however, I think that the appellate division had permission to allow a further appeal from its judgment to this court. The Constitution (article 6, § 9), after enumerating cases in which appeals may be taken to the court of appeals as matter of right, further provides: "The appellate division in any department may, however, allow an appeal upon any question of law which, in its opinion, ought to be reviewed by the court of appeals."

No statutory provision has been adopted under this enactment expressly allowing appeals by permission to the court of appeals in a criminal proceeding originating like the present one in an inferior court.

The legislature, however, interpreting and held that a parent who knowingly sent his child to school in such a verminous condition that admission was refused had not "caused the child to attend school" within the meaning of the by-laws applicable, and that the refusal of admission afforded him no "reasonable excuse."

And Jones v. Rowland, 80 L. T. N. S. 630, 63 J. P. 454, 19 Cox, C. C. 315, holds that where the parent of a child ten years of age, who attended a voluntary public and elementary school, was informed that, for reasons approved by the education department, the child must cease to attend that particular school, and attend another in the same district, but the parent continued to send the child to the same school, L.R.A.1915D.

where it was refused admission, the parent was properly convicted of neglecting to cause his child to attend school.

And it is held in Saunders v. Richardson, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 388, 50 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 137, 45 L. T. N. S. 319, 29 Week. Rep. 800, 45 J. P. 782, overruling L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 313, 50 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 65, 44 L. T. N. S. 474, 29 Week. Rep. 631, 45 J. P. 344, that a parent who, in obedience to an order of court to send his child to a board school, sends the child there without fees, whereby he is refused admission, is liable to conviction under the elementary education act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. chap. 79), § 12, for noncompliance with the order.

carrying out the intent of this provision as applicable to civil cases, has provided that appeals in such cases, originating in inferior courts, not otherwise permitted, may be taken to the court of appeals by permission of the appellate division. Code Civ. Proc. § 191. The constitutional provision being broad and complete enough without supplementary statutory provision to secure the right of appeal by permission, I see no reason why we should not give to it the force in criminal cases which has been adopted in civil ones, and thereby secure harmony of practice.

This course has been pursued in respect of the unanimous affirmation clause of the same section of the Constitution. The legislature re-enacted this provision as applicable to civil cases. Code Civ. Proc. § 191. It never did this in regard to criminal proceedings, and in the absence of such statutory enactment it was for some time doubted whether such constitutional provision applied to criminal proceedings. That doubt now has been removed, and it has been abundantly held that it is so applicable. The reasoning which was applied by Judge Gray to that question seems to be entirely pertinent to the present one. He wrote: "The constitutional provision as to the conclusiveness of a judgment upon all questions of fact, when unanimously affirmed by the appellate division, is unqualified in its language, and there is no reason for denying its effect in criminal cases." People v. Maggiore, 189 N. Y. 514, 515, 81 N. E. 775, 776.

Without deciding the question, it was assumed in People v. Johnston, supra, that the constitutional provision under consideration was applicable to criminal cases.

There was no necessity for formulating and certifying a specific question. Kurz v. Doerr, 180 N. Y. 88, 92, 105 Am. St. Rep. 716, 72 N. E. 926, 2 Ann. Cas. 71.

Thus we are brought to a consideration of the appeal on the merits. It is obvious that a parent should not be allowed to escape his duty to send his children to school, as provided by law, on any excuse which is not an ample justification for such course.

Our public school system has been developed with great pains and solicitude, and its maintenance and support have been recognized as so important for the welfare of the state that they have been provided for and safeguarded in the Constitution itself.

As a part of this system, a statute has been passed requiring attendance at school of children within certain limits. If indifferent or selfish parents, for ulterior purposes, such as the desire to place young children at labor instead of school, or from capricious or recalcitrant motives, may be allowed to manufacture easy excuses for not sending their children to school, a ready method will have been developed for evading the statute compelling such attendance; and, if the statute which requires parents to see to it that their children attend and take advantage of this school system may be lightly and easily evaded, the purposes of the state in providing and insisting on education will be frustrated and impaired. Failure to comply with the statute ought not to be excused except for some good reason.

It is perfectly evident that in a great city like New York, with its complex and varying conditions, regulations must be adopted for the purposes of preserving discipline, order, and health in the public schools. Some of these regulations would be so plain and essential that no reasonable person would think of disputing their validity or of making unwillingness to comply therewith a basis for not sending his children to school. The question which, within certain limits, is presented here, is whether the statute and the by-laws of the board of education in that city, adopted under and in accordance with the statute requiring vaccination as a condition of attending the public schools, are, under ordinary conditions, so unusual or oppressive that a parent should be allowed to make his unwillingness to comply therewith a basis for not sending his children to school; for that is what the present position of the defendant amounts to. I do not think that they are of such a character.

It is unnecessary to engage in any discussion of the police powers of the state in respect of this subject, or to argue that the statute requiring vaccination as a condition of attending public schools is well within such police power. This subject was carefully and elaborately construed by this court in Re Viemeister, 179 N. Y. 235, 70 L.R.A. 796, 103 Am. St. Rep. 859, 72 N. E. 97, 1 Ann. Cas. 334, and it was there held that the legislature might pass such a law, and, amongst other things, it was written in substance that, while it could not be exactly and absolutely demonstrated that vaccination prevented smallpox, and while some authorities disputed this proposition, the prevalent belief was that it did have this effect, and therefore that it was for the legislature, in the exercise of its discretion, to decide this question, and, if it considered that the remedy was effective, pass such a statute in the interest of public health. Under this decision we must assume that the law requiring vaccination of children in the public schools is a proper one.

But it is urged that, while this law may properly be applied to those who, in the face of its provisions, elect to attend the public schools, still it is of such a character that its remedies ought not to be indirectly forced upon any unwilling person through the compulsory attendance provisions of the education law, and we are reminded of the familiar principle that a penal law should be strictly construed.

Admitting all of the force which this principle justly has, there is another rule of construction which seems to me more potent in this case, and that is the one that statutes relating to the same general subject are to be construed in harmony with each other if possible.

The statute requiring vaccination was adopted in its present form in 1893. Public health law (Laws of 1893, chap. 661), § 200. The provision requiring attendance upon instruction was first adopted in 1894 (chapter 671). Thus we find that the legislature adopted the statute providing for compulsory attendance at school the very next year after it had passed the statute requiring vaccination of those attending the public schools, and it does not seem reasonable to assume that it was the legislative intention, in passing both of these statutes relating to attendance at school, to provide and have it come to pass that the unwillingness to comply with the one requiring vaccination might be turned into a good excuse for disobeying the other one concerning attendance.

It is hardly to be assumed that when the legislature passed the later statute there had slipped from its theoretical mind remembrance of the other law providing a very important condition of attendance at public schools, and, if it had purposed that a child might be excused from attendance by reason of the unwillingness of its parent to have it vaccinated, I cannot but believe that something would have been said on that subject.

It does not require much spirit of prophecy to foresee what will follow a contrary construction of the statutes. If a parent may escape all obligation under the statute requiring him to send his children to school by simply alleging that he does not believe in vaccination, the policy of the state to give some education to all children, if necessary by compelling measure, will become more or less of a farce under existing legislation.

It is to be borne in mind in this connection that it has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that a statute L.R.A.1915D.

compelling vaccination is constitutional. Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 49 L. ed. 643, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 358, 3 Ann. Cas. 765.

Therefore, at least under general and ordinary conditions, I do not believe that a parent may escape his duties under the education law by pleading simple unwillingness to have his child attend the public schools subject to the condition of vaccination.

So far as the evidence discloses, the defendant's refusal to comply with the requirements of attendance at school was arbitrary and capricious; and as one reads the record and argument of his counsel the impression somehow arises that he was more interested in asserting his right to refuse to comply with the law than he was actuated by the purpose of protecting his child from some possible or supposed injury.

I think there is still another reason why the defendant was not excused for disobedience of the law requiring him to see to the education of his child.

The vaccination statute which we have been considering applies only to the public schools. It is well known that there are schools of other kinds and classes which might have been attended by the defendant's child, where attendance would not have been subject to the condition which he now urges as an excuse for his failure to send his child to school. It is answered in his behalf to this suggestion that that would entail expense. This might or might not be so, and even if it were, it would not be sufficient to excuse the present position and situation of the defendant. We are made well aware at the present day that the government, in the exercise of its police powers, does impose many regulations which involve trouble and expense, and such trouble and expense have not been regarded as an excuse for noncompliance. If the defendant does not desire to take advantage of the public schools under the conditions prescribed for their operation, it very possibly may result that he will incur some additional trouble in the education of his children elsewhere. The choice of courses rests with him, and the burdens of either will doubtless be fully compensated by the benefits to accrue from furnishing an education to his children.

The order should be affirmed.

Werner, Chase, Collin, Cuddeback, and Hogan, JJ., concur. Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., concurs on ground last stated in opinion.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, Respts.,
v.

GEORGE GRUTZ, Appt.

(212 N. Y. 72, 105 N. E. 843)

Appeal — defect in indictment.

1. Failure of an indictment for arson to describe the dwelling or identify the person alleged to have been in it is not, in the absence of demurrer, available on appeal.

Evidence — of other arson.

2. Upon trial for arson in which defendant is alleged to have consented to procure insurance on buildings, burn them, and collect the insurance, evidence is not admissible of a fire in his own building before the conspiracy existed, and which was not started by the one who started those under the alleged conspiracy, or shown to have been connected with the one for which the indictment was found.

Same — liability for acts of agent.

3. Upon the question of the guilt of one accused of arson through the agency of another, evidence is admissible of conversations between accused and such person, tending to show a conspiracy between them to insure buildings and set them on fire to procure the insurance.

Same — separate arson.

4. Evidence of fires which had taken place from time to time under agreement between two persons to get the property insured and one to set it on fire and the other collect the insurance and to share in the proceeds is not admissible upon a trial of an indictment for causing one of the fires, if each was a separate transaction, with no relation between them in respect to time, place, or circumstances, so that the mere evidence of the origin of one would tend to prove the origin of another.

Trial — permitting statement of question to witness.

5. When a witness has denied hostility to defendant in a criminal cause, counsel for accused should be permitted to state his questions to another witness, called to prove hostility, so as to show whether or not they are within the rule admitting evidence of that character.

Evidence — opinion — origin of fire.

6. Expert testimony is not admissible

Note. — The general subject of the admissibility of evidence of other crimes in criminal cases is treated at length, and in its application to the various specific offenses, in the note to People v. Molineux, 62 L.R.A. 193. That note, so far as the offense of arson is concerned, is supplemented in the note to Fish v. United States, L.R.A. 1915A, 809. For annotation supplementing the earlier note as to various other specific offenses, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Evidence," § 295. L.R.A.1915D.

upon the question whether or not the fire which is the basis of an indictment for arson was set.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term, Part I., for New York County, convicting him of arson in the second degree. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert H. Elder, for appellant:

It was error to prove offenses other than the one mentioned in the indictment, having no necessary connection with one another, but each being an independent transaction.

Messrs. Robert S. Johnstone, Royal H. Weller, and Stanley L. Richter, with Mr. Charles S. Whitman, for respondents:

Evidence which may show the commission of crimes other than the specific one charged is not inadmissible; if there be some proper purpose for which the testimony may be received, the fact that it incidentally tends to show the commission of other crimes does not in the slightest stand in the way of its admission.

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted jointly with one Isador Stein on the charge of arson in the second degree and was convicted. At the appellate division the judgment of conviction was unanimously affirmed, and the case is now before this court on defendant's appeal.

The specification of the first count of the indictment is that the defendant and Stein, in the daytime and on the 1st day of December, 1910, did wilfully and feloniously set fire to and burn a certain dwelling house of one Sam Gold, in the borough of the Bronx, in the city of New York, in L.R.A.1915D.

which dwelling there was at the time some human being. The other two counts are simply repetitions of the first, with the exception that each names a different person as the householder in whose dwelling the fire took place. The defendant now challenges the sufficiency of the indictment on two grounds: (1) That it refers to a dwelling house, but does not state in precise terms or by description where the house was located. (2) That it states that there was some human being in the house at the time of the fire, but does not identify the person by name or otherwise. Both of these objections could have been raised by demurrer (Code Crim. Proc. § 323, subd. 2), but they were not available to the defendant at the trial or on his motion in arrest of judgment (Code Crim. Proc. § 331), and for that reason they cannot be considered on this appeal.

The case was tried for the prosecution upon the theory that the defendant and Stein had entered into a conspiracy to induce various persons to insure their household effects for the purpose of having them damaged or destroyed by fires which were to be made by Stein; and that the defendant's part in the scheme was to take care of the adjustment of the losses and the collection of the insurance moneys for a stipulated percentage, out of which he was to pay Stein for the setting of the fires. As to the fire referred to in the indictment, the two principal witnesses were Gold, the owner of the property which had been insured and burned, and Stein, who laid and started the fire. Their testimony tended to show that Gold had procured insurance upon his household goods, pursuant to an understanding with the defendant that Stein should be employed to make a fire, and that then the defendant would attend to the adjustment of the loss and the collection of the insurance. With the details of this branch of the trial we need not concern ourselves, for the judgment entered upon the verdict has been unanimously affirmed, and that imports absolute verity of everything not challenged by objection and exception.

The prosecution adduced evidence, from Stein, of nine other incendiary fires in which the defendant is said to have been implicated with Stein, and of one fire in the defendant's own premises with which Stein had no connection. All of this testimony was received by the trial court over the objections and exceptions of defendant's counsel. These exceptions are the defendant's principal reliance on this appeal, although there are others to which we shall have occasion to refer. Before we give more specific attention to the testimony of other crimes adduced by the prosecution against the defendant, it will be useful to have in mind the theory upon which its admission is sought to be justified on the one hand and condemned on the other.

It is one of the distinguishing features of our common-law system of jurisprudence that, as a general rule, a person who is on trial charged with a particular crime may not be shown to be guilty thereof by evidence showing that he has committed other crimes. The reason for this general rule has been stated by this court in a number of decisions, but never more tersely and clearly than by Judge Peckham in People v. Shea, 147 N. Y. 78, 99, 41 N. E. 505: "The impropriety of giving evidence showing that the accused had been guilty of other crimes merely for the purpose of thereby inferring his guilt of the crime for which he is on trial may be said to have been assumed and consistently maintained by the English courts ever since the common law has itself been in existence. Two antagonistic methods for the judicial investigation of crime and the conduct of criminal trials have existed for many years. One of these methods favors this kind of evidence in order that the tribunal which is engaged in the trial of the accused may have the benefit of the light to be derived from a record of his whole past life, his tendencies, his nature, his associates, his practices, and, in fine, all the facts which go to make up the life of a human being. This is the method which is pursued in France, and it is claimed that entire justice is more apt to be done where such a course is pursued than where it is omitted. The common law of England, however, has adopted another, and, so far as the party accused is concerned, a much more merciful doctrine. By that law the criminal is to be presumed innocent until his guilt is made to appear, beyond a reasonable doubt, to a jury of twelve men. In order to prove his guilt it is not permitted to show his former character or to prove his guilt of other crimes merely for the purpose of raising a presumption that he who would commit them would be more apt to commit the crime in question."

The same subject is discussed at length in People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 292, 62 L.R.A. 193, 61 N. E. 286, and more recently in People v. Dolan, 186 N. Y. 4, 116 Am. St. Rep. 521, 78 N. E. 569, 9 Ann. Cas. 453, in People v. Katz, 209 N. Y. 311, 103 N. E. 305, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 501, and in other cases. There are, however, certain recognized exceptions to this general rule which cannot be scientifically classified or enumerated, but which by common consent have long been grouped under five or six separate heads. Evidence of other crimes is, of course, always admissible when such evidence tends directly to establish the particular crime; and evidence of other crimes is usually competent to prove the specific crime when it tends to establish (1) motive, (2) intent, (3) the absence of mistake or accident, (4) a common scheme or plan embracing the commission of two or more crimes so related to each other that proof of one tends to establish the others, (5) the identity of the person charged with the commission of the crime on trial. People v. Molineux, supra. By eliminating, as inapplicable to the case at bar, the first, second, third, and fifth of these judicial engraftments upon the general rule, we come at once to the one which the district attorney invokes. He argues with much force that the evidence of other crimes in which the defendant and Stein are said to have been jointly concerned tends to prove the existence of a common plan or scheme embracing the commission of two or more crimes so related to each other that proof of any one tends to establish the commission of the others. Even if we were to concede the applicability of this rule to the case at bar, we do not find any justification for the reception of the testimony showing that there had been a fire in the house occupied by the defendant. Stein testified that he had nothing to do with that fire, and there is no evidence that it was of incendiary origin, except as that inference may be drawn from the admission of the defendant to Stein to the effect that one Titelbaum was the incendiary. That admission would, of course, be competent evidence against the defendant on a trial for the particular offense; but it was utterly irrelevant to the question whether the defendant and Stein had entered into a conspiracy which resulted in the fire charged in the indictment. According to the record there was not the remotest connection between the fire on the defendant's premises and the fire charged in the indictment or any other of the nine different fires in which Stein says the defendant was implicated. The fire in the defendant's house occurred before there was any conspiracy between the defendant and Stein, and it had no more relation to the other offenses than an assault or a theft committed by the defendant. The error in receiving this evidence was in itself so serious as to require a reversal of the judgment; but we cannot stop here, for the record discloses other equally prejudicial errors which must be avoided on another trial.

Stein testified to various conversations with the defendant which tended to establish the existence of a conspiracy between them for the making of fires in which Stein was to be the actual incendiary and the defendant was to assist in the adjustment of the losses and the collection of the insurance, while both were to receive stipulated shares of the proceeds. To the extent that this testimony was directed to the establishment of a general plan or scheme which resulted in the Gold fire charged in the indictment, it was clearly competent, and it may be stated in passing that there was evidence of this nature which was ample to support the verdict convicting the defendant. This testimony was competent because it bore directly and cogently upon the defendant's guilt of the crime charged through the criminal agency of Stein.

We have yet to consider, however, whether the evidence as to other specific fires tended to prove the felonious origin of the fire set forth in the indictment. In that connection we must not overlook the fact that each of the nine other fires was a separate and independent transaction, entered into as the occasion arose, and not in pursuance of any preconcerted general plan or design. There was between them no such relation of time, place, or circumstance that the bare evidence as to the origin of any one of these fires, in and of itself, tended to prove the origin of the Gold fire. The Ledermann fire, according to the testimony of Stein, occurred in the latter part of 1909. The time of the Greenberg, Goldberg, and Sardoff fires is not fixed. The fires of Shapiro, Wasserman, Titelbaum, and Dreier are said to have taken place respectively in April, June, July, and November of 1910. Each was the subject of a separate and distinct conversation or understanding based upon the particular occasion as it arose. None had any relation to the Gold fire, except that all are said to have sprung from the general agreement between the defendant and Stein. It is to be noted, also, that the evidence as to these other fires is quite unsatisfactory. Excepting Gold, not one of the persons whose property is said to have been damaged or destroyed by fire was called as a witness, and Stein's testimony was very uncertain as to the places where these several fires occurred. From the prejudicial nature of such evidence as was given by Stein of other separate fires in which the defendant is said to have been concerned, it is obvious that it should not have been received unless the perpetration of any or all of these acts tended, by visible connections, to prove the defendant's complicity in the crime charged in the indictment, and we think we have demonstrated that it had no such effect. Even in a case where evidence of this kind is so dubious that a court cannot clearly perceive its relevancy, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the defendant instead of permitting jurors to become prejudiced by independent facts which carry with them no proper proof of the particular crime charged. As we have already had occasion to observe, the subject is one which cannot be treated with dogmatic or scientific precision. In the final analysis the application of the general rule and its recognized exceptions must depend upon the special facts. In concluding our discussion of this branch of the case we deem it proper to add that the antithesis of the case at bar is to be found in the case of People v. Duffy, 212 N. Y. 57, L.R.A. 1915B, 103, 105 N. E. 839, in which a police officer in the city of New York was convicted of bribery. There it appeared that the accused had received from a certain individual a sum of money as a bribe. It was received under circumstances which rendered it proper, if not necessary, to give evidence of the defendant's guilty intent. It was shown, moreover, that the specific sum which the accused there received was but one of many contributions which had been regularly levied upon the proprietors of various resorts and establishments under a general plan or system. There proof of the system was cogent and competent evidence of the guilty character of the particular act. In the case at bar there was no such connection, and this is the determining difference between the two.

Since there must be a new trial, we shall consider two other minor errors in order that they may not be repeated. Aside from Stein, the principal witnesses against the defendant were Gold, Mrs. Gold, and one Roch. Defendant's counsel tried to show that these witnesses were ill-disposed toward the defendant, and on their several cross-examinations he had interrogated them as to certain hostile acts and expressions against the defendant which they either denied, or explained with some equivocations. When the defense had the case several witnesses were called by whom the defendant's counsel sought to prove the hostile expressions and acts against the defendant which the witnesses Gold, Mrs. Gold, and Roch had, on their cross-examinations, either denied or explained. The trial court ruled that this evidence was inadmissible. It is probably fair to assume that this ruling was not predicated upon the idea that evidence of this character is never admissible, but rather upon the ground that counsel's questions were inartificial or insufficient. Of this feature of the case it is enough to say that evidence of this character is generally competent, but whether it is brought within the rule governing the subject can only be decided in the light of the conditions under which the question arises. Defendant's counsel called a witness to contradict Gold as to certain hostile expressions which it is claimed the latter had made against the defendant. Before the counsel could complete his question the court ruled against him, and it is therefore not clear whether the evidence should have been received. It is plain, however, that the counsel should have been permitted to state his question to the witness.

The district attorney called as a witness one De Malignon, who was an assistant fire marshal in the city of New York. In his official capacity he had visited the Gold premises and investigated the fire. He was asked to give his opinion of the origin of the fire, and in answer he enumerated a number of facts which it was quite proper for him to state and which he stated "indicated to my mind the fire was set." The question put to this witness was shorn of much of its harmful effect by the nature of his answer, which was quite unobjectionable with the exception of the conclusion which we have quoted. This is not a case for expert opinion. The physical facts, which are the subject of investigation, are so simple that they can be readily understood when properly described, and it is then for the jury to draw the appropriate conclusion.

The judgment of conviction should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., and Hiscock and Collin, JJ., concur.

Cardozo, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the judgment about to be pronounced in this case.

It is not charged that the defendant set the fire with his own hand. It is charged that Stein did the deed and that the defendant employed him to do it. The people, therefore, were called upon to prove the existence of a criminal agency. They could not do this persuasively or even intelligibly without proving the past relations between the defendant and the man who did his bidding. The crime charged in the indictment is the firing of Gold's house. The proof is that in November, 1910, the defendant told Stein there was a job for him. The job was to make this fire. It surely is not the law that the people could not go back of that day and hour to show the criminal agency in its genesis and its development. Men do not commonly approach each other on the street and offer jobs of that kind without preface or warning. "Mr. Grutz said that he had a job for me. I asked him where the job was. And he said to me, 'You know the man.'"

The very terms in which the order was given presuppose some antecedent understanding. Its laconic phrases are equivocal, if not incredible, unless they are related back to some initial compact and some established course of dealing. The people were not required to leave the jury with the impression that suddenly, out of a clear sky, there came from the defendant the order to commit this crime. The jury had a right to know when and how and for what purposes these men had been associated in the past. Only through that knowledge could they judge of the verity of the charge that Stein, in committing this crime, was doing the defendant's bidding.

The people undertook, therefore, to exhibit the relation between the defendant and Stein in its origin and growth. The origin was in 1907, more than two years before the crime charged in this indictment. Stein, who was a painter, was employed to do some painting in the defendant's flat. A fire occurred there, and Stein was instructed by the defendant to say to the fire marshal that no one was in the house at the time. That fire was started by another man, one Titelbaum. More than a year later, in 1909, the defendant met Stein again and suggested that they work together. He said that there was money to be made in fires, and that there was no risk of detection. He referred to the fire in his own house, and said that no trouble had come of it. Thus tempted, Stein yielded. He set fire to the apartment of one Ledermann; and, afterwards, to many others. "You can go ahead," said the defendant, "and make fires, and there is money to be made here, and do not have any fear, and this is the easiest way to make money." They had entered on arson as a business. No other interpretation is possible of the words just quoted when read in the light of subsequent events. The defendant was an insurance broker. It was his part to supply the insurance policies. Stein was the workman. His part was to set the fires that would make the policies a source of profit. It is not necessary to show that the two men associated themselves as partners, in express terms, the defendant to procure the insurance, and Stein to burn the buildings as the defendant gave the word. Conspiracies are not usually formulated in that way. But the cumulative force of all their words and acts leaves no escape from the conclusion that there was a comprehensive plan between them to work in concert at the trade of arson, the defendant in command, and Stein his constant agent. The order to burn Gold's house was, therefore, not an isolated and spontaneous and sudden solicitation to crime. It was a step in the consummation of a conspiracy. It was the last act of a continuing agency, with the defendant the master and Stein the servant.

To say that the people could not prove these things, that they were cabined and confined within the bounds of this isolated transaction, is to shut out from the consideration of the jury a body of truth most plainly helpful in reaching a right judgment. Only some overmastering principle or precedent should lead us to declare that our law of evidence withdraws from the jury these aids to a sound conclusion. I am persuaded that no such principle or precedent obstructs us here.

It is a mistake to say that, in proving the course of dealing between the defendant and Stein, the people's effort was to demonstrate that, because the defendant had committed other crimes, he was the kind of man that would be likely to commit this crime. People v. Shea, 147 N. Y. 78, 41 N. E. 505; Makin v. Atty. Gen. [1894] A. C. 57, 64, 63 L. J. P. C. N. S. 41, 6 Reports, 373, 69 L. T. N. S. 778, 17 Cox, C. C. 704, 58 J. P. 148. That they had no right to do, and that they did not attempt to do. They proved the course of dealing in order to establish the origin and scope of the agency,—in a word, to establish a conspiracy; and they did not lose the right to prove this because the result was to prove that other crimes had been committed. Com. v. Scott, 123 Mass. 222, 234, 235, 25 Am. Rep. 81; Com. v. Blood, 141 Mass. 571, 575, 6 N. E. 769. The relation of agency between two men is sometimes the result of an express mandate. It is as often the product of a course of dealing. It is many times a composite of both factors. In criminal as in civil trials neither factor may be excluded. If at the first meeting between the defendant and Stein they had agreed in so many words that Stein would set fires whenever the defendant ordered them, the propriety of admitting such evidence would not, I think, be doubted by anyone. Their conversation was not so explicit; it had, therefore, to be interpreted in the light of the events that followed; and so interpreted its meaning was no longer doubtful. The scope of a conspiracy may be made out, not merely by what is said in its inception, but also by what is done in its development. Reg. v. Murphy, 8 Car. & P. 297. When we view the totality of the acts, we perceive the nexus of the common scheme. The people were not restricted to proof of an employment the day before the fire. They were not restricted to proof of an employment in and through a single conversation. They could prove earlier conversations and leave it for the jury to say whether these earlier conversations, construed in the light of what was done under them, made out a general conspiracy. It is no sufficient answer to say that the first fire in the defendant's house was started by someone else. That fire was referred to merely to explain the defendant's mention of it when employing Stein to set the fire at Ledermann's. In this there was no error, and certainly none that could have affected the result. When once it is conceded, however, that the initial conspiracy might be proved, it is impossible to uphold the conclusion that later instances of its renewal should have been omitted. If the people had the right to prove how the criminal agency began, they must have had the right to prove the perpetuation of that agency during the intervening years. If it was lawful to prove a criminal compact once, it did not become unlawful to prove that it was reaffirmed a dozen times. Indeed, it might well have been argued that a conspiracy formed in 1909 was too remote, in the absence of evidence that it was kept alive as a continuing relation. To that single end the people's evidence was directed.

It would be useless to prolong the discussion by the analysis of the cases. The leading authorities are well known. The doubt is in their application. One case, however, I may refer to as supporting my own view. It goes farther, perhaps, than we are required to go here, for there the separate crimes were not so closely welded together by proof of an agreement unifying them in their origin. It is the case of People v. McLaughlin, 2 App. Div. 419, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1005, id. 150 N. Y. 365, 44 N. E. 1017. McLaughlin, a police captain, was charged with extortion. The charge was that he had collected the money through an agent, Burns. To confirm this, the people offered evidence that Burns had acted as the defendant's agent in many similar cases, and that there was a general scheme by which, through this division of labor, they were to practise extortion in their precinct. At the appellate division it was held by a unanimous court that the evidence was proper. Williams, J., writing for the court, said (2 App. Div. 433): "The evidence here was given, not for the purpose of raising a presumption that the defendant committed this crime because he had, before this, been guilty of other crimes of a like nature. The prosecution sought to prove such agency of Burns. They could not be expected to do this by direct evidence. They must prove it, if at all, by circumstantial evidence; and this might properly be done by giving any proof that tended to establish such criminal agency, notwithstanding the evidence given also tended to prove other distinct crimes to have been committed by the defendant through the agency of Burns. The only question is whether the evidence received of these prior transactions was competent and proper as circumstantial evidence tending to establish the fact sought to be proved. The rules of evidence are the same in criminal cases as in civil cases, except as otherwise provided in the Code of Criminal Procedure (§ 392). It is common in civil cases to establish agency by showing the relations of the parties in other transactions than the one in issue in the case on trial, by showing other transactions relating to the same business and extending over months and years when the parties held the relations of principal and agent, and we see no reason why the same rule of evidence may not be applied in this case. The suggestions made by the learned trial judge in his charge upon this subject, and explaining the purpose for which this evidence was received, seem to us to have been proper and correct. The evidence given tended to show that these men occupied the same official relations to each other during the years 1888, 1889, 1890, and 1891, prior to the alleged commission of this crime, and that they were engaged in this same general scheme of extortion, Burns acting under the advice, commands, and procurement of the defendant, apparently in pursuance of such general scheme, and that the defendant, in conversations had with him, practically conceded such agency in such prior transactions. We have no doubt but that the evidence of the transactions themselves was competent in connection with the conversations so testified to, as tending to establish the agency of Burns for the defendant in the commission of the crime for which the defendant was being tried."

When the case of People v. McLaughlin, 150 N. Y. 391, 44 N. E. 1025, reached this court, it was reversed on other grounds. The opinion of Martin, J., does, it is true, contain a discussion of this subject. "The charge of the learned trial judge," he says, "seems to indicate that he entertained the opinion that what he denominated 'criminal agency' could be established in the same way, and by the same species of evidence, as may be employed in a civil action to establish the relation of principal and agent in favor of third persons. We think no such rule exists. We find no principle of criminal law which recognizes the relation of principal and agent in the sense in which the term is used in reference to business or commercial transactions. It is true that in civil actions upon contract, the course of dealing between parties may be proved to establish a general agency, but that principle has no place in criminal jurisprudence. From such evidence in civil actions a presumption is raised that the relation shown to exist in other transactions continues, or an estoppel is created which prevents the principal from denying the agency, and hence is presumptive or conclusive evidence of that fact. No such presumption or estoppel arises in a criminal case. There the presumption is of innocence, and the doctrine of estoppel has no application." (P. 391.)

A majority of the court did not concur in holding that proof of similar transactions was inadmissible in such conditions. Andrews, Ch. J., Bartlett and Vann, JJ., expressed no opinion on that point, and Gray, J., dissented. We are thus left free to reach our own conclusion, unfettered by any adverse precedent.

There is no difference between civil and criminal trials in respect of the kind of evidence available to make out a criminal agency, which is merely another word for a criminal conspiracy. The agency that will subject the employer to criminal liability must, of course, be an actual agency; i. e., the agent's authority must be actual, and not merely apparent. An agency by estoppel will not suffice. But an actual agency may be established by proof of what men have done as well as by proof of what they have said. Blake v. Albion Life Assur. Soc. L. R. 4 C. P. D. IV. 94, 109, 110, 48 L. J. C. P. N. S. 169, 40 L. T. N. S. 211, 27 Week Rep. 321, 14 Cox, C. C. 246; United States v. Cole, 5 McLean, 513, 601, Fed. Cas. No. 14,832; Martin v. Niagara Falls Paper Mfg. Co. 122 N. Y. 165, 175, 25 N. E. 303; Hanover Nat. Bank v. American Dock & Trust Co. 148 N. Y. 612, 621, 623, 51 Am. St. Rep. 721, 43 N. E. 72; Martin v. Webb, 110 U. S. 7, 28 L. ed. 49, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 428. The same kind of evidence that will tend to sustain an inference of actual agency in civil trials will tend to sustain it in criminal trials. The same kind of evidence admissible to prove conspiracy in the one instance is admissible in the other. Truth is the same whether we seek it at the civil or at the criminal bar, and it is apprehended in subjection to the same laws of logic. The criminal law is not to be treated as a thing apart and by itself. The command of the statute is that "the rules of evidence in civil cases are applicable also in criminal cases, except as otherwise provided in this Code." Code Crim. Proc. § 392.

The same rule prevails in England, and eminent judges have deplored the fact that it is sometimes overlooked. Rex v. Rodley, [1913] 3 K. B. 468, 472, 82 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1070, 109 L. T. N. S. 476, 77 J. P. 465, 29 Times L. R. 700, 58 Sol. Jo. 51. It is not an adequate answer to say that in criminal prosecutions there is the presumption of innocence. That presumption does not destroy the efficacy of circumstantial proof. In the language of the court in Dunlop v. United States, 165 U. S. 486, 502, 41 L. ed. 799, 804, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 375: "If it were broadly true that the presumption of innocence overrides every other presumption, except those of sanity and knowledge of the law, it would be impossible to convict in any case upon circumstantial evidence, since the gist of such evidence is that certain facts may be inferred or presumed from proof of other facts."

In criminal as in civil causes it is legitimate to argue back from individual acts to a scheme that underlies them. The true rule was tersely stated by Best, J., in Rex v. Burdett, 4 Barn. & Ald. 95, 121, 122: "It has been said that there is to be no presumption in criminal cases. Nothing is so dangerous as stating general abstract principles. We are not to presume without proof. We are not to imagine guilt where there is no evidence to raise the presumption. But when one or more things are proved, from which our experience enables us to ascertain that another, not proved, must have happened, we presume that it did happen as well in criminal as in civil cases. . . . If the rules of evidence prescribe the best course to get at truth, they must be and are the same in all cases, and in all civilized countries. There is scarcely a criminal case, from the highest down to the lowest, in which courts of justice do not act upon this principle."

Evidence of sufficient weight to make out an agency in civil trials may lack the weight essential to a conviction in criminal trials; but evidence is not incompetent because, standing alone, it is inadequate. "It may be that a piece of evidence admissible in either class of cases may not be sufficient in a criminal case, . . . that is, without further evidence; but the evidence is not the less admissible." Grove, J., in Reg. v. Mallory, 15 Cox, Cr. 460, quoted in Wigmore, Ev. vol. 1, § 4.

Subject to the qualification that the conclusion is to be established with greater certainty in respect of crimes, the process of inference, regardless of the subject of the controversy, remains the same. I think that the evidence of the past relations between Stein and the defendant was properly received.

Other rulings have been complained of; but, if they involve technical error, they are not sufficiently substantial to affect the justice of the verdict. Code Crim. Proc. § 542.

The judgment of conviction should be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, Appt.,

v.

JOHN THOMPSON, Respnt.

(212 N. Y. 249, 106 N. E. 78.)

Evidence — criminal prosecution — subsequent similar acts.

Upon a prosecution for statutory rape, evidence of subsequent acts of intercourse between prosecutrix and accused is admissible if they are so related by brevity of time, continuity of lewdness, or otherwise, to the principal act, as to justify the inference or indicate that the mutual disposition of the parties evidenced by them existed at the time of such act.

(July 14, 1914.)

A PPEAL by the People from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, reversing a judgment of the County Court for Kings County, convicting defendant of rape in the second degree, and granting a new trial. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward A. Freshman, with Mr. James C. Cropsey, for appellant:

There was no error in the reception of the testimony as to other similar acts.

1 Whart. Crim. Ev. 10th ed. § 42, 11th ed. § 735; People v. Grauer, 12 App. Div. 464, 42 N. Y. Supp. 721; Underhill, Crim. Ev. 2d ed. § 381; People v. Freeman, 25 App. Div. 583, 50 N. Y. Supp. 984.

Messrs. George W. Martin and David F. Price, for respondent:

Testimony of subsequent offenses to the one charged in the indictment, committed by the defendant upon the person of the complainant, was inadmissible.

Collin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape in the second degree under the provision of Penal Law, § 2010 (Consol. Laws, chap. 40): "A person who perpetrates an act of sexual intercourse with a female, not his wife, under the age of eighteen years, under circumstances not amounting to rape in the first degree, is guilty of rape in the second degree, and punishable with imprisonment for not more than ten years."

The female involved gave testimony, under her direct examination as a witness for the prosecution, in proof that the offense charged in the indictment was committed, and additionally, under the overruled objection and exception of the defendant, that subsequent to the commission of it the defendant had sexual intercourse with her four or five times. Because of the reception of this evidence the appellate division, as appears from the memorandum opinion there pronounced, reversed the conviction, holding that "the court erred in admitting testimony as to subsequent offenses by the defendant upon the person of the female involved," and granted a new trial. We do not agree with the appellate division in the view thus taken.

It is a general rule that it is error to receive evidence, as proof of the offense charged, that an accused has committed a criminal offense other than that charged in the indictment. Evidence which tends only to prove collateral facts, and has not a natural tendency to establish the fact in controversy, should be excluded, because: (a) It would have a tendency to withdraw and mislead the attention and deliberation of the jury from the real issue under inquiry; and (b) would subject the accused to charges unconnected with that issue, and against which he had no reason to prepare a defense. People v. Grutz, 212 N. Y. 72, ante, 229, 105 N. E. 843; People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 291, 62 L.R.A. 193, 61 N. E. 286; People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 427, 456, 466, 1 Am. St. Rep. 851, 14 N. E. 319; People v. McLaughlin, 150 N. Y. 365, 44 N. L.R.A.1915D.

E. 1017. This rule has, however, exceptions in those cases in which the evidence offered has a natural tendency to corroborate or supplement admitted direct evidence. People v. Duffy, 212 N. Y. 57, L.R.A. 1915B, 103, 105 N. E. 839; People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 293, 62 L.R.A. 193, 61 N. E. 286; People v. Neff, 191 N. Y. 210, 83 N. E. 970; Rex v. Bond, 21 Cox, C. C. 252; People v. Dolan, 186 N. Y. 4, 116 Am. St. Rep. 521, 78 N. E. 569, 9 Ann. Cas. 453; People v. Katz, 209 N. Y. 311, 326, 103 N. E. 305, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 501; People v. Peckens, 153 N. Y. 576, 594, 47 N. E. 883; People v. Doty, 175 N. Y. 164, 67 N. E. 303; People v. Marrin, 205 N. Y. 275, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 754, 98 N. E. 474; People v. Place, 157 N. Y. 584, 598, 52 N. E. 576; People v. Shea, 147 N. Y. 78, 99, 41 N. E. 505; Mayer v. People, 80 N. Y. 364.

And the doctrine is now well, if not universally, established that in prosecutions for adultery, seduction, statutory rape upon one under the age of consent, and incest, acts of sexual intercourse between the parties prior to the offense charged in the indictment may be given in evidence. The reason or reasons sustaining the doctrine may be apprehended by recent statements of the courts in applying it. In Director of Public Prosecutions v. Ball, 6 Crim. App. Rep. 31, 104 L. T. N. S. 48, 80 L. J. K. B. N. S. 691, [1911] A. C. 47, 75 J. P. 180, 22 Cox, C. C. 370, 27 Times L. R. 162, a case of incest, evidence tending to show acts prior to and of the character of that charged was received. The court of criminal appeal reversed the conviction on account of its reception (5 Crim. App. Rep. 238), 80 L. J. K. B. N. S. 689, [1911] A. C. 72, 104 L. T. N. S. 47, 22 Cox, C. C. 364, 55 Sol. Jo. 190, and was in turn reversed by the House of Lords [103 L. T. N. S. 738], for whom the lord chancellor said: "I consider that this evidence was clearly admissible on the issue that this crime was committed, not to prove a mens rea, as Mr. Justice Darling considered, but to establish the guilty relations between the parties, and the existence of a sexual passion between them as elements in proving that they had illicit connection in fact on or between the dates charged. Their passion for each other was as much evidence as was their presence together in the bed, of the fact that when there they had guilty relations with each other. I agree that the courts of law ought to be very careful to preserve the time-honored law of England that you cannot convict a man of one crime by proving that he has committed some other crime. That, and all other safeguards of our criminal law, will be jealously guarded, but here I think that the evidence went directly to prove the actual crime for which these persons were indicted."

In Boyd v. State, 81 Ohio St. 239, 135 Am. St. Rep. 781, 90 N. E. 355, 18 Ann. Cas. 441, a case of incest, evidence of sexual intercourse between the parties through the two months last prior to the date of the act charged was held relevant as tending to establish the particular act in controversy, because it showed the relation and familiarity of the parties, their disposition and antecedent conduct toward each other, and was corroborative of the testimony of the prosecuting witness. In State v. Schueller, 120 Minn. 26, 138 N. W. 937, a case of statutory rape, the reception of similar evidence was approved on the theory of disclosing the relationship between the parties, opportunity and inclination to commit the act complained of, and as corroborative of the specific charge. The reasoning and conclusion of such decisions have our approval.

The judicial decisions are not, however, in harmony in determining the question whether or not illicit acts subsequent to that charged are relevant and admissible in cases of the character above mentioned. While this court has not directly considered it, courts of the state have answered it in the negative. People v. Robertson, 88 App. Div. 198, 84 N. Y. Supp. 401; People v. Farina, 134 App. Div. 110, 118 N. Y. Supp. 817; People v. Bills, 129 App. Div. 798, 114 N. Y. Supp. 587. The respondent cites the case of People v. Flaherty, 162 N. Y. 532, 57 N. E. 73. It is weightless as to the question under consideration. The error found in it was that the defendant throughout the seven days of the trial was unable to ascertain which of seven offenses testified to by the complainant he was indicted and to be tried for. See also State v. Acheson, 91 Me. 240, 39 Atl. 570. In People v. Freeman, 25 App. Div. 583, 50 N. Y. Supp. 984, affirmed in 156 N. Y. 694, 50 N. E. 1120, on the opinion below, the defendant was convicted of the statutory crime of rape in the second degree, committed on January 13, 1894. Evidence of acts of a similar character between the same parties intermediate May 9 and June 11, 1894, was admitted against the objection and exception of defendant. There was no proof of familiarity or association between them within the period from January 13 to May 9, 1894. It was held that, giving full effect to the principle that subsequent acts of a similar character may show the adulterous disposition of the parties and corroborate the proof that the specific act charged was committed, the subsequent acts testified to had not such connection with or relation to the antecedent act as to show a mutually amorous disposition between the parties on January 13, 1894, the court saying: "Doubtless the extent to which such testimony may be admitted must, in a large measure, be determined by the trial judge in the exercise of a sound discretion. But there are bounds to his discretion. The evidence offered must at least have a legitimate tendency to show a lewd or adulterous disposition between the parties at or about the time when the offense is laid in the indictment." 25 App. Div. 587, 50 N. Y. Supp. 987.

The reasoning of the Freeman Case is sound and salutary. The preponderance of judicial opinion now is that acts subsequent to the act charged in the indictment (as well as those prior to it) reasonably indicating a continuity of the lascivious disposition, are relevant, subject, however, to the rule that when the admissibility of evidence depends upon collateral facts, the regular course is for the trial judge to pass upon the fact in the first instance, and then, if he admits the evidence, to instruct the jury as to its purpose and effect, and to exclude it if they should be of a different opinion on the preliminary matter. The question for the jury throughout the trial is, Is the defendant guilty of the specific offense charged in the indictment? But when that offense involves illicit sexual intercourse by consent, subsequent offenses of like character between the parties may be relevant, because the extreme intimacy and the amorous inclination and willingness evidenced by its commission are a growth preceding the offense, and are rather nourished than annihilated by their exercise. They do not suddenly arise and are not likely to suddenly disappear; hence it is that their indulgence prior or subsequent to the specific occasion charged may tend to increase and strengthen the proof as to that occasion. The acts offered as corroborative may be so remote as to be irrelevant. Remoteness, however, does not necessarily result from mere lapse of time, which is not necessarily an element of it. Its essence is such a want of open and visible connection between the evidentiary and the principal facts that, all things considered, the former are not worthy or safe to be admitted in proof of the latter. If those acts are of a character or were done under conditions not tending to prove the illicit desire and willingness at the time of the offense charged, they should be rejected by the trial judge. If, on the other hand, he deems them so related, by brevity of time or continuity of lewdness or otherwise, to the principal act as to justify the inference or as to indicate that the mutual disposition of the parties evidenced by them existed at the time of it, they should be received and submitted to the jury under the proper charge. The question of remoteness, to be decided in the first instance by the trial judge, as already stated, must depend upon all the considerations, including time, the character of the evidence, and all the surrounding circumstances which in his opinion ought to have a bearing upon its worthiness to be brought into the consideration and determination of the matter in contention. State v. Kelly, 77 Conn. 266, 58 Atl. 705. Upon principle and under the best-reasoned judicial decisions, the ruling of the trial court under review was correct. Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 111, 100 Am. Dec. 110; Sullivan v. Hurley, 147 Mass. 387, 18 N. E. 3; Taft v. Taft, 80 Vt. 256, 130 Am. St. Rep. 984, 67 Atl. 703, 12 Ann. Cas. 959; State v. Sebastian, 81 Conn. 1, 69 Atl. 1054; State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 202, 24 Am. Rep. 124; State v. Williams, 76 Me. 480; People v. Gray, 251 Ill. 431, 96 N. E. 268; State v. More, 115 Iowa, 178, 88 N. W. 322; State v. Leek, 152 Iowa, 12, 130 N. W. 1062; People v. Kollér, 142 Cal. 621, 76 Pac. 500; State v. Markins, 95 Ind. 464, 48 Am. Rep. 733; State v. Hibbard, 76 Kan. 376, 92 Pac. 304; Lamphere v. State, 114 Wis. 193, 89 N. W. 128; Leedom v. State, 81 Neb. 585, 116 N. W. 496; Sykes v. State, 112 Tenn. 572, 105 Am. St. Rep. 972, 82 S. W. 185; *State v. A scrutiny of the record and briefs discloses no other exception which requires consideration in this opinion.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the judgment of conviction affirmed.

MRS. JOSEPHINE I. LUMMUS, Appt.,
v.
FIREMEN'S FUND INSURANCE COMPANY.

(167 N. C. 654, 83 S. E. 688.)

Insurance — change of location of property — materiality.

1. The permanent removal of an automobile from one garage, where it was insured, to another, is not such an immaterial breach of warranty that the policy will not be avoided thereby.

Same — removal of property — placing in repair shop.

2. A policy on an automobile to be kept in a specified private garage with the privilege of operating the car and housing it temporarily in other places while en route or being cleaned or repaired, which has been suspended by the permanent removal of the car to another state, is not restored by temporarily placing the car in a repair shop without returning it to the place specified in the policy, so as to render the insurer liable for its destruction while in such shop.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Mecklenburg County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of insurance issued by defendant on plaintiff's automobile. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Keerans and J. W. Hutchison, for appellant:

The removal of the car without the assent or knowledge of the company operated as a suspension of the policy during the period of the violation, and the policy did not ipso facto become void; at the time of the fire, the car being in a place where it had a right to be under the terms of the policy, and therefore being lawfully within the exception of the private garage warranty, the policy revived, or again attached, the moment it was placed in the plant of the Gibbes Machinery Company, and so was in full force and effect at the time of the fire.

Messrs. Smith, Hammond, & Smith and Osborne, Cocke, & Robinson for appellee.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover on a policy of insurance issued by the defendant upon an automobile. The defendant pleads:

70, and Patterson v. Standard Acci. Ins. Co. 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 583.

It will be noticed that the provision involved in LUMMUS v. FIREMEN'S FUND INS. Co. gave the insured permission to house his car in any other building than the private garage named as its permanent place of storage, for a period of fifteen days at any one location at any one time, provided the car was en route visiting, or being cleaned or repaired. A removal of the car not protected by this provision would either have the effect of absolutely avoiding the risk, or of suspending it during the continuance of the breach. The decision under the facts in the LUMMUS CASE would be the same under either of these constructions.

It is true that in some cases involving policies providing for the avoidance of the risk in case of a breach of certain warranties or conditions, a recovery has been allowed although a breach of these warranties or conditions has occurred, where the breach had ceased before a loss happened. For example, see National F. Ins. Co. v. Catlin, 163 Ill. 256, 35 L.R.A. 595, 45 N. E. 255; Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 379, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300, 81 N. W. 676; Ring v. Phenix Assur. Co. 145 Mass. 426, 14 N. E. 525; German Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fox, 4 Neb. (Unof.) 833, 63 L.R.A. 334, 96 N. W. 652; Laselle v. Hoboken F. Ins. Co. 43 N. J. L. 468. These cases, however, are obviously distinguishable from one where the breach of warranty continued up L.R.A.1915D.

First, that the action was not brought within one year; second, that there was a breach of the private garage warranty; and, third, that proof of loss was not filed within sixty days. It is only necessary that we should consider the second defense.

The policy contains this provision:

"Private garage warranty.

"In consideration of the reduced rate at which this policy is written, it is understood that the property insured hereunder shall at all times be kept or stored in the private garage or private stable, situate in rear of residence No. 1412 Third avenue, Columbus, Georgia. Privilege, however, to operate car and to house in any other building or buildings for a period of not exceeding fifteen days at any one location at any one time, providing the car is en route visiting, or being cleaned or repaired."

It appears from the statement of facts that after the said policy of insurance was issued and delivered, and without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, the plaintiff, during the month of June, 1911, removed said automobile from the private garage or private stable in the rear of residence No. 1412 Third avenue, Columbus, to the time of loss, as appears in the LUMMUS CASE.

In that case the automobile had been permanently removed from the private garage, and was destroyed while temporarily in a shop for repairs. Under the policy it was insured while at a certain base, i. e., the private garage, with certain incidental privileges so long as it was kept at that base. A permanent change of the base nullified the policy, except as a return to the former base might have revived its operation, but the mere claiming of the incidental privileges (in the instant case the privilege to leave it in a shop for repairs), in connection with the substituted base, would not revive the policy and authorize a recovery for the destruction of the machine while it was undergoing repairs.

These privileges were incidental, i. e., privileges which were to be allowed only while the automobile was kept at the private garage, and were not privileges which were allowed while it was kept elsewhere. This being true, and there having been no return to the original base before the fire, it is clear that, although the policy might only have been suspended, and not absolutely avoided, by reason of the breach, yet no recovery could be had, since the breach was not terminated by reason of the car having been in a repair shop at the time of the loss, but actually continued up to the time the loss occurred. No other case dealing with a similar provision has been disclosed.

J. T. W.

Georgia, to Charlotte, North Carolina, where it remained for a period of five or six months, until it was placed in the machine shop of the Gibbs Machinery Company in Columbia, South Carolina, as hereinafter mentioned. That said automobile, while in Charlotte, North Carolina, for the period above mentioned, was not en route from Columbus, Georgia, nor was it visiting, nor being cleaned or repaired, but, on the contrary, its removal from the location aforesaid in Columbus, Georgia, was permanent. That on ——— December, 1911, the plaintiff placed said automobile in the machine shop of the Gibbs Machinery Company of Columbia, South Carolina, to be painted and repaired. That the said automobile remained in the said machine shop of the Gibbs Machinery Company at Columbia, South Carolina, until the 10th of January, 1912, when it was destroyed by fire which originated in said machine shop.

The contention of the defendant is that the policy became forfeited because of this breach of the private garage warranty. The plaintiff contends that the breach of warranty was immaterial, because it in no way contributed to the loss, citing Revisal, § 4808. This position is untenable. In construing that section, this court has held that, in application for a policy of insurance, every fact stated will be deemed material which would materially influence the judgment of an insurance company, either in accepting the risk or in fixing the rate of premium. Bryant v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 147 N. C. 181, 60 S. E. 983. It is further held in the same case that it is not necessary, in order to defeat a recovery upon such policy of insurance, that a material misrepresentation by the applicant must be shown to have contributed in some way to the loss for which indemnity is claimed. See also Fishplate v. Fidelity & C. Co. 140 N. C. 589, 53 S. E. 354.

Nothing is better settled than that the location of the property insured is essentially material in contracts of insurance, and enters largely into the consideration of the company in fixing the rate of premium. The clause of the policy in this case, containing this warranty, expressly declares that a reduced rate of premium is granted because of the insertion of this provision in the contract. The contention of the plaintiff that the policy could remain dormant for six months, and then be revived suddenly because the property was burned up in a repair shop, is utterly untenable.

When the owner took the automobile away from the garage in Columbus, it was not for a temporary purpose. There was a removal of the property permanently to another state, which, under the provisions of L.R.A.1915D.

the policy which we have cited, rendered the contract of insurance void.

The judgment of the Superior Court is affirmed.

STATE OF OHIO.

(— Ohio St. —, 107 N. E. 335.)

Burglary — breaking — force necessary.

Where any force, however slight, is required to effect an entrance into a building through a doorway partly open, such act constitutes a forcible breaking under § 12,438, Gen. Code.

(April 21, 1914.)

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for Clinton County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas convicting defendants of maliciously and forcibly breaking and entering a certain building, and overruling their motion for new trial. Affirmed.

Statement by Newman, J.:

At the January term, 1913, of the court of common pleas of Clinton county, plaintiffs in error were indicted, under § 12,438, Gen. Code, for maliciously and forcibly breaking and entering in the night season a certain building, namely, a certain chicken house, the property of one Mary Linton, and stealing therefrom chickens of the value of $15, the property of said Mary Linton. A trial to a jury was had, and plaintiffs in error were found guilty as charged in the indictment. A motion for a new trial was overruled, sentence pronounced, and judgment entered. This judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals, and plaintiffs in error here seek a reversal of the judgment below, and ask for their discharge.

Messrs. Hayes & Hayes for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Joe T. Doan for the State.

from the chicken house was through a doorway of ordinary size. On the evening before the chickens were stolen the door of the chicken house, which was hung upon hinges, was open about 15 or 18 inches, being held open by means of a fence post placed on one side thereof and a brick on the other side. The owner of the property, Mary Linton, testified that the door had been propped open in that way, "just so that the chickens and myself could pass in and out." She stated that the door was not open wide enough to permit her to walk in—she "had to take hold of the edge of the door and then pull around the corner." It appears from the evidence that the morning after the chickens were stolen the door was from one half to two thirds open, and the fence post and brick were moved out of place.

That the chicken house was entered by plaintiffs in error and chickens of the value of $15 were stolen by them is not controverted. Counsel insist, however, that the crime of burglary was not established, that there was no evidence tending to show that there was a forcible breaking and entering of the chicken house, and that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury two certain special instructions, requested by them to be given before argument. These instructions are as follows:

"If the jury find from the evidence that the building charged in the indictment to have been forcibly, feloniously, and burglariously broken and entered was a chicken house, and if the mode of ingress to and egress from was through a common sized door hung upon hinges, and that the said door was so adjusted that it was left open, or partly open, so that the owner and the chickens could pass in and out, and you further find that said door was in that condition at the time when it is claimed that it was broken and entered, as charged in the indictment, then I charge you that your verdict should be not guilty of breaking and entering said building."

"If the jury find from the evidence that the building in question was a chicken house, and that the only mode of ingress to and egress from said chicken house was through a common sized door hung upon hinges, and a brick or piece of brick was so placed between the sill of said building and said door as to leave said door open for a space of from 15 to 18 inches, and that upon the outside of said door there was placed upon the ground a piece of fence post to prevent the door from swinging wide open, and that through the space thus left the owner could pass into and from said building, and that said door was in that condition at the time it is charged

it was broken and entered, then I charge you that your verdict must be not guilty of breaking and entering said building."

The objection to these instructions is that there is an assumption that the door was open sufficiently wide so that any person might pass in and out of the chicken house. This was a question for the jury, and, in view of the fact that the fence post and brick were moved, and the door was found to be from one half to two thirds open after the chickens were stolen, the jury was justified in finding that the opening was not large enough to admit plaintiffs in error, and that it was necessary to move the obstacles which had been placed against the door to hold it in position before they could gain an entrance to the house.

The court, in its general charge, properly instructed the jury that if it found from the evidence that the door of the chicken house was partly open, so that a person or persons could enter the same, and it was not necessary to remove the brick or post that had been placed against the door to hold it in that position when making an entrance, then that would not constitute a forcible breaking in the sense the statute uses the term.

The court further instructed the jury that if it found that the door was partly open, and it was necessary to remove the post or brick placed against it to hold it in the position in which it was, and that the entrance could not have been made into the building without the removal of the brick or post, and that if the brick or post was so removed by plaintiffs in error, or either of them, and an entrance made into the chicken house, then this would constitute a forcible breaking. We are of the opinion that the court charged correctly on this proposition.

Counsel rely upon the following statement in the opinion in Timmons v. State, 34 Ohio St. 426, 32 Am. Rep. 376: "The law on the point is, that if the owner leaves his doors open, or partly open, or his windows raised, or partly raised and unfastened, it will be such negligence or folly on his part as is calculated to induce or tempt a stranger to enter; and if he does so through the open door or window, or by pushing open the partly opened door, or further raising the window that is a little up, it will not be burglary."

This doctrine, as was stated by the judge delivering the opinion, had no application in that case, and, as we view it, was clearly obiter. We are aware, however, that it is the holding in a number of cases that where a door or window is partly open and an entrance is gained by pushing open the partly open door or further raising the window it is not a breaking, and will not constitute burglary. This rule finds favor with the English authorities, with the courts of Massachusetts, and is approved by some text writers. But there is a tendency on the part of a number of courts to depart from the strict construction of the common law, which required an actual breaking. They have adopted what we consider to be the more reasonable and logical rule, holding that but the slightest force is necessary to constitute a breaking. If any force at all is necessary to effect an entrance into a building through any place of ingress, usual or unusual, whether open, partly open, or closed, such entrance is a breaking sufficient in law to constitute burglary, if the other elements of the offense are present. People v. White, 153 Mich. 617, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1102, 117 N. W. 161, 15 Ann. Cas. 927; Claiborne v. State, 113 Tenn. 261, 68 L.R.A. 859, 106 Am. St. Rep. 833, 83 S. W. 352; and the cases cited in note to State v. Vierck, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1040.

In the common-law definition of burglary the word "forcibly" is not used in connection with the word "break," nor does it appear in the statutes of some of the states whose courts have adopted the rule to which we subscribe. It is used in the Ohio statute, but, as was stated in Ducher v. State, 18 Ohio, 308, the offense is not changed by the statute which adds the word "forcibly" as a qualifying term. And in Timmons v. State, supra, the court say that the application of the rule does not depend upon the degree of force used, but upon the fact that force of some degree, however slight, was used. In that case the court held: "The force necessary to push open a closed, but unfastened, transom, that swings horizontally on hinges over an outer door of a dwelling house, is sufficient to constitute a breaking in burglary under our statute, which requires a forcible breaking."

We think, as was said by the court in Claiborne v. State, 113 Tenn. 261, 68 L.R.A. 859, 106 Am. St. Rep. 833, 83 S. W. 352, that to hold that the opening of a door or window which is closed but not fastened is sufficient evidence of breaking, but that the further opening of a door or window partly open, in order to gain an entrance, is not sufficient evidence, is a useless refinement.

In the case under consideration, if the door of the chicken house was further opened, in order to make the opening sufficiently wide to admit the plaintiffs in error (and this was a question for the jury), unquestionably some force was required, and, however slight it may have been, it was all that was required to constitute a "forcible breaking" under the statute; and, taken with the other facts established, made a case of burglary. The trial court, therefore, properly refused to direct a verdict of not guilty, and committed no error in refusing to give the two special instructions requested.

As to the alleged error,—the refusal of the court to adjourn the hearing of the case and permit defendants below to recall the prosecuting witness for further examination,—it is sufficient to say that the request was properly refused for the reasons given by the trial court.

There being no error in the record prejudicial to plaintiffs in error, the judgment of the court of appeals is affirmed.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF MUSKOGEE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

WILLIAM L. MILLER.

(— Okla. —, 145 Pac. 782.)

Municipal corporation — duty as to streets.

1. It is the duty of a municipal corporation to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for ordinary travel by the public.

Highway — obstruction — fright of horse — effect.

2. Where a person is riding upon a well-broken horse ordinarily sure of foot, not at an unusual speed, and such animal, without fault on the part of the rider, becomes frightened and temporarily unmanageable, and, by reason of coming in contact with a defect in a street negligently created or permitted to remain therein by a city, falls and injures such rider, the municipality is liable therefor.

Headnotes by BLEAKMORE, J.

Note. — Liability of municipality for injury to person or property of one driving over defective highway where his horse is frightened without fault of either party.

This note is supplementary to notes to Denver v. Utzler, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 77, and Harrodsburg v. Abraham, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 199.

As to what may be deemed to be the proximate cause of injuries following a runaway, see note to Collins v. West Jersey Exp. Co. 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 373.

The earlier notes show that while there is a conflict, the great majority of the cases support the rule that where two causes com-

ERROR to the District Court of Muskogee County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. V. O'Hare and J. C. Davis for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Thomas H. Owen and Joseph C. Stone, for defendant in error:

The city must keep the street "reasonably safe for ordinary travel throughout its entire width, and free from all dangerous holes and obstructions."

Fairfax v. Giraud, 35 Okla. 659, 131 Pac. 159, 5 N. C. C. A. 428; Guthrie v. Swan, 5 Okla. 779, 51 Pac. 562, 3 Am. Neg. Rep.

bine to produce the injury, both of which are in their nature proximate, the one being a defect in the highway, for which the city is liable, and the other the swerving or running away of a horse, for which neither party is responsible, then the corporation is liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for the defect in the highway.

The following cases also, as does MUSKOGEE v. MILLER, support this rule:

In Lannon v. Chicago, 159 Ill. App. 595, there was a dispute as to whether the wagon in which plaintiff was riding was overturned by running into a hole in a city street; but the court said that if it was, the city would be liable even if the horse were running away at the time.

So in Stedman v. Osceola, 71 Misc. 186, 128 N. Y. Supp. 341, where road repairers had left an accumulation of sods in the middle of the traveled roadway, and piles of stone along where the wheel tracks would naturally come, the city was held liable where plaintiff caught her foot in one of the piles and was dragged over the stones, when the horse which she was leading started up in fright at a passing vehicle, the stone piles being an efficient proximate cause of the accident, concurring with the frightened horse, and without which the accident would not have occurred. In arriving at this conclusion the court stated that in case of two concurring causes each of which is proximate, the test is, Could the accident have happened without their co-operation? Here there were two concurring proximate causes each of them an efficient cause; namely, the frightened horse, for which the town could not in any event be said to be liable; and, second, the obstructing stone piles left by the road repairers, for which the town might be liable. While the jury found the town negligent in failing to maintain at the point in question a road of reasonable width, and in a reasonably safe and proper condition, for public travel, the court observed that if the only criticism of the road was its width, it would be compelled to hold that, in view of the little travel upon the highway and the sparsely settled condition of the adjacent country, the road was a reasonably proper one, and for the public a reasonably safe and suitable road for travel.

Strikingly similar to the Stedman Case, supra, is Thompson v. Bath, 142 App. Div. 331, 126 N. Y. Supp. 1074, where plaintiff was injured when a blind-folded unruly cow which he was leading across a bridge bolted, stepped on the end of a loose board, and fell over the side into the creek, plaintiff falling into the hole made by the tilting of the board. There were no barriers on the side of the bridge, and a loose plank projected beyond the outside stringer. The town was held liable, the defective condition of the bridge, particularly with respect to the loose plank, and not the cow, being held the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. McLennan, P. J., dissented from the above ruling on the ground that part of the bridge (10 or 12 feet in the center) reserved for travel was in a perfectly safe condition, and that the defendant was not guilty of negligence because it failed to make such bridge safe for the passage of unruly or blind-folded cows, stating that where a town provides a driveway across such bridge of sufficient width to accommodate the public in its ordinary use, it discharges its full duty, and it is not required to construct and maintain a bridge with a tight floor extending across its entire width, and so as to prevent from accident an unruly horse or cow in case it suddenly goes outside of the usually traveled way across such bridge.

So, where one was driving an ordinarily gentle horse along a highway the traveled portion of which was 22 feet wide, smooth, and level with the top of a retaining wall unprotected by a barrier of any kind, it was held in Sims v. Williamsburg Twp. 92 Kan. 636, 141 Pac. 581, that the defect (absence of barrier to check or restrain frightened horses from going over the wall) in the highway was the proximate cause of injury suffered by the plaintiff when the horse which he was driving became suddenly frightened at an approaching automobile and backed over the wall. The court

Where a horse receives his initial fright on account of the defect or an obstruction in the street negligently left there by a municipality, the city will be held liable for the injuries resulting from contact of the rider or driver with obstructions or holes in the streets.

Bleakmore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents error from the district court of Muskogee county, and is an action brought by the defendant in error against the city of Muskogee for damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of being thrown from his horse on a public street of the defendant city, resulting in a judgment in his favor in the sum of $2,500, from which the city appeals. The parties will be referred to here as they appeared in the court below:

Plaintiff alleged: "That Market street is stated that it was a question of fact for the jury, and not a question of law for the court, whether or not a highway with a stone retaining wall along the side next to a steep creek bank was defective for want of a barrier of some kind to check or restrain frightened horses from going over the wall. The court also observed that the conditions being such that injury to users of the highway was reasonably and naturally to be anticipated, actual knowledge of the conditions, obtained by the township trustee by personal observation while repairing the road, constituted notice of defect.

Criticisms of the statement of facts contained in the original opinion of Sims v. Williamsburg Twp. supra, were examined and shown to be without merit in 92 Kan. 832, 141 Pac. 1132.

A case stated to govern the Sims Case, supra, is Mosier v. Butler County, 82 Kan. 708, 109 Pac. 162, where a defective railing along the approach to a bridge was held to be the proximate cause of injuries to plaintiff, sustained when his horse took fright at a pile of stone at the side of the highway and backed some distance against one of the guard rails which gave way with the result that plaintiff's vehicle, with its occupant, was thrown to the roadway a distance of about 20 feet. It was contended in this case that the defective condition of the bridge was not the proximate cause of the injury, for the reason that the horse was frightened at the pile of stone in the highway. In support of this the defendant relied upon the well-known principle that if two distinct causes are successive and unrelated in their operation, one of them must be the proximate and the other the remote cause. But the court observed that the principle had no application, because it was obvious that the two causes were related in their operation. Notwithstanding the frightening of the horse, the injury would not have resulted if the guard rail had not been defective. One reason why guard rails were necessary was the liability that horses might be frightened while on this part of the bridge, resulting in just such accidents.

So, where a horse took fright at a stalled automobile in the highway, and jumped over the side of a culvert, sustaining injuries, the absence of a guard rail upon the side of the culvert was in Maynard v. Westfield, 87 Vt. 532, 90 Atl. 504, held to be the proximate cause of the accident, rendering the town liable. Whether a railing at this culvert was required was a question for the jury, the determination of the question depending upon a variety of circumstances,—its length, the width of the road, the character and topography of the surroundings, the amount and kind of travel,—which were of such a character that reasonable men might differ in their views thereof. In this case both the horse plaintiff was driving and the one that was injured, which he was leading behind his carriage, were more or less afraid of automobiles; the road at the place of the accident was level and 29 feet wide, although the graveled portion was only 18 feet in width; there was plenty of room to pass the automobile, and two men with it offered their assistance, which plaintiff declined; plaintiff was thoroughly acquainted with the road and knew that there was no railing there. It was necessary for plaintiff to show that he was at the time in the exercise of due care; and this question was properly submitted to the jury. The fact that he knew all about the situation presented, and must have appreciated its dangers, did not as matter of law require him to stop there until the dangers were removed. Without forfeiting his rights as a traveler he could drive on as he did, provided the danger was not of such a character that no prudent man would encounter it; and provided, also, in doing so, he exercised the care and prudence of a prudent man. The court states that the statute giving the state control in the construction of state roads does not relieve a town, through which it passes, of its statutory liability for injuries thereon.

one of the public streets of the said city of Muskogee, and that it is, and has been at all the times herein mentioned, the duty of said city to keep its streets in a safe condition for travel. That in violation of its duty as aforesaid, on about the 25th day of April, 1910, and for a long time prior thereto, the said city knowingly permitted a large hole, or excavation, of the width of about 10 feet, of the length of about 30 feet, and of the depth of about 2 feet, to be made and to exist on said Market street beginning about 30 feet north of Fourth street, and extending thence north, which hole or excavation was, during all of said times, full of mud and bricks, and large slick rocks, which bricks and rocks had been negligently placed in said hole by the said defendant. That on or about the 25th day of April, 1910, and for a long time prior thereto, the said city of Muskogee negligently, and with the full knowledge of the existence thereof, permitted said hole so filled with mud and bricks and rocks to remain there in the open street without placing around or in the same any safeguard or railing to give notice of the said excavation and to protect persons who might be traveling upon said street from falling upon or into said hole, and thereby being injured, though there was grave and evident danger of said injuries. That some of said rocks were about 18 inches long and 12 inches wide, and the same had smooth surfaces and were so placed and allowed to remain in said mudhole that horses could not safely pass over the same in said street in the usual course of travel. That the plaintiff did not know, and could not have known by reasonable diligence, that said brick and rocks were in said mudhole, nor did he know, nor could he have known by ordinary diligence, that the said Market street at that point was unsafe for travel, but all of these facts were fully known to the defendant. That on or about the 25th day of April, 1910, the plaintiff was lawfully riding a horse, upon which he was seated, along and over said Market street, at and near said mudhole, and without being able to see the danger of the same, and without negligence, and in the use of due

So the absence of a railing was in McInnes v. Egremont Twp. 5 Ont. L. Rep. 713, held to be the proximate cause of an accident rendering a township liable to plaintiff for injuries sustained when he was driving across a bridge at night during a thunder storm, and a flash of lightning caused his horse to shy off the bridge, carrying him and the carriage with it into the water beneath, the thunderstorm being one of those ordinary dangers which ought to have been provided against by supplying the bridge with railings.

But the playful actions of a colt in crowding its mate off from the traveled way, and not the lack of barriers, was in Irwin v. Byron Twp. — Mich. —, 149 N. W. 980, held to be the proximate cause of injury to plaintiff by being thrown out of his wagon at a point in the highway 210 feet from the bottom of a long steep hill, and where the roadbed was 14 feet wide for a distance of 30 feet; the court stating as a matter of law that where the wrought portion of the highway is 14 feet wide, and where one can drive with reasonable safety for 30 feet at right angles therefrom before reaching a place of danger, the highway is reasonably safe and fit for public travel without the protection of barriers. In this case the colt was not frightened at anything.

Generally, as to what injuries may be deemed to be proximately caused by the absence of a guard rail in a highway, see note to Lyons v. Watt, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1135.

And in connection with the note just referred to, see Thurbron v. Dravo Contracting Co. 238 Pa. 443, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 699, 86 Atl. 292, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 252, where it is held that one who having contracted to remove a bridge spanning a river in a municipality fails to place a proper barrier in the highway upon the river bank, is not liable for injury to horses which plunge over the embankment when running away, after having escaped from control, since his negligence is not the proximate cause of the injury.

Both the Sims Case and the Mosier Case, supra, distinguished Eberhardt v. Glasgow Mut. Teleph. Asso. 91 Kan. 763, 139 Pac. 416. That was a decision—not strictly within the scope of this note—in which a mutual telephone company placed in the highway, practically upon the north line, a telephone pole, to which was attached a guy wire, which extended diagonally into the highway, and 4 feet and 4 inches from such pole was attached to a brace driven into the ground, the highway was 44 feet wide and the traveled portion 30 feet wide, the space north of the traveled portion in which the wire was anchored was some 6 inches higher and was not mowed, but was covered with grass and weed; the plaintiff was riding in a wagon with her husband, who was driving a span of mules, which had tried to run away at previous times; meeting an automobile some 20 rods east of the pole and wire, the mules took fright and, veering to the right of the traveled way, ran the wagon against the pole or wire,—probably the latter,—throwing the plaintiff out and injuring her. It was held that the telephone company was not negligent in locating the pole where it was, and, whether negligent or not in respect to the wire, it was not liable, for the reason that the wire was not the proximate cause of the injury, or one which might reasonably have been expected to cause such injury. J. D. C.

care upon the part of the plaintiff, and in the course of ordinary travel upon said street, the horse upon which the plaintiff was riding stepped in said mudhole and upon said stones and bricks which had been worn smooth, and dangerous to travel, and the said horse stepped upon said stones and bricks and fell in said mudhole and upon said rocks and bricks solely on account of said unsafe condition, and in falling the plaintiff's left leg was caught between the body of said horse and said stones, both bones thereof were crushed and broken at a point about 3 inches above his ankle, and his said leg was thereby greatly and permanently injured, and he was on that account for a long time sick, and has ever since been in great pain and in mental anguish," etc.

Defendant assigns as error: (1) Overruling the motion for a new trial; (2) admitting evidence on the part of plaintiff; (3) refusing to direct a verdict for defendant; (4) entering judgment for the plaintiff; and (5) refusing to give the following instruction to the jury: "You are instructed that the matter of improving and maintaining given parts of a street set aside for public use pertains to the discretion of the legislative department of a city. There may be streets or parts of streets in a city which are not absolutely necessary for the convenience of the public, and which will be brought into use by the growth of the city; and there may be circumstances where it is not necessary to improve the width of streets for the requirement of travel. All that is required in such cases is that the city see that a sufficient part of the street required for use shall be in a reasonably safe condition for the convenience of travel. And if in this case you find that the street was safe and in good order in sufficient width to have been traveled by the plaintiff with ordinary care and prudence, no damage occasioned by the plaintiff's horse becoming frightened and getting outside of the usual traveled portion of the street to the spot where the accident took place can be recovered against the defendant."

The evidence disclosed that plaintiff, a policeman, was injured while riding a horse along Market street, a public street of the defendant city; that, in response to a call for an officer, he was proceeding upon a route that he considered the most direct to the place to which he had been called; that, after he had entered Market street traveling at a gallop, he met a wagon covered with a sheet or tarpaulin, which he designated as an asphalt wagon, moving toward him upon a crooked or zigzag pathway through said street; that he was unacquainted with the condition of said street at the time he entered upon the same; but that there was a hole or space some 40 feet long and 30 feet wide in said street which had been partially filled with rocks of various sizes and dimensions that were protruding from the surface; that as he approached the same the horse upon which he was riding shied at the rocks and again shied at the fluttering cover upon the asphalt wagon, and jumped among and upon said rocks, which caused it to fall with and injure plaintiff. The undisputed evidence is that the horse upon which plaintiff was riding was a well-broken animal and ordinarily sure of foot.

Plaintiff's testimony is as follows:

A. The place was between Altamont and Fourth street, and there has been a big mudhole, and someone had filled it up with rocks, and left only a zigzag path for a wagon to go through, and on the north side there was a place where a footman went through, and as I went down there I turned off Fourth street on Market, and there was an asphalt wagon with a sheet over it to the left, and in the same track I was, and I was galloping along, and I saw that I couldn't go through there, and turned to go to the footman's path, and tried to check up my horse, and he was fractious, and as he jumped he struck the pile of rocks and fell, and, as I saw him fall, I got my feet out of the stirrups.

A. I ran my horse around and tried to go through where the abutment was, and when the horse saw those rocks he turned and shied, and that is why he fell.

After plaintiff had testified that he had gone 30 or 40 feet upon Market street, he was asked and answered the following questions:

Q. When you turned and got 30 or 40 feet away, you saw the condition of the street well?

A. Yes, sir; when I got on it.

Q. And you saw the only safe place was to go on the north side, the extreme north side of the little path?

A. Yes, sir.

And again:

Q. When you looked ahead and discovered this unsafe condition, you discovered the path to the right?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You looked at that, and that looked safe?

A. Yes, sir; to me.

Q. And you undertook to go around that traveled path?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that in the street?

A. At the edge of the street.

The street commissioner of the city testified, upon cross-examination:

Q. State to the jury what was the condition of that street?

A. There had been a number of loads of rock dumped promiscuously into the street.

Q. How much of a space would it leave for people to pass?

A. Just a very narrow driveway.

Q. Plenty of room for a person to ride along?

A. Yes, sir; plenty of room to drive through single file.

Q. That street was used continuously?

A. Every day or so.

Q. People passed around there without any trouble?

A. Yes sir; every day I suppose. Had a very narrow driveway to pass through.

The evidence disclosed that the street had remained in the condition above described, for about a year prior to the injury.

It is urged by defendant that the defect in the street was not the proximate cause of the injury; and that the same would not have occurred had plaintiff not lost control of the horse upon which he was riding when it became frightened at the cover of the moving wagon upon such street. It is also the contention of defendant that it was not bound to keep the entire width of the street in repair.

The rule established in this state is that, when a city has opened or dedicated to the use of the public a street, it is incumbent upon it to keep the entire width of such street in a reasonably safe condition for ordinary travel. Stillwater v. Swisher, 18 Okla. 585, 85 Pac. 1110. And the general rule, deduced from the various authorities, is that a city may in the exercise of its municipal powers provide that only a certain portion of a street shall be improved and used for public travel; but that, where it does so provide. (if the entire street is apparently appropriated to the public use), then that certain portion must be in some manner specifically designated and defined so as not to mislead a member of the traveling public into the use of other dangerous portions to his injury. Where the entire thoroughfare is opened with nothing to indicate the purpose of the city to restrict the use thereof to a particular portion, it is the duty of the city to keep the whole in a reasonably safe condition for ordinary public travel; and a mere "zigzag" roadway through a space, covered by a number of loads of rock dumped promiscuously into the street, only wide enough to accommodate a single vehicle, does not meet the requirement of the law.

Opening a street or permitting it to remain open through its entire width is an invitation on the part of a municipal corporation to the public to use the same for customary travel; and an individual using such street in the ordinary way has a right to presume that he may go thereon free from any save the usual hazards of travel. If he is exercising ordinary and reasonable care for his own safety, he may assume that the municipality has done likewise; and if, as in the instant case, he is using such street in pursuit of his lawful occupation, riding upon a well-broken horse ordinarily sure of foot, at not an unusual speed, and such animal, without fault upon the part of his rider, becomes frightened and temporarily unmanageable, and, by reason of coming in contact with an obstruction or a defect in a street negligently created or permitted to remain therein by a city, falls and injures such rider, the municipality is liable therefor.

"It is clear that if a horse of ordinary gentleness merely shies or swerves to one side so that the driver does not in reality lose control over him, and injury is caused, without fault of the driver, by his thus coming in contact with an obstacle or defect in the highway, the municipality will be liable." 2 Elliott, Roads & Streets, 3d ed. § 793; Spaulding v. Winslow, 74 Me. 528; Aldrich v. Gorham, 77 Me. 287; Hinckley v. Somerset, 145 Mass. 326, 14 N. E. 166; Meisner v. Dillon, 29 Mont. 116, 74 Pac. 130, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 101; Emporia v. White, 74 Kan. 864, 86 Pac. 295; Vogelgesang v. St. Louis, 139 Mo. 127, 40 S. W. 653; Dillon v. Raleigh, 124 N. C. 184, 32 S. E. 548; Lacon v. Page, 48 Ill. 499; Cunningham v. Thief River Falls, 84 Minn. 21, 86 N. W. 763, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 106.

In Hugo v. Nance, 39 Okla. 640, 135 Pac. 346, it was said by this court in the syllabus: "A municipal corporation is charged by law with the duty of at all times keeping its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition for travel by the public." Fairfax v. Giraud, 35 Okla. 659, 131 Pac. 159, 5 N. C. C. A. 428; Kingfisher v. Altizer, 13 Okla. 121, 74 Pac. 107, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 173.

It is also contended by the defendant that plaintiff's injury was one that could not have reasonably been anticipated by the city, and for that reason no recovery can be had.

In Coolidge v. Hallauer, 126 Wis. 244, 105 N. W. 568, it is said: "It is not necessary, in order to constitute proximate cause, that the precise injury should have been foreseen or apprehended as certain to occur. It is sufficient if an ordinarily careful and prudent person ought, under the circumstances, to have foreseen that an injury might probably result from the negligent act."

See also Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251; Armendaiz v. Stillman, 67 Tex. 458, 3 S. W. 678; Wilbert v. Sheboygan Light, Power & R. Co. 129 Wis. 1, 116 Am. St. Rep. 931, 106 N. W. 1058.

Again, it is insisted on behalf of defendant that there is a fatal variance between the acts of negligence alleged in the petition and the proof. In this contention there is no merit.

It was not error to refuse defendant's requested instruction set forth in the assignments of error.

The evidence was sufficient to take the case to the jury on the question of the negligence of the city and the issues involved.

We have examined the instructions given by the court, and, in our opinion, the jury were instructed as to the law applicable to the case in all particulars.

It follows that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

HOMER J. WILKINS, Drainage Commissioner, Plff. in Err.,

v.

ED HILLMAN et al., County Commissioners, et al.

(— Okla. —, 145 Pac. 1111.)

Public improvement — special assessment — benefit.

1. In the construction of a drainage ditch, special assessments under the Constitution

Headnotes by RIDDLE, J.

Note. — No other case has been found in point with WILKINS v. HILLMAN, on the precise question as to the fund from which an assessment against a county or town on account of benefits from a drain or other public improvement must be paid. The general question as to property liable for assessment for constructions of drains or sewers is extensively treated in notes to Heffner v. Cass & Morgan Counties, 58 L.R.A. 353, and Billings Sugar Co. v. Fish, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973.

As to highway crossed by ditch constructed by drainage districts, see note to Richardson County ex rel. Sheehan v. Drainage Dist. 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 695.

As to liability of railroad property to assessment for drains or sewers, see note to L.R.A.1915D.

and laws of this state can be made only for corresponding specific benefits conferred.

County — special assessment — payment.

2. Where substantial benefits are assessed to a county on account of drainage to the public highways, that part of the expense of constructing the drainage ditch apportioned to the county, corresponding with the amount of benefits conferred, must be paid by the county out of funds raised by general taxation.

Same — special assessment of taxpayers.

3. That part of the expense of constructing a drainage ditch assessed against a county for benefits accruing to such county by virtue of drainage of the public highways cannot legally be paid out of funds collected by special assessment made against the property owners in said drainage district.

Constitutional law — special assessment to pay county tax.

4. The payment of that part of the expense in constructing a drainage ditch, assessed to the county for benefits to the public highways out of funds collected by special assessments levied upon the individual property located in such drainage district, would be taking private property for public use without just compensation, and violative of the Constitution and laws of this state.

Mandamus — to compel erection of bridge.

5. The viewers and appraisers assessed benefits to Lincoln county by virtue of the drainage of the public highways in the sum of $134,500, and assessed damages in favor of said county in the sum of $81,930, the cost of erecting forty-eight steel bridges across said drainage ditch on the public highways. Said assessment was confirmed by the county commissioners. No exceptions were filed or appeal taken therefrom. The county commissioners refused to erect said bridges, or to pay the amount of benefits assessed to said county. Plaintiffs, who are certain property owners in said district, filed their petition in the district court against the county commissioners, and said commissioners as ex officio drainage com-

Northern P. R. Co. v. Richland County, L.R.A.1915A, 129.

With respect to county warrants and certificates of indebtedness it is stated in 11 Cyc. 539, that no county order or warrant should be drawn on any fund not properly raised for its payment, as claims against counties can be satisfied only out of the revenue available for the payment of such claims; and as a general rule where a county order or warrant is on its face payable out of the special funds, the holder having accepted the same can look only to such fund for the payment of his claim, and cannot recover payment after such fund has been exhausted, unless the county has diverted the money of such fund from the payment of the warrant drawn against it, missioners, and against plaintiff in error as drainage commissioner, praying for a writ of mandamus, requiring them to meet and proceed to let the contract for the erection of said bridges. The court found in favor of the county commissioners, and issued a peremptory writ of mandamus requiring the commissioners, as ex officio drainage commissioners, and the drainage commissioners, to meet and proceed to let the contract for the construction of said bridges. Held, error.

ERROR to the District Court for Lincoln County to review a judgment granting a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to let a contract for the construction of certain bridges across a drainage ditch. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Embry & Hastings, for plaintiff in error:

This is a drainage improvement on the benefit plan. Cost to be met by lands, which includes streets and highways, benefited, and in proportion to such special benefits.

Mr. F. A. Rittenhouse also for defendants in error.

Riddle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 7th day of August, 1909, certain property owners residing in Lincoln county filed their petition in the manner provided by law with the board of county commissioners, for the purpose of creating a drainage district within said county. The petition was signed by the requisite number of property owners necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the county commissioners to proceed in the matter. Various proceedings were had, and there is no question raised as to the regularity of the proceedings in the organization of the drainage district and in letting the contract for the construction of the ditch. On February 28, 1914, J. W. Cherry, D. J. Norton, E. W. Hoyt, A. E. Patrick, and D. W. Collier, property owners in said district, filed their petition in the district court of Lincoln county against Ed Hillman, J. F. Collier, and R. A. Morrow, county commissioners and ex officio commissioners of Deep Fork drainage district No. 1, of Lincoln county, and Homer J. Wilkins, as drainage commissioner. Plaintiffs recite the various steps taken in the organization of said drainage district, and the letting of the contract to construct the ditch; that they are property owners, affected by such proceeding. They further allege that the viewers and appraisers appointed to view and appraise said property reported the necessity of building forty-eight steel bridges across said drainage ditch on the public highways, and designated the localities where said bridges were to be constructed; but said viewers and appraisers estimated the cost of construction of said bridges in the sum of $81,930. Plaintiffs further allege that said viewers and appraisers assessed the benefit to Lincoln county in the sum of $134,550. They allege the progress made in the construction of said ditch and the necessity of building said bridges, and the refusal of said defendants, as county commissioners, or either as ex officio drainage commissioners of said drainage district, to construct said bridges, as was their duty to so do, although often requested. It is further alleged, without the construction of said bridges, it will be impossible for plaintiffs to cross said ditch, and many of the farms situated in said district will be cut in two by said ditch, and the owners thereof will not have access to portions of their farms; that they have no adequate remedy at law, and they pray for a writ of mandamus, compelling defendants to meet and proceed to let the contract for the construction of said bridges. An alternative writ of mandamus was issued, setting up substantially the foregoing facts.

Plaintiff in error, Homer J. Wilkins, as drainage commissioner, filed his answer and return to the alternative writ, wherein he sets out the various steps taken by the county commissioners in the organization of said drainage district and the report of the viewers and appraisers and the confirmation thereof by said commissioners. He avers that the viewers and appraisers found the benefits to Lincoln county in the sum of $134,550, and the damage in favor of Lincoln county for the construction of said forty-eight steel bridges in the sum of $81,930. After legal notice by publication, a hearing upon said report was had, and the same was by the commissioners duly confirmed, and no appeal was taken therefrom by the county; and the action of the viewers and the order confirming same have become final. He also makes a part of his answer the order of the board of county commissioners, of date, November, 1910, as follows:

Chandler, Oklahoma, Nov. 19, 1910.

The board met pursuant to recess, all members present; journal of previous meeting read and approved. It is ordered by the board that, whereas, by mutual mistake, the assessment for damages in favor of Lincoln county in the Deep Fork drainage district No. 1 (by reason of the county being required to construct bridges), not having heretofore been spread of record, the county clerk be and he is hereby instructed to record in the drainage record of said district the assessment hereby made in favor of Lincoln county, on account of the construction of said bridges, the sum of $81,930, which said sum is hereby declared to be the assessment of damages due said county, as aforesaid. The board then took a recess until November 28, 1910.

Approved this 28th day of November, 1910.

Geo. F. Clark, Chairman.

Attest: J. E. Rea, County Clerk.

He further alleges: "And by such action the said board of county commissioners elected that Lincoln county would construct said bridges and offset the damages on account thereof, to wit, the sum of $81,930; . . . that the construction of said bridges is not a legal charge against said drainage district."

He further sets out resolution of the board of county commissioners of July 3, 1911, wherein the board recognizes the validity of the assessment of benefits made to Lincoln county and the provision made by said resolution toward the payment of said assessment, and the further resolution of said board, providing for the issuance of negotiable special assessment warrants with coupons attached in the aggregate sum of $134,000, to provide the ready funds to pay said sum. He alleges that they refuse to issue said warrants or to build said bridges. The county commissioners filed a demurrer to the petition and alternative writ of mandamus. Plaintiffs filed a demurrer to the answer and return of the drainage commissioner. Upon a hearing of the issues thus raised, the court sustained each of said demurrers; and a peremptory writ of mandamus was issued against the county commissioners, as ex officio commissioners of Deep Fork drainage district No. 1, and plaintiff in error, as drainage commissioner, requiring them to meet and proceed to let the contract for the construction of said forty-eight bridges. From this judgment plaintiff in error prosecutes error to this court.

There is no question raised on this appeal relative to the necessity of the construction of said bridges, but all parties seem to agree that they are indispensable. The sole question for determination is as to whether said bridges should be constructed by the county commissioners at the expense of and in behalf of the county, or by the drainage commissioners and at the expense of said district. By stipulation filed in this court, the case-made has been amended by attaching a true transcript of all the proceedings had before the county commissioners relative to said drainage district. We presume this is done in order that the court may determine the question on the merits, and finally fix the liability of building these bridges. A proper determination of the question presented requires the consideration and construction of several provisions of the act of the legislature of 1907-08, and the amendments thereto, commonly known as the drainage act. There is some contention as to whether the act of the commissioners was performed as commissioners of the drainage district, or whether they were acting in the capacity of county commissioners. The law is anything but clear as to when they shall act as county commissioners, or when they shall act as ex officio drainage commissioners. The law begins by providing that the proceedings shall be initiated by filing a petition with the county commissioners, and § 3045, Comp. Laws 1909, in part provides: "The term 'commissioners' as used in this act shall mean the board of county commissioners." There is no provision anywhere designating said commissioners "drainage commissioners," or "ex officio drainage commissioners." From an examination of the record, it seems that all the proceedings had before the commissioners were before them as county commissioners, and that all resolutions passed and orders made were in their capacity as county commissioners. In our opinion, it is a matter of minor importance whether or not they were acting in the capacity of county commissioners or drainage commissioners. It is unnecessary to determine in what capacity they performed their duties, except to the extent and for the purpose of determining the validity of their acts. At common law, the obligation to maintain and repair public highways and bridges rested upon the county. 1 Bl. Com. 357. It cannot be doubted that primarily the duty of building bridges of the character and dimensions of the bridges required to be built across said drainage ditch in question upon the public highways is upon the county commissioners under §§ 7581 and 7609, Rev. Laws 1910, which sections read:

"7581. All bridges, culverts and roads shall be at least 14 feet wide, and all bridges and culverts not more than 20 feet in length shall be under the control and supervision of the board of highway commissioners of such township and the road supervisor in whose district such bridge or culvert is situated, and all bridges more than 20 feet long shall be under the control and supervision of the board of county commissioners. Said bridges to be built by the county commissioners at such places as may be necessary for the public convenience. In addition to the compensation already allowed by law, the county commissioners shall receive $3 for each day actually and necessarily spent in overseeing bridge work: Provided, that no commissioners shall receive pay for such work for more than sixty days in any one year."

"7609. The board of county commissioners shall provide all roads improved, under the provisions of this article, with suitable bridges of a permanent and substantial character and shall keep and maintain same in repairs."

It is the contention of plaintiff in error that under § 3069, Comp. Laws 1909, it is likewise the duty of the county commissioners to construct the bridges in question. This section provides: "The commissioners may, when the same is necessary for public health, convenience and welfare, cause to be constructed or enlarged, any bridge or culvert made necessary by the crossing of any drain constructed under the provisions of this act: Provided, however, that when such bridge or culvert shall belong to any corporation other than the county, the county clerk shall give such corporation notice by delivering to its agent the order of the commissioners declaring the necessity for constructing or enlarging such bridge or culvert, and a failure to construct or enlarge such bridge or culvert within the time specified, shall be deemed as a refusal to do said work, and thereon the commissioners shall proceed to let the work of constructing or enlarging the same and assess the corporation with the cost thereof, and the county clerk shall place such assessment on the tax book against said corporation . . . to be collected as taxes. Before the commissioners shall let such work they shall give to the agent of the said corporation at least twenty days' actual notice of the time and place of letting such work."

Construing § 3069, supra, as a whole and in connection with §§ 7581 and 7609, Rev. Laws 1910, supra, relating to the same subject, we are clearly of the opinion that the commissioners referred to therein are the county commissioners, and that the bridges provided for are to be constructed on behalf of and at the expense of the county, except where benefits are assessed to a county, it may offset the amount due for benefits by the cost of erecting necessary bridges. This section clearly contemplates that the bridges, other than are owned by any private corporation, shall belong to the county. Also, this section provides only for the construction or repair of such bridges, when it is made necessary for the public health, convenience, and welfare. There is no reference made in this section to the repair or construction of bridges when necessary for the drainage district or for the convenience of the people in said district, but only when necessary for the general public health, convenience, and welfare. In other words, this section contemplates that said bridges are to be built for the use and benefit of the general public, in that all L.R.A.1915D.

public bridges become a part of the public highways, and the public highways are in the exclusive charge and control of the county officials and must be erected by general tax; and this section puts the burden of constructing such bridges upon the county.

We are also of the opinion that the bridges referred to in this section are a different class from those referred to in § 3050, Comp. Laws 1909. Taking the context of said § 3050, it is reasonably clear that the bridges referred to there are mainly for the use and benefit of the owners of the lands situated in said district. The language used (referring to the viewers) is: "They shall specify the manner and time in which the improvements shall be made and completed, the number of flood gates, waterways, farm crossings, bridges, and the dimensions thereof, and note the county and township lines and railroad crossings."

In other words, this language, properly construed, would mean the number of flood gates, waterways, farm crossings, and "farm bridges" and dimensions thereof. This section clearly contemplates that these are improvements to be constructed at the expense of the drainage district, and to become a part of the drainage system, and of special benefit to each landowner within the district, and are not public utilities. The drainage law does not provide anywhere the character, material, size in length or width, nor the location of such bridges. The language of the court in the case of Rigney v. Fischer, 113 Ind. 313, 15 N. E. 594, is applicable here: "Without further extending this opinion, our conclusion is that appellee, as the drainage commissioner, has no authority to determine the necessity for the bridge, nor the sort of bridge, if one is necessary, that should be built, and has no fund that he can use in the erection of the bridge; in short, that he has no authority to erect the bridge. Those questions must now be settled, and the bridge be built, if built at all, by some person or body authorized to do so by the statutes."

It is also his contention that the viewers and appraisers assessed benefits to be derived from the construction of this ditch against Lincoln county in the sum of $134,550, and damages by reason of the construction of these bridges in the sum of $81,930, and that said county, through its officials, elected to build these bridges and offset the amount of expense against the amount of benefits assessed, and that said county is now liable under the law by reason of such proceedings and judgment of the commissioners. The jurisdiction and authority conferred upon the county commissioners in the organization and proceedings in the construction of a drainage ditch are very broad and sweeping. There can be no question about the power to assess benefits to the county wherein the viewers and appraisers find that the county will be benefited by reason of the construction of such ditch and the draining of public highways. Part of § 3046, Comp. Laws 1909, provides: "The benefits to the county as a body politic and which might be assessed under this act against the county where improvements are formed, in districts formed wholly within any county, shall be prorated between the counties in their proportion to the benefits derived to the counties respectively and shall be paid from the public funds of each such county."

And again, § 3056, id., provides: "When any drain established under the provisions of this act, drains, either in whole or in part, or benefits any public or corporate road or railroad, the viewers shall apportion to the county or state road, or if a corporate road or railroad, to the person or company owning, operating or controlling the same, the same proportion of the cost of location and construction of the improvement in proportion to the benefits received as to private individuals." (Italics ours.)

It will be seen that the commissioners in their supervisory control over the acts of the viewers and appraisers had the same jurisdiction and authority to assess and approve benefits to the county as to an individual; and when the assessment was made and confirmed, if no appeal was taken within twenty days, the order confirming such assessment became final, equivalent to a judgment of such board, and would not be subject to a collateral attack. Certain powers conferred upon said commissioners are quasi judicial. The determination of the viewers, when affirmed by the county commissioners, is a quasi judicial proceeding and, unless appealed from, is final. In the case of Sears v. Street Comrs. 173 Mass. 350, 53 N. E. 876, it is said: "It is well established that the determination of the amount of taxes for special benefits to real estate by any tribunal to which the legislature delegates the power is a quasi judicial proceeding which cannot take final effect unless persons to be assessed have an opportunity to be heard. New London Northern R. Co. v. Boston & A. R. Co. 102 Mass. 386; Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S. 45, 52, 54, 42 L. ed. 943, 946, 947, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 521; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. 111 U. S. 701, 709, 28 L. ed. 569, 572, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663; Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 175, 41 L. ed. 369, 394, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56; Stuart v. L.R.A. 1915D.

Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 189, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Remsen v. Wheeler, 105 N. Y. 573, 12 N. E. 564."

Said commissioners are given exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine all contests and objections to the creation of such district, and all matters pertaining to same, and have exclusive jurisdiction in all subsequent proceedings, except such as is conferred upon the drainage commissioner after the completion of the ditch. They are given power to adjourn the hearing on any matter from day to day, and all judgments rendered by said commissioners in relation thereto are final, except when appealed from to the district court.

There is no claim that the county failed to receive sufficient notice of all proceedings had, or that there are any defects by reason thereof. Under the broad powers vested in the commissioners, we are of the opinion that their acts in approving the assessment of benefits to the county and in assessing damages in favor of the county to the amount of the cost of the bridges, and the resolution on the 19th day of November, 1910, supra, are valid and binding upon the county. The resolution, fairly construed, was an election on the part of the county to offset the benefits assessed to the amount of the cost price of the bridges. There was no appeal taken from the action of the commissioners in any of these matters, and such action must be held to be conclusive on the county. If the judgments of the commissioners are not conclusive on the county, then they are not conclusive on any of the other parties, in that the commissioners had the same jurisdiction over the county as it had over the other parties before them, and was specifically authorized to make the assessments of benefits and damages to the same extent as if all were individuals. The county was authorized to elect, the same as an individual, if it would offset the damages assessed against the benefits, and, having elected, is now estopped to revoke its action in such matter to the prejudice of the drainage district and others interested.

Section 17 of the act, being § 2981, Rev. Laws 1910, in part provides: "Should any person interested in land appropriated or damaged by the proposed drain or other improvements fail to file their written exceptions to the report of the viewers as hereinbefore provided, they shall be deemed to have acquiesced in any such award and shall forever be estopped from prosecuting any action to vacate or avoid the same."

And § 3057, Comp. Laws 1909, in regard to appeals, provides: "Any person aggrieved may appeal from the order of the commissioners, and upon such appeal there may be determined either or any of the following questions: First, whether just compensation has been allowed for property appropriated; and, second, whether proper damages have been allowed for property prejudicially affected by the improvements; third, and whether the property for which an appeal is prayed has been assessed more than it will be benefited, or more than its proportionate share of the cost of the improvements."

Section 3053, id., in part provides: "If the commissioners shall find that due notice has been given, they shall examine the report of the surveyor and viewers, and if it shall appear that the assessments of the cost of location and construction and of damages and benefits to each tract are correct, and that the apportionment of the costs of location and construction, is in proportion to the benefits and damages of each tract, fair and just, the same shall be approved and confirmed. . . ."

Then it is provided in said section that in case the commissioners find that the improvements so reported are unjust or erroneous, they may, by an order of record, amend the report upon evidence. The subject-matter certainly was within the authority of the commissioners, and the law specifically gives to the commission authority to adjourn from day to day on the hearing of reports and exceptions, and to make such orders as may be necessary in the letting of the contract and the assessment of damages and benefits. The statute also specifically authorizes the offsetting of benefits by damages assessed, and this applies as well to the county as to individuals; and in our opinion, the commissioners had the authority to confirm and approve the finding of the viewers in assessing benefits against the county in the amount found, and also in assessing the damage for the construction of the bridges, and that the county had a right, acting through its commissioners, to elect whether or not it would construct said bridges. It having elected, its action should be held final.

The contention that counsel make, to the effect that it was the duty of the drainage district, under the common law, to construct these bridges, is not tenable. We recognize the common-law rule, to the effect that where a corporation or other person or company crosses a public highway, it must be done with as little damage to the highway as possible, and that it is the legal duty of such person or company to construct bridges or culverts and make such other repairs as may be necessary to replace said highway in a reasonably safe condition at the expense of such person crossing same. Whether or not this rule, L.R.A.1915D.

under any circumstances, would apply to a drainage district, constructed under the statute, is not necessary to decide; but we do hold it has no application to the case at bar. If all the parties affected, or who expected to be benefited by the cutting of a drainage ditch, should be directly instrumental in initiating proceedings for that purpose, and proceed to organize and construct such a ditch, without reference to any benefits to the public generally, and should construct said ditch across highways, probably in such an instance such persons, corporation, or drainage district might be required to repair the highways so damaged in crossing. It is clear, under the drainage laws and the Constitution, no assessments can be made upon any land on any principle other than that of corresponding benefits received. The undertaking here was a gigantic one, of vast magnitude, and from the great area of country it will drain, we might be justified in inferring that it will be of immeasurable benefit to the general public, even if there were no finding to that effect in the record. One of the prerequisites to the right of making this improvement was a finding that it would be necessary for the "public health, convenience, and welfare" of all, and that it would not be of special benefit to any particular class, or specific property. This alone should be sufficient reason to make the common-law rule inapplicable. No doubt the larger per cent of the property owners, without their consent, are required to contribute to pay the expense of such improvements, on the theory that they are public utilities and beneficial to the public health, etc., and for specific benefits received equal to the assessments. Under our Constitution, arbitrary assessments can only be made in payment of expense of constructing a drainage ditch when the benefits received are in proportion to the assessments made, and that such improvement is a public utility, or is made in the interest of public health. When such improvements are made in the interest of the public welfare, and without regard to special benefits conferred, the property of citizens can be taken only after just compensation paid therefor, and the expense of such improvements must be paid by a general tax upon all people affected. People ex rel. Coon Run Drainage & Levee Dist. v. Nortrup, 232 Ill. 303, 83 N. E. 843; Cuming County v. Bancroft Drainage Dist. 90 Neb. 81, 132 N. W. 927. It is shown from the record, and is conclusive, so far as this proceeding is concerned, that the county received benefits to the public roads of $134,550 by reason of this contemplated improvement. To this extent, the property owners within the district would receive no direct benefit to their property. In other words, every other resident of the county will receive the same benefit by the drainage of the public roads as will the property owners living within the district; and it would be neither right nor legal that the few residing within the district should be compelled to pay the expense for benefits received by the public generally. The bridges required are for the benefit of the general public, and special assessments cannot legally be made to pay the expense of constructing same. The expense of building said bridges is a subject of general taxation. Sears v. Street Comrs. 173 Mass. 350, 53 N. E. 876; Hammett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 146, 3 Am. Rep. 615; Re Washington Ave. 69 Pa. 352, 8 Am. Rep. 255; Williamsport's Appeal, 187 Pa. 565, 41 Atl. 476; Dietz v. Neenah, 91 Wis. 422, 64 N. W. 299, 65 N. W. 500; Dyar v. Farmington, 70 Me. 527; Hanscom v. Omaha, 11 Neb. 37, 7 N. W. 739; Erie v. Russell, 148 Pa. 384, 23 Atl. 1102. To hold otherwise would be in direct violation of § 24, article 2, of the Constitution, in that it would be taking private property for a public use, to the extent, at least, of the amount of the assessments of benefits to the public highways, amounting approximately to one sixth of the total value of the improvements.

Page and Jones on Taxation by Assessment, § 449, lay down the following rule: "Authority to assess for the construction of a system of drains does not include authority to assess for the construction of a bridge at a point where a large drain crosses a highway."

In 14 Cyc. 1025, it is stated: "Under the various constitutional provisions and acts conferring power upon local authorities to establish drains, it must be shown that such drain is necessary and conducive to public health, convenience, or welfare, or of public benefit or utility" (citing cases from Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Oregon, Wisconsin, and New York).

Page 1059, id.: "In the assessments of benefits in drainage proceedings, the landowner should not be charged with general benefits which accrue to him as a member of the community, but only with such as are special. The benefits for which an assessment may be made must relate to the betterment of the land for the purposes to which it may reasonably be put, and lands not benefited are not subject to assessment."

Page 1061, id.: "The general rule is that the expense of construction of a drain cannot be assessed against particular lands to an amount in excess of the benefits received by such land, and an assessment upon a tract of land in excess of the benefits received is void as to such excess."

ceived by such land, and an assessment upon a tract of land in excess of the benefits received is void as to such excess."

In 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 230, it is stated: "The general rule is well settled that a special assessment for the purpose of drainage can be levied only upon property benefited by the proposed drainage, and the amount of such assessment must not exceed the benefit to be derived by the land assessed."

It was said in the case of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187, by Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court: "In our judgment, the exaction from the owner of private property of the cost of a public improvement in substantial excess of the special benefits accruing to him is, to the extent of such excess, a taking, under the guise of taxation, of private property for public use without compensation. We say 'substantial excess,' because exact equality of taxation is not always attainable, and for that reason the excess of cost over special benefits, unless it be of a material character, ought not to be regarded by a court of equity when its aid is invoked to restrain the enforcement of a special assessment."

It is suggested that the county commissioners cannot be compelled to build said bridges, for the reason it would be in violation of § 26, art. 10, of the Constitution. This same objection, no doubt, could be urged, and properly so, against the enforcement of the collection of the amount of benefits assessed to the county in the sum of $134,550, yet if said apportionment and assessment are legal, and they appear to be such, under § 3067, Comp. Laws 1909, it is made the duty of said county to pay said amount of benefits assessed in cash, or in time warrants, as it may elect. We have no authority, and it is not our purpose, to require the county commissioners to attempt to violate the provision of the Constitution, but have the authority to require such commissioners to meet in the manner provided by law and take such proceedings as may be necessary, in compliance with law, toward the erection of such number of bridges across the drainage ditch in question upon the public highways as the public good, convenience, and accommodation may require.

It follows that the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, with direction to vacate and set aside same, and to enter a judgment requiring the county commissioners to convene immediately and proceed to take such steps as may be necessary in the manner provided by law, toward letting contracts for the erection of such bridges across Deep Fork drainage ditch No. 1, of Lincoln county, as may be necessary to accommodate fully and adequately the public, and the court is further directed to proceed in said matter in accordance with the views herein expressed. It is so ordered.

All the Justices concur.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 2.)

O. D. WHITNEY et al., Respts.,
v.

J. H. BISSELL and Wife, Appts.

(— Or. —, 146 Pac. 141.)

Principal and agent — ratification of representation of value by broker.

1. A property owner cannot accept the benefits of a contract for sale negotiated by a broker finally compensated by him, although he acted originally for the purchaser without ratifying the statements as to the income of the property made by the broker to effect the sale.

Fraud — payment by seller of commission to buyer's agent.

2. The agreement by a property owner to pay a broker a commission for selling the property, knowing that he was employed by the buyer, is a fraud upon the rights of the buyer, if the agreement was not assented to by him.

Contract — fraud — rescission — delay — ratification.

3. A delay of two and one-half years after taking possession of real estate which was bought upon the faith of a representation that the income had been a certain sum for a year before the transfer, before seeking a rescission, is unreasonable, where the exercise of due diligence would have disclosed the fraud during the first season after the purchaser entered into possession of the property.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County, in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to foreclose a mortgage given to secure payment of certain promissory notes. Affirmed.

about 10 acres of orchard land near Medford, Jackson county, Oregon, given by defendants to plaintiff O. D. Whitney to secure the payment of three promissory notes aggregating $7,500, a portion of which mortgage was assigned to plaintiff Parker. The trial court rendered a decree in favor of plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

By their answer the defendants admit the execution of the notes and mortgage. For an affirmative defense they allege in effect that in the month of December, 1910, plaintiff Whitney was the owner of the premises and sold the same to defendants for $14,500, $3,000 of which was paid in cash, $4,000 by the conveyance of certain property in Minneapolis, Minnesota, subject to a mortgage of $700, and the balance by three promissory notes; that defendants at the time were sojourning in Florida and never saw the property until after the purchase, all the negotiations being conducted by correspondence through the mails and by telegraph with L. W. Zimmer and J. W. Dressler, agents of plaintiff Whitney; that the defendants refused to purchase the property until plaintiffs advised them of the value of the products of the premises for the year 1910; that, in order to induce the defendants to make the purchase, Whitney, through his agents, stated that the income from the property for that year was $3,000; but that the returns were not yet complete; that they should be $3,500 for 1911. It is alleged that the defendants relied on such information and purchased the property; that the representation was false and Whitney knew the same to be so; that the premises for 1910 returned no greater sum than $700, which is an average. The defendants aver that they only recently made the discovery of the fraud, and promptly notified plaintiff Whitney in writing that on account thereof they rescinded the contract, demanded the repayment of the $3,000, a reconveyance of the Minneapolis property, and the cancellation of defendants' notes. They offered to reconvey the premises to Whitney and account to him for the rents, issues, and profits during their incumbency. The reply denies the false representation. The circumstances of the transaction were about as follows: L. W. Zimmer formerly resided in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and defendant Dr. Bissell was also from that city. Having heard of the former through mutual friends and having seen his advertisement, in November, 1910, Dr. Bissell wrote to him in regard to property near Medford. Zimmer inquired of J. W. Dressler, a real estate dealer who had the orchard in question listed for sale. Dressler mentioned the Whitney orchard, and Zimmer wrote and recommended the same to Dr. Bissell, who answered asking numerous questions; among them, as to what the crop returns for 1910 had been. He afterwards requested the same information by wire, suggesting changes in the proposition. Zimmer consulted with Dressler and Whitney, and on December 13th sent Dr. Bissell the following telegram:

Dr. J. H. Bissell, Sarasota, Florida:

Your proposition acceptable, provided you agree to pay your first two notes in case you sell the orchard in the meantime. Income should be about $3,000 this year. Returns not in. Next year 3,500 or more. Porter J. Neff, city attorney, Jackson County Bank, and I at your service.

L. W. Zimmer.

Dr. Bissell accepted the proposition of sale on the basis set forth in the answer. During the negotiations Dressler and Zimmer, with the knowledge of Whitney, agreed to divide the commission of 5 per cent on the sale equally. On January 9, 1911, a preliminary contract of sale was executed containing the following stipulation: "It is further covenanted and agreed between the parties that L. W. Zimmer, who has negotiated this contract for the parties hereto, and has acted as agent for the second party, shall be paid by the first party a commission of 5 per cent upon the purchase of $14,500, to be received by him in full payment for his services for both parties hereto."

This agreement was signed by Whitney and by J. H. Bissell, by Zimmer as his agent. Afterwards the same was forwarded to Dr. Bissell and ratified and signed by him.

Messrs. Gus Newbury and B. F. Platt, for appellants:

Plaintiff Whitney defrauded defendants by the false and fraudulent misrepresentations as to the produce of the lands for the year 1910.

Fraud is a question of fact, and may be established by inference like any other disputed fact.

Messrs. Neff & Mealey for respondents.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is admitted that the statement of the returns for the crop of 1910 was greatly in excess of the amount realized, which was about $700. Whitney asserts that he did not furnish Zimmer with the information, but that he stated that he had not then received the returns from the fruit association of Medford which marketed the crop, and could not state the amount; that Zimmer, the agent of Dr. Bissell, was the authority for the representation. Zimmer testified positively that he obtained the information from Whitney. Dressler at first by affidavit corroborated Zimmer, but upon further consideration and reflection testified in substance the same as Whitney. According to our view of the case, this statement in regard to the proceeds of the crop of 1910 was made in behalf of plaintiff Whitney as an inducement to Dr. Bissell to make the deal. The latter, relying upon the representation, consummated the purchase of the fruit orchard. Plaintiff, having accepted the benefit of the contract negotiated by his agents, is not in a position to repudiate that part of the transaction by means of which the agreement was obtained. He cannot ratify the contract in part and repudiate it in part. When a principal elects to ratify any portion of an unauthorized act of an agent, he must ratify the whole of it. He cannot avail himself of such acts so far as beneficial to him and repudiate the remainder. La Grande Nat. Bank v. Blum, 27 Or. 218, 41 Pac. 659; McLeod v. Despain, 49 Or. 536, 552, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 276, 124

Am. St. Rep. 1066, 90 Pac. 492, 92 Pac. 1088; Grover v. Hawthorne, 62 Or. 77, 96, 114 Pac. 472, 121 Pac. 808. It is stated in 31 Cyc. 1603, as follows: "A contract induced by the fraud or misrepresentation of an agent while acting within the real or apparent scope of his authority cannot be enforced by the principal against the party misled, even though the principal did not authorize the agent to act fraudulently or to misrepresent."

When Whitney agreed to pay Zimmer a commission, if he had knowledge that Zimmer was already employed by Dr. Bissell, and if the latter did not assent thereto, Whitney and Zimmer were both guilty of a wrong committed against the first employer, as such employment would be a temptation to the agent not to give his best efforts to Dr. Bissell. A contract entered into through such means is in fraud of the rights of the defendant Bissell. Bell v. McConnell, 37 Ohio St. 396, 41 Am. Rep. 528. Whitney was responsible for the misrepresentation made to Dr. Bissell by which he was induced to make the agreement, and the contract was voidable. Kreshover v. Berger, 135 App. Div. 27, 119 N. Y. Supp. 737.

Defendant J. H. Bissell testified that he came to Oregon the next season after the deal was made, cared for the orchard, and set out about 50 new trees, receiving but little returns from the orchard the first two years; that the first year he lost a part of the crop by frost, and the second the apples were not thinned enough; that in 1913, he received as returns from the orchard some over $1,200, after deducting the expenses for three years, not taking into consideration his own labor; that in May, 1913, he first learned that the representation made to him in regard to the crop of 1910 was false; and that he thereupon notified plaintiff Whitney that he rescinded the contract, offered to reconvey the orchard, demanded a return of the money paid and the notes, and a reconveyance of the Minneapolis property. He states that he was injured on account of the small income from the investment, but that he does not know whether or not he paid too much for the fruit orchard; that the tract is about the same as others in the neighborhood, except that the kind of fruit is different and needs cross pollenizing in order to bear abundantly. Plaintiff Whitney asserts that the place was cheap at $14,500. Dr. Bissell listed the property for sale for about one year at $17,000, and afterwards lowered the price to $13,500. He applied to Whitney and was granted an extension of time for the payment of interest on the notes.

and by his treating the contract as effectual and occupying the property for about two and one-half years, defendant Bissell forfeited his right to rescind the contract. As held in Scott v. Walton, 32 Or. 460, 52 Pac. 180, a party induced by fraud to make a contract has, upon the discovery of the fraud, an election of remedies either to affirm the contract and sue for damages, or disaffirm it and be reinstated in the position in which he was before it was consummated. The adoption of one of these remedies, which are wholly inconsistent, is the exclusion of the other. If he desires to rescind, he must act promptly and return, or offer to return, what he has received under the contract. He cannot retain the fruits of the contract awaiting further developments to determine whether it will be more profitable for him to affirm or disaffirm it. Any delay on his part, especially in remaining in possession of the property received by him under the contract and dealing with it as his own, will be evidence of his intention to abide by the contract. See also Vaughn v. Smith, 34 Or. 54, 55 Pac. 99; Sievers v. Brown, 36 Or. 218, 56 Pac. 170; Elgin v. Snyder, 60 Or. 297, 302, 118 Pac. 280.

The purpose of obtaining the information as to the returns of the orchard for 1910 was obviously to base thereon an estimate of the value of the real property and the income that might be expected therefrom. When Dr. Bissell arrived upon the ground in the spring of 1911, this was not his only source of information. It is well known that the products and the net returns from the fruit industry vary with the seasons and prices. It is not suggested why the crop of 1910 would be any better criterion by which to estimate the income than that of 1911 or 1912. General information in the usual way in regard to the value of orchards and the income therefrom was available to the defendant Bissell, and by the use of due diligence he could have discovered the fraud during the season of 1911. It seems somewhat strange that for about two and one-half years Bissell should have relied upon the statistics for 1910, without apparently making any effort to inform himself in regard to the value of the property or the income therefrom, until about the time of suit upon his notes.

The rule as to the knowledge of the fraud before there would be an acquiescence therein is subject to the principle that notice of acts and circumstances which would put a man of ordinary prudence and intelligence upon inquiry is equivalent in the eyes of the law to knowledge of all the facts a reasonably diligent inquiry would disclose. 6 Cyc. 305; Clark, Contr. p. 236. During the season of 1911, Dr. Bissell had sufficient information to put him, as a man of ordinary prudence and intelligence, upon inquiry. If he had made investigation, he could have secured all the essential details regarding the income from this orchard, or could have obtained the amount of returns for 1910 from the fruit association in Medford which handled the product and kept the accounts. Indeed, his evidence does not disclose that he is yet thoroughly convinced that with the administration of his skill as a horticulturist he will not be able to produce an abundant crop and realize a profitable return on his investment, provided he is allowed sufficient time. He appears to think the money is in the land, and the only complaint he makes is in getting it out or in regard to the income. Under the circumstances of this case, it does not appear that defendant Bissell indicated a desire to rescind the contract within a reasonable time after he could have discovered the alleged fraud by the use of due diligence, which amounts to the same thing as a discovery. He failed to act promptly in the matter, retained the possession of the land, cultivated the same for a long time, set out fruit trees, speculated upon a rise in the market both as to crops and real estate, and asked and obtained an extension of time for the payment of a portion of the interest, a part of which he paid on his notes, without making any complaint after he knew or should have known the condition of affairs. We think he should be deemed to have affirmed the contract and waived his right to rescind. See Strong v. Strong, 102 N. Y. 69, 5 N. E. 799; Kingman & Co. v. Stoddard, 29 C. C. A. 413, 57 U. S. App. 379, 85 Fed. 740; Van Gilder v. Bullen, 159 N. C. 291, 74 S. E. 1059; Simon v. Goodyear Metallic Rubber Shoe Co. 44 C. C. A. 612, 52 L.R.A. 745, 105 Fed. 573.

The decree of the lower court is therefore affirmed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT. (Department No. 1.)

CITY OF PORTLAND, Resp't.,
v.
WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY et al., Appts.

(— Or. —, 146 Pac. 148.)

Municipal corporation — license — messenger service — bond.

1. Under charter authority to regulate occupations within its limits, a municipal L.R.A.1915D.

corporation may require one undertaking to transact a messenger business within the city to secure a license and furnish a bond for the faithful performance of the duties incident to such business.

Messenger service — what constitutes — scope of undertaking.

2. A telegraph company which has, incident to its business, undertaken to furnish messengers to carry notes, packages, and similar matter for patrons, transacts a messenger business within the meaning of a municipal ordinance requiring the procurement of a license therefor, although its offer to transact such business states that its sole undertaking is to furnish messengers, and not to deliver the packages.

Evidence — violation of ordinance — sufficiency.

3. In an action by a municipal corporation for the penalty for transacting a business without license, a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient to show violation of the ordinance, and the proof need not be direct.

(February 16, 1915.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in plaintiff's favor in an action to recover from defendants a penalty for transacting a general messenger business without a license in violation of an ordinance of the city. Affirmed.

Statement by Moore, Ch. J.:

The defendants, the Western Union Telegraph Company, a corporation, and W. A. Robb, its manager, were accused in the Note. — While an extensive search has disclosed no case, aside from PORTLAND v. WESTERN U. TELEG. Co., upon the subject of the regulation of the messenger business, the decision in this case seems to be correct, under the general rules as to the regulation of business by a municipality in the exercise of its police power. As stated in 28 Cyc. 721, 722: "In the exercise of its authorized police power to that effect, a municipality may regulate an occupation or business which it may not prohibit; and for this purpose it may require a license where it has no power of taxation." And accordingly, the regulation involved in PORTLAND v. WESTERN U. TELEG. Co. being, as held therein, reasonable in its terms, and not otherwise objectionable, was a proper exercise of the power expressly given, or granted by necessary implication, to the municipality.

municipal court of Portland of violating city ordinance No. 25667, in that they in the year 1913 wilfully engaged within the municipality in the general messenger business for hire, and that, without having first procured a license therefor, they unlawfully delivered letters, packages, etc., contrary to the provisions of such ordinance and against the peace of the city. Pleas of not guilty were interposed to the complaint, whereupon the cause was tried and the defendants found guilty as charged. From such judgment they appealed to the circuit court of the state of Oregon for Multnomah county, where the cause was retried without the intervention of a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts, and the defendants, having again been convicted, appealed from the resulting judgment to this court.

Messrs. Dolph, Mallory, Simon, & Gearin and Hall S. Lusk, for appellants:

The defendants in the conduct of their messenger business do not contract to deliver packages, notes, etc.; their sole undertaking is to furnish messengers and to use ordinary care in that particular.

Moore, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions to be considered are whether or not the ordinance referred to, requiring corporations doing a messenger business to execute to the city a bond, is valid, and, if so, does the service performed by the Western Union Telegraph Company bring it within the provisions of such municipal legislation? The ordinance referred to provides generally that no person, firm, or corporation shall engage in the messenger business for the delivery of packages, notes, letters, etc., or the purchase or delivery of merchandise, or "other service incident to what is commonly known as a general messenger business or service for hire" within the city of Portland without first having obtained a license therefor from the municipality. Section 1. The fee for such license shall be $100 a year payable in advance. Section 2. Each recipient of a license is requested to execute to the city and file with the auditor, at the time the license is delivered, a satisfactory bond in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that he will faithfully deliver any goods, packages, notes, etc., that may be intrusted to him, and pay to the party entitled thereto any damages that may accrue from his failure so to do, and any person aggrieved by such neglect is granted a right of action upon the bond in the name of the city. Section 3. Nothing in the ordinance shall prevent any licensee from employing servants to assist in carrying on the messenger business. Section 4. All messengers in the employ of any licensee are required, when on duty, to wear, conspicuously displayed, a badge of their employer. Section 5. Any person, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of the ordinance shall upon conviction thereof in the municipal court, be punished by a fine of not less than $5, nor more than $100. Section 6. "The provisions of this ordinance shall not apply to any company soliciting or delivering messages or merchandise in the city of Portland which messages or merchandise is a part of their own business." Section 7.

The stipulation of facts, upon which this cause was tried, shows that the Western Union Telegraph Company is a corporation and maintains at Portland, Oregon, an office where messages are transmitted and received. Communications by its wires for patrons in that city are delivered to them, and, in order to facilitate the despatch of such service, messengers are kept for that purpose. The company issues advertisements which read:

"Telegraph and Cable. Western Union.

Uniformed messengers furnished for the delivery of holiday goods."

"American District Telegraph Company. Uniformed messenger service. The best in the long run, the best in the short run. Messengers furnished for the delivery of notes, invitations, packages, catalogues, samples, and advertising matter. Pull the call box or telephone the Western Union."

"Notice: This company does not undertake delivery of packages, notes, letters, communications, or the purchase or delivery of merchandise for hire. Its sole business is the furnishing of messengers at a stated compensation for the time such messengers are employed by patrons. The Western Union Telegraph Company."

The company installs in various places of business in the city call boxes, by the use of which customers may secure messengers, a sufficient number of whom are always kept to accommodate patrons in delivering telegrams. The company also receives calls for messengers, who deliver packages, notes, etc., within the city. In many instances when such calls are received the agents of the company are not advised whether a messenger is desired to bring to the office a telegraph message or to carry a private note or package to some other person in Portland. When a sufficient number of messengers are not in attendance at the company's office properly to transact the telegraphic business, a messenger is refused when called for any other purpose. When, however, messengers are available, they are sent in response to calls of every kind, and without information as to the service required. Upon receiving a call the company's agent directs a messenger to go to the locality indicated, where he is instructed as to the place and manner of delivering a message or package, and thereupon the boy executes the order, performing the service required. Neither the company nor its agent is usually informed as to the contents or value of the package delivered, or the importance of the message handed over to a messenger, other than a telegraphic communication. In answering a call the messenger informs the patron what the charges will be for performing the service demanded, and in most instances the boy collects the prescribed fee, which is calculated upon the basis of 40 cents per hour for deliveries made to persons within the city. Such fee, when thus received, is given to the company's agent, who retains it, keeping account thereof, and at the end of the month he pays the messenger who performed the service 60 per cent of the sums so received, and also gives the boy 2 cents L.R.A.1915D.

for each telegram he has delivered during that time. Credit is sometimes allowed for the fee required for delivering notes, packages, etc. No license has been issued to the defendants, nor has any bond been given by either of them as required by the ordinance.

No claim is made by defendants' counsel that the charter of Portland did not empower the council of that municipality to regulate occupations and kindred matters within the city. It will be assumed, therefore, that such authority is expressly given or is granted by necessary implication. The power to regulate does not authorize an absolute prohibition of any legitimate business that may be pursued as of common right. As a means of enforcing a reasonable regulation, however, power may be exercised to exact a license to follow a particular occupation, coupled with an accompanying prohibition that, in the event of a failure to pay the stipulated fee and to procure the requisite evidence of authority to conduct the business, pursuit thereof will be unlawful. Dill Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 665. A textwriter, in distinguishing between a tax and a license, observes: "It is therefore conclusive that the general requirement of a license, for the pursuit of any business that is not dangerous to the public, can only be justified as an exercise of the power of taxation, or the requirement of the compensation for the enjoyment of a privilege or franchise." 1 Tiedeman, State & Federal Control of Persons & Property, p. 495.

The production of a revenue, however, is not conclusive evidence of an exercise of the power to tax, for a municipal corporation may be authorized to issue licenses which incidentally result in raising revenue. Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 244.

As a reasonable exercise of a measure of the police power and as an incident to the authority to demand a license fee as a condition precedent to the right to pursue an occupation in which members of the public may be interested or whereby they may be affected, a municipal corporation, under a grant of power to regulate, may also lawfully require the licensee to execute to the city a reasonable bond for the faithful performance of the service authorized, and to operate as indemnity for damages which individuals may sustain by reason of fraudulent conduct of the business. Freund, Pol. Power, § 40; State v. Harrington, 68 Vt. 622, 34 L.R.A. 100, 35 Atl. 516. The ordinance in question is reasonable in its terms, general in its application to all parties of the same class, consonant with the powers and purposes of the city of Portland, consistent with the laws and policy of the state, and is a proper exercise of the police power enacted for the purpose of regulating, and not restraining, occupations. Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642.

It is contended that the messenger business, disclosed by the stipulated facts, as far as it relates to the delivery of notes, packages, etc., is not conducted by the Western Union Telegraph Company; that its undertaking in this particular is to furnish messengers to its patrons, whose servants they are for the time employed; that the company's full duty is discharged when it exercises ordinary care in selecting the messengers, and hence an error was committed in rendering the judgment herein. "One who employs messengers to deliver parcels," says a text writer, "is a common carrier as to goods received for delivery in that way." 6 Cyc. 369. "A common carrier," observes Mr. Justice Lord, in Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Simon, 20 Or. 60, 63, 10 L.R.A. 251, 23 Am. St. Rep. 86, 25 Pac. 147, "is such because his duties partake of a public character." In White v. Postal Teleg. & Cable Co. 25 App. D. C. 364, 367, 4 Ann. Cas. 767, which was an action to recover money alleged to have been lost by a messenger furnished by the defendant to the plaintiff, the court, referring to such business, remarked: "In passing, it may be said that in all the larger cities there are now companies engaged in this line of service, and undoubtedly they are in a certain sense and to a certain extent common carriers."

In Gilman v. Postal Teleg. Co. 48 Misc. 372, 373, 95 N. Y. Supp. 564, 565, the court, in speaking of the defendant, makes the following assertion: "It is in evidence, however, that it installs call boxes in houses, and sends messenger boys, in response to calls, to carry out such errands as may be intrusted to them, and that this service frequently involves, to the knowledge of the company, the carrying of parcels. So far as appears, this service is confined to the carrying of such small parcels as can be carried by hand by a lad, and it does not appear that the defendant is equipped or prepared to carry more bulky merchandise. To the extent, then, that it offers its services to the public as a carrier, that is, so far as relates to small packages, the defendant must, I think, be regarded as a common carrier and held to be responsible in that capacity."

It is evident, we think, from the agreed statement of facts, that the Western Union Telegraph Company, in the exercise of a part of its public employment, holds itself out as ready to engage in carrying from place to place as directed, within the city of Portland, notes, small packages, etc., undertaking to perform such service for hire as a business, furnishing messengers at all times, except when they are otherwise engaged in delivering telegraph messages, and, in respect to such packages as can reasonably be transported by messengers, it is a common carrier and ordinarily liable to the obligations imposed by the principles of the common law upon such class of public-service corporations.

It remains to be seen whether or not the messengers of the Western Union Telegraph Company when engaged in delivering notes, packages, etc., in response to calls, are its servants or pro hac vice are the employees of its patrons.

In Haskell v. Boston Dist. Messenger Co. 190 Mass. 189, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1091, 112 Am. St. Rep. 324, 76 N. E. 215, 5 Ann. Cas. 796, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 289, the plaintiff by means of a call box signaled the defendant for a messenger, upon whose arrival there was delivered to him a receipted bill for rent, amounting to $58.33, and he was sent to collect that sum from a tenant. The messenger received the money, but failed to return it, whereupon an action was instituted to recover it; and it was held that a corporation supplying messenger boys to be employed in ordinary messenger service and controlled by those calling for them was not a common carrier, and that it performed its duty towards its customers by exercising ordinary care in the selection and employment of suitable persons as messengers, and, no special agreement having been made with the company in regard to the performance of such service, the patron, as the employer of the boy, could not recover the loss from the corporation supplying him, without showing negligence on its part in selecting the boy as a messenger.

So, too, in Hirsch v. American Dist. Teleg. Co. 112 App. Div. 265, 98 N. Y. Supp. 371, a staff of messengers was maintained by the defendant corporation, which furnished boys to its patrons needing their services, the charges therefor being based upon the time employed. The plaintiff notified the defendant's manager of one of its offices that he needed a boy, and accepted the lad offered, to whom he gave a package with instructions to take it to a designated place and deliver it. The package was never delivered, and, in an action to recover the value thereof, it was ruled that in furnishing such boy the company was not a common carrier, and that no contract had been entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant so as to render it liable for the failure of the boy to deliver the package.

We do not assent to the doctrine announced in these cases that a company which, for the purpose of despatching a part of its business, maintains messengers, whom it sends out upon call to its patrons, is not in any sense a common carrier. Whether or not, without a statute or an ordinance imposing a duty upon such company to secure a license and to execute a bond to indemnify its patrons, a recovery can be had for a loss occasioned by the failure of its messengers safely to deliver notes, packages, etc., received by him, is not necessary to inquire. The ordinance involved permits persons, firms, and corporations engaged in delivering messages or merchandise as a part of their business to pursue their respective occupations without the necessity of procuring a license or being obliged to execute a bond. Pursuant to such provision of the municipal law, the Western Union Telegraph Company could undoubtedly deliver to its patrons in the city of Portland telegraphic messages received over its wires. If the company, either directly or indirectly, engage in the delivery of notes, packages, etc., for others, it must first secure a license and execute the bond required. The object of the enactment was to impose that duty.

The installation of call boxes in offices and places of business for the accommodation of its patrons, the collection of the fee for the messenger service, and the retention of 40 per cent thereof, the advertisements that were issued to secure patronage show that the company evidently obtained a very fair share of the compensation paid for the service rendered.

This being in the nature of a criminal action, the evidence must prove a violation of the provision of the ordinance by a preponderance only, and such proof need not be direct. It may consist of a reasonable inference which the trial court was authorized to deduce from a consideration of the entire circumstances developed by the stipulated facts. When viewed in this light, it is believed that the company, notwithstanding its published disclaimer, undertook the delivery of packages, notes, etc., for hire; and, such being the case, the judgment be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

GEORGE C. MOORE, Respt.,
v.

ÆTNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Or. —, 146 Pac. 151.)

Insurance — accident — loss of hand — construction.

A policy providing compensation for accidental loss of hand by removal at or above the wrist covers an accident requiring the removal of all the bones of the fingers at the wrist, leaving only flesh enough to protect the bones remaining and the thumb in a stiffened and useless condition.

(February 16, 1915.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Snow & McCamant and MacCormac Snow, for appellant:

The loss of the use of a hand may be held to be the loss of a hand within the meaning of a policy which provides for indemnity in case of "the loss of a hand."

Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 618, 9 L.R.A. 685, 20 Am. St. Rep. 151, Note. — Accident insurance: extent of loss or mutilation contemplated by provision as to loss or removal of bodily member or part thereof.

As to what constitutes total disability within meaning of accident or health policy, see notes to Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. 38 L.R.A. 529; Keith v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 23 L.R.A. As to liability for indemnity against total disability which results from an injury for which an independent indemnity is provided, see note to Anderson v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 730.

Under provisions against loss of hands or feet, generally.

It has been a common contention of insurers that a recovery could not be had under accident policies insuring generally against the "loss" of hands or feet, where there has been no amputation or severance from the body of the injured member. The courts, however, have as a rule refused to give such meaning to these provisions, and have held that under them a recovery may be had if the insured, by reason of his

Where a policy provides that an indemnity will be paid in case of the removal or severance of a member of the body, the loss of the use of a member is not such a loss as will entitle the assured to the indemnity.

Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Ins. Asso. supra; Brotherhood of R. Trainmen v. Walsh, 89 Ohio St. 15, 103 N. E. 759.

Where a policy provides that an indemnity will be paid in case of the loss of a member, and uses other words which intimate that the loss referred to must be caused by the actual removal of that member, then a mere loss of the use of the member will not entitle the assured to the indemnity.

injury, has been deprived of the use of the member. This was the construction adopted in the following cases: Supreme Ct. of Honor v. Turner, 99 Ill. App. 310; Theorell v. Supreme Ct. of Honor, 115 Ill. App. 313; Sisson v. Supreme Ct. of Honor, 104 Mo. App. 54, 78 S. W. 297; Gahagan v. Morrissey, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 135; *Lord v. American Mut. Acci. Under provisions in substance providing for indemnity in case of the loss of hands or feet, there was held to be a loss within the meaning of the provision where there was an entire destruction of the use of both of a person's feet by paralysis caused by an accidental pistol wound in the back. Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 618, 9 L.R.A. 685, 20 Am. St. Rep. 151, 46 N. W. 799.

And also where a load of gun shot passed through the palm of the insured's hand, tearing the muscles of the thumb and injuring the abductor muscles, and destroying all practical use of the hand for laboring purposes. Supreme Ct. of Honor v. Turner, 99 Ill. App. 310.

And in Gahagan v. Morrissey, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 135, where the insured had lost the use of a hand, although he was employed by the company for which he was working when insured in another line of work, it was held that under a provision that any member suffering "the loss of a hand at or above the wrist joint" should be considered totally disabled, the entire loss of the use of a hand might fairly be regarded as coming within the terms of the policy, and that it did not necessarily apply only to cases of an amputation of the hand.

In the following cases under provisions providing for indemnity in case of the loss of hands or feet, the question whether there had been a loss warranting a recovery was held for the jury:

—where there was evidence that a hand was crushed so that it was of no practical use, although the whole hand was not removed. L.R.A.1915D.

moved, Sisson v. Supreme Ct. of Honor, 104 Mo. App. 54, 78 S. W. 297; —where there was evidence that the insured while working at his trade as a carpenter fell and received injuries resulting in paralysis of his lower limbs so that he was unable to stand without support, although he was able to move about with crutches, Theorell v. Supreme Ct. of Honor, 115 Ill. App. 313.

Although the last two cases are not entirely clear upon the point, the question held to be for the jury was evidently whether such facts existed as would, under the construction placed upon the provisions of the policy by the court, justify a recovery, and not whether certain facts when found would authorize a recovery under the language of the policy as construed by the jury.

And in Lord v. American Mut. Acci. Asso. 89 Wis. 19, 26 L.R.A. 741, 46 Am. St. Rep. 815, 61 N. W. 293, under a policy providing for a certain indemnity in case of injuries resulting in the loss of one or both hands causing immediate total disability, it was held a question of fact for the jury whether an injury resulting in the tearing off of three fingers, and a part of the other, and cutting the hand, and destroying the joint of the thumb, was the loss of one hand causing immediate and total disability.

It has been held that a recovery for the loss of one hand cannot be had under a policy providing for an indemnity for the loss of one entire hand and one entire foot, or of two entire hands or two entire feet, since such policy provides for an indemnity in case of loss of two, and not of one, limb or part of two limbs. Gentry v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 114.

In Stoner v. Yeomen of America, 160 Ill. App. 432, it was held that the insured had not suffered the "loss of a hand at or above the wrist" where he had lost his third and little finger, and injured the knuckle joint of the middle finger, but had at least half of the hand left, since it was held that he had not lost a hand at or above the wrist.

An insurance contract is to be interpreted according to its true character and purpose, and in the sense in which the insured had reason to suppose it was understood.

Hoffman v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 413, 88 Am. Dec. 337; Sneek v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun, 94, 34 N. Y. Supp. 545.

In a policy which undertakes to pay for

Asso. 150 Pa. 132, 16 L.R.A. 446, 24 Atl. 662, under an accident policy excluding liability for injuries resulting directly or indirectly from disease, and insuring against disablement by "the loss of one hand or foot," it was held that no recovery could be had where the insured's foot was not injured, but, by reason of an injury to his back, he was able to use it only when he wore a plaster jacket, which prevented the injury to his back affecting the use of his foot.

In Fidelity & C. Co. v. Hart, 142 Ky. 25, 133 S. W. 996, where an accident policy provided that if the insured should contract any disease which should result, independently of all causes, in permanent paralysis, whereby the insured should entirely lose the use of both hands or both feet or of one hand and one foot, and on the account of either of the conditions be permanently unable to engage in any work or occupation for wages or profit, a specified indemnity should be paid upon the filing of satisfactory proof of the continuance for fifty-two consecutive weeks of such paralysis; and it was further provided in another clause that written notice as early as might be reasonably possible must be given of disability for which a claim was to be made with full particulars, and that affirmative preliminary proofs of paralysis must be furnished within fourteen months from the date of the beginning of paralysis. The insured in the case claimed to recover because of the entire loss of the use of his left hand and foot caused by a stroke of paralysis. It was held that, in order to recover indemnity, the paralysis must have deprived the insured of the capacity to labor so as to earn wages for fifty-two consecutive weeks, but that it need not have been a total paralysis of the limbs at the beginning, but it was only necessary that within fifty-two weeks of its beginning it should have resulted in such total paralysis, and that this condition should have been permanent.

Provisions for indemnity in case of loss by means of physical separation, severance, or amputation.

In view of the court's refusal to construe provisions such as those considered in the L.R.A.1915D.

preceding subdivision as precluding a recovery unless there had been a severance or amputation of the hand or foot, the insurers have in some policies inserted express provisions whereby they have sought to limit their liability to injuries resulting in a physical separation, severance, or amputation of hands or feet. In their endeavor to thus limit their liability they have been reasonably successful.

Thus, under a policy providing that any member of a benefit association who should suffer the amputation or severance of an entire hand at or above the wrist joint should be considered totally and permanently disabled, but not otherwise, it has been held that no recovery can be had where a member receives an injury which necessitates the amputation of his thumb, and crushed and injured the hand from above the wrist joint so that he was permanently unable to use it to perform any manual service whatever. Brotherhood of R. Trainmen v. Walsh, 89 Ohio St. 15, 103 N. E. 759.

Under a policy providing for indemnity for total disability by "suffering, by means of a physical separation, the loss of four fingers of one hand at or above the third joint . . . providing the above amputations occur" it has been held that there could be no recovery where an insured receives an injury resulting in the amputation of the second, third, and fourth fingers above the third joint, and injuring the bone in the palm of the hand connecting with the first finger, and causing that finger to be deflected somewhat from its normal line, and a loss of about one half the power and efficiency of the finger, since such injury does not come within the language of the provision, as the insured's first finger and thumb remained attached to the hand. Mady v. Switchmen's Union, 116 Minn. 147, 133 N. W. 472.

And it has been held that the amputation of a person's foot so as to leave all of the heel and substantially all of the hollow of the foot, and possibly a part of the ball of the foot, does not give any right to the full amount of insurance on the ground that all the use of the foot is lost, under a by-law of a mutual benefit association providing loss of a member by removal, the effect, as well as the extent, of the severance, is to be considered. The specification of removal must be understood to refer to the manner, rather than to the exact physical extent, of the injury.

Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra; Fuller, Acci. & Employer's Liability Ins. p. 352.

McBride, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover upon an accident insurance policy. That portion thereof which is material to this case stipulates that the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover $1,000 if he should suffer accidental injuries resulting in the "loss of a hand by removal at or above the wrist." The plaintiff was accidentally shot in the hand, necessitating the removal of all the bones of the hand at the wrist except the metacarpal bone of the thumb. From the medical testimony, which is meager, and photographs taken about the time of the trial, it appears that the amputation began at the inner side of the left wrist, removing probably a small portion of the unciform bone, and including in the operation all the metacarpal bones of the four fingers at their articulation with the unciform, or magnum, and trapezoid, respectively. The os magnum, trapezoid, and trapezium are clearly left intact, and the for full payment in case of the "amputation of a limb (whole hand or foot)," as the word "whole" applies to the foot as well as to the hand, and the injury insured against is not the loss of the use of a hand or foot, but the amputation of a limb that should include a whole hand or whole foot. Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Ins. Asso. 122 Mich. 548, 48 L.R.A. 86, 80 Am. St. Rep. 588, 81 N. W. 326.

So, in Chevaliers v. Shearer, 27 Ohio C. C. 509, under a provision of the constitution providing for indemnity if the insured should "by accident lose one hand by amputation at or above the wrist," it was held that no recovery could be had where the insured's arm had been permanently disabled, and the full use and service of it practically destroyed, but neither the arm nor hand had been amputated.

In Sneck v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 81 Hun, 331, 30 N. Y. Supp. 881, under a policy providing indemnity for injuries "if loss by severance of one entire hand" should result, where the plaintiff's hand was cut off three fourths of an inch back of the knuckle joint and just back of the second bone of the thumb, it was held that to bring the case within the provisions the loss must be of the entire hand; the court remarking that this meant substantially the entire hand both in respect to its structure and use, and stated that in that case there was upon the undisputed evidence not such a loss in either respect.

But on a subsequent appeal of this case 88 Hun, 94, 34 N. Y. Supp. 545, affirmed in 156 N. Y. 669, 50 N. E. 1122, after the plaintiff had testified substantially that he had no use of the injured member as a hand, and never had since the accident, although he admitted that upon the former trial he had probably testified that he could use it to place under and against objects for the purpose of lifting and pushing, it was held that the term "entire hand" was to be taken in its general acceptance and ordinary meaning, the court saying that it would seem to be an extremely narrow and technical construction to say that only a physical removal of every particle of that portion of the human anatomy known as the hand would entitle the insured to recover L.R.A.1915D.

under the provision of the policy; and it was held erroneous for the court to hold as a matter of law that the insured had not suffered a loss by severance of one entire hand.

See also the decision in MOORE v. AETNA L. Ins. Co., construing a provision for indemnity for injuries resulting in "the loss of a hand by removal at or above the wrist."

Provision for loss of arm.

It has been held that the amputation of an arm a little below the elbow is the "loss of an arm" within the meaning of a policy which does not mention whether the loss insured against is a loss by amputation below or above the elbow joint. Garcelon v. Commercial Travelers' Eastern Acci. Asso. 184 Mass. 8, 100 Am. St. Rep. 540, 67 N. E. 868.

Provisions as to breaking of leg.

It has been held that the construction of a provision for an indemnity if the insured should "accidentally break his leg or arm" is for the court. Rogers v. Modern Brotherhood, 131 Mo. App. 353, 111 S. W. 518.

It was further held in that case that the definition of the word "leg" as used in the policy should not be influenced by the meaning placed on it by specialists, since the word has a well-defined common meaning, and it was accordingly held that evidence to define the word should not be admitted, but that the court should ascertain its meaning from the language of the contract.

It was also held that the policy which provided for indemnity if the insured should "break his leg or arm" covered fractures of bones of the limbs, whether such bones were in the hands or feet or were in the upper or central divisions of the limbs, and it was accordingly held that a fracture of the heel bone was covered by the policy.

In Peterson v. Modern Brotherhood, 125 Iowa, 562, 67 L.R.A. 631, 101 N. W. 289, a Pott's fracture, consisting of the breaking of one bone of the lower leg between the knee and ankle joint, and a severance of the malleolus process of the other one so as to effect a complete solution of the continuity of both bones, was held not to be covered by a policy providing for indemnity in case bones of the thumb, while possibly injured by the shot, retain their continuity. The thumb itself was not removed, although the ball of that member was partially destroyed and the ligaments so injured that it is stiff and entirely useless. The medical witness stated that in his opinion it would have been better to have removed what remained of the thumb, so that plaintiff could have had an artificial hand. There was enough of the flesh of the hand to cover the bones of the wrist forming what the medical witness termed "a bunch of hardened callous" at the end of the wrist, probably no more than good surgery would require for the protection of the bones of the wrist. The cause was tried without the intervention of a jury, and the court found that the plaintiff had suffered the loss of his hand at the wrist, and rendered judgment in his favor, from which defendant appeals.

Defendant's contention is that the loss of a hand by removal at or above the wrist means that the entire hand must be physically separated from the body at or above the wrist; and the logical sequence of this argument is that if any fragment, useful or useless, is not so removed, the plaintiff has not brought himself within the terms of his policy, and cannot recover. The question is one of extreme nicety, and there is a dearth of decisions covering the exact point here involved; there being no case cited by counsel or discovered by us involving the construction of a policy exactly identical in its terms with the one upon which this action is predicated. Thus in Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 618, 9 L.R.A. 685, 20 Am. St. Rep. 151, 46 N. W. 799, where a policy was issued against the loss of a hand or foot, it was held that the insured, who was shot in the back, the injury completely of the breaking of the shafts of both bones between the knee and ankle joints, since the shaft of the bone was held to be distinct from the malleolus process, so that such a break did not come within the definition of the breaking of a leg contained in the policy.

Provisions as to loss of eyesight.

It has been held that the words, "total and permanent loss of the sight of both eyes," means the loss of eyesight, when used in a policy insuring a person who has but one eye, where this fact is known to the insurer, and that a recovery for the specified indemnity may be had where the insured loses the sight of his eye. Humphreys v. National Ben. Asso. 139 Pa. 264, 11 L.R.A. 564, 20 Atl. 1047.

And under a policy defining permanent total disability to be "a complete and irrevocable loss of sight in both eyes," and permanent partial disability to be "a complete and irrevocable loss of sight in one eye," where the insured had only one eye at the time the policy was issued, which was known to the insurer's agent, and he afterwards lost the sight of the other eye, this was held to be a "complete and irrevocable loss of sight to both eyes." Bawden v. London, E. & G. Assur. Co. [1892] 2 Q. B. 534, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 792, 57 J. P. 116.

In Maynard v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Asso. 16 Utah, 145, 67 Am. St. Rep. 602, 51 Pac. 259, under a by-law of a mutual benefit association providing for a certain indemnity in case of injury causing a "total and permanent loss of eyesight," which was in force when a member of the association, who was a locomotive engineer, received an injury which immediately affected his eyesight, and about a year later resulted in the permanent loss of the sight of one eye, which disabled him from pursuing his usual occupation, it was held that a recovery might be had, since L.R.A.1915D.

the by-law did not provide that the benefit should not be received unless the injuries were such as to cause the loss of the sight of both eyes, and since the object of the association was the mutual protection and relief of its members, and an amendment of the by-law passed after the injury, but before the loss of sight of the eye became permanent, allowing recovery in case of "total and permanent loss of one or both eyes," was held to make the true meaning of the provisions more apparent.

In Phillippy v. Homesteaders, 140 Iowa, 562, 118 N. W. 880, it was held that the loss of one eye did not entitle the insured to any recovery under a policy providing for the payment of an indemnity for "the loss of the sight of both eyes," since the provision necessarily excluded as a ground for benefit the loss of one eye.

In this case there was held to be no ambiguity in the provision allowing a benefit in case of "the loss of the sight of both eyes," and evidence that it was the intention and understanding of the insured that he was to have a right to recover in case of the loss of the sight of one eye was held inadmissible to change the terms of the contract. Ibid.

It has been held that under a policy providing for a specified indemnity if an accident should result in the loss "of the entire sight of one eye," a recovery may be had where there is a practical loss of the entire sight of the eye, it being held not necessary that the whole sight should be destroyed in order to warrant a recovery. International Travelers' Asso. v. Rogers, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 163 S. W. 421.

In this case where there was testimony that, although the insured could see to some extent out of his injured eye, he could not use it for reading or rely on it to get about with, the evidence was held sufficient to show a loss of the entire sight of the eye within the provision of the policy. Ibid.

J. T. W

paralyzing the lower limbs so that both his feet were rendered useless, could recover although there was no physical severance of either foot; the court holding that the phrases covering the loss of a foot should be construed to include the loss of the use of it. There are a number of decisions to the same effect, but in none of these do the words, "by removal," which are used in the policy here considered, appear.

We will now consider the cases cited by counsel for defendant, where the words, "by removal," or their equivalent, "by severance," are contained in the policy. The first of these is Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Ins. Asso. 122 Mich. 548, 48 L.R.A. 86, 80 Am. St. Rep. 598, 81 N. W. 328, where the policy was issued against "injuries which alone shall cause the amputation of a limb (whole hand or foot)." The plaintiff in that case suffered an injury which resulted in an amputation of about one third of the foot, leaving all of the heel, substantially all of the hollow of the foot, and possibly part of the ball of the foot; the policy having been conditioned upon the amputation of "the whole of the foot." The court held that he could not recover even though he claimed in his testimony that the remaining portion of the foot was useless. The opinion contains an interesting résumé of the cases bearing upon this subject, and distinguishes between the case then in hand and Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun, 94, 34 N. Y. Supp. 545, hereafter to be noticed. Another of the cases is Chevaliers v. Shearer, 27 Ohio C. C. 509, in which the plaintiff was insured against loss of the hand by amputation. He received an injury whereby he lost the complete use of his hand; but no part of it was amputated, and it was held that the injury was not within the terms of the policy. In Mady v. Switchmen's Union, 116 Minn. 147, 133 N. W. 472, the plaintiff was insured against injury occasioned by physical separation of four fingers at or above the third joint. The proof showed that he had lost three fingers by amputation at the third joint, and that the fourth finger was injured so as to impair its usefulness 50 per cent. It was held that this injury was not within the terms of the policy. In Stoner v. Yeoman of America, 160 Ill. App. 432, plaintiff was insured against injury by loss of a hand at or above the wrist. The evidence showed that he had at least half of the hand left. The court held he could not recover, saying: "He [plaintiff] testified he could use the hand to drive nails, but that he did not have much strength in it; that he had worked at the carpenter's trade earning $2 a day since the injury. It is clear that plaintiff's hand was badly injured, but he has the use of more than half the hand, so that he has not lost a hand at or above the wrist."

How different from the case at bar, where substantially nothing remains of plaintiff's hand but a worse than useless fragment!

Another case is Brotherhood of R. Trainmen v. Walsh, 89 Ohio St. 18, 103 N. E. 769, where plaintiff in the court below was insured against suffering the "amputation of the entire hand at or above the wrist." One finger was amputated, leaving the rest of the hand, as he claimed, useless. It was held that he could not recover. In this case, like the case of Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Ins. Asso. supra, the court distinguishes the case in hand from Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, much relied upon by respondent here, saying: "The circuit court, in its opinion, refers to the case of Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, and holds that the law announced there is applicable. In that case, the policy of insurance provided against loss, by severance, of one entire hand. The insured lost only a portion of his hand; but it appeared that the part remaining was useless, and it was held that plaintiff had lost his 'entire hand,' within the meaning of the policy providing for such loss. In the regulation under consideration here, the word 'loss' is eliminated, and the association limited its liability to cases where an entire hand is actually amputated or severed. If, under the regulation in question, defendant in error is entitled to recover for the loss of the use of his entire hand, which has been severed in part only, then the words, 'at or above the wrist joint,' would serve no purpose."

The foregoing are the leading cases cited to support defendant's contention. They may be divided into three classes: (a) Where no part of the hand or foot has been severed, but where it has become useless by reason of an injury to some other part of the body, as in the case of the man who was paralyzed by being shot in the back; (b) where some portion of the injured member has been severed, but some useful portion still remains, as in the case of Mady v. Switchmen's Union, supra, or the case of Stoner v. Yeomen of America, supra, where there was a partial amputation, but enough of the injured member left to enable the injured person to use it imperfectly in his ordinary business; or (c) where there was an injury requiring the amputation of a comparatively small part of the injured member, the larger portion remaining but practically useless. In our opinion the case at bar does not come within any of these classifications, either in letter or spirit, and the plaintiff must be held to be within the true meaning and spirit of the policy.

It is a thoroughly settled rule in the construction of a policy of insurance which is reasonably susceptible of two interpretations, that that meaning will be given to it which is more favorable to the insured. Hoffman v. Aetna Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 413, 88 Am. Dec. 337; Darrow v. Family Fund Soc. 116 N. Y. 537, 6 L.R.A. 495, 15 Am. St. Rep. 430, 22 N. E. 1093; American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 133, 42 L. ed. 977, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 552; Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra. This is but giving effect to the maxim of Lord Bacon quoted in the case of Hoffman v. Aetna Ins. Co. supra, namely: "All words, . . . whether they be in deeds or statutes or otherwise, if they be general, and not express and precise, shall be restrained unto the fitness of the matter and the person."

And it is also observed in the same opinion: "It is a rule of law, as well as of ethics, that where the language of a promisor may be understood in more senses than one, it is to be interpreted in the sense in which he had reason to suppose it was understood by the promisee. . . . It is also a familiar rule of law that, if it be left in doubt, in view of the general tenor of the instrument and the relations of the contracting parties, whether given words were used in an enlarged or a restricted sense, other things being equal, that construction should be adopted which is most beneficial to the promisee."

Now, in view of these salutary maxims of the jurists, let us consider the relations of the parties and the object which plaintiff had in view when he took out this policy. He had a good hand against losing the use of which he desired to insure. If he had been told the intent and meaning of the policy was such that if in case of a necessary amputation the surgeon should leave some useless shred of his hand to be a source of annoyance and inconvenience, and thereby his policy would be practically worthless, does any sane person believe for a moment he would have taken out the policy? The substance of what he sought was insurance against the possible loss of his hand as a useful member of his body. Substantially he has lost his hand by removal at the wrist. In view of all the decisions, it is apparent that the words, "by removal at or above the wrist," were introduced as a safeguard against possible fraud, and to prevent a recovery in cases where there had been no substantial removal of the injured member; but here the hand, as a hand, is gone. Practically the plaintiff has no hand. What occasioned this practical loss of his hand? The answer must be the gunshot wound, L.R.A.1915D.

and the consequent removal at the wrist of all that made the member useful. An insurer should not be allowed, by the use of obscure phrases and exceptions, to defeat the very purpose for which the policy was procured. This rule finds support in Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, which is in many respects similar to the case at bar. The plaintiff was insured against "loss by severance of one entire hand." It appeared from the testimony that 13 of the 27 bones of the hand were gone; that nearly one half of the hand anatomically speaking remained, but was useless. The court held that he was entitled to recover, and used this language: "To require the insured to submit to a strictly literal interpretation of the contract prepared for him by the insurer, without regard to the purpose of the contract or the understanding thereof by the parties, would be to hold that only in case of the severance of the entire hand in a most accurately anatomical or technical sense could the insured recover under the clause of the policy. We do not believe that such a conclusion is required in the present case. The term 'entire hand' is to be taken in its general acceptance and ordinary meaning. In construing this contract the law does not require an injury which comes within a strictly accurate and technical definition of the words employed, but one which reasonably, fairly, and practically comes within the meaning of the terms employed in their general and usual meaning and acceptance. In a contract of insurance providing for indemnity for the loss of a limb, the compensation to be paid is not merely for the physical pain of its amputation, but principally for the deprivation of its use as a member of the body. It would seem to be an extremely narrow and technical construction of this contract to say that only a physical removal of every particle of that portion of the human anatomy known as the hand would entitle the insured to recover under the clause of the policy now under consideration. Is it not more reasonable and logical to conclude that, in the use of the language above referred to, the 'entire hand' as a part of the human structure is considered in connection with the use to which it is adapted, and the injury which the loss of such use would entail? Is it not also fair to assume that this was regarded by the parties as the sense in which the contract was to be understood, and was one of the considerations which influenced the insured to enter into the contract?"

This case was afterwards affirmed by the court of appeals in a memorandum opinion, which does not further discuss the legal points involved. A further case having some features in common with the case at bar is Garcelon v. Commerical Travelers' Eastern Acci. Asso. 184 Mass. 8, 100 Am. St. Rep. 540, 67 N. E. 868. Plaintiff was insured against the loss of an arm, and suffered an accident necessitating the amputation of his arm below the elbow. There, as here, the defendant contended that the loss of a portion of an arm was not the "loss of an arm" within the meaning of the policy; but the court overruled its contention. In Fuller v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Ins. Asso. 122 Mich. 553, 48 L.R.A. 86, 80 Am. St. Rep. 598, 81 N. W. 326, the court, after citing authorities, remarks: "These cases establish the proposition that where an insurance policy insures against the loss of a member, or the loss of an entire member, the word 'loss' should be construed to mean the destruction of the usefulness of the member, or the entire member, for the purposes to which, in its normal condition, it was susceptible of application. In all of these policies the word 'loss' is used, and it is the loss of the member that is in terms insured against. As indicated in the last authority cited, the attempts of the insurance companies to avoid this construction by so changing the policy that it reads, 'loss by severance of feet or hands,' have failed; the courts holding, as before, that it is the loss of the use of the member which was the object of the contract."

1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 301, sums up the authorities as follows: "It has been contended on behalf of the insurance companies that the provisions in regard to the 'loss' of the hands and feet must be understood to imply an actual amputation or physical severance of those members from the body. But this view has not met with favor from the courts; it being held that, to entitle the insured to recover, physical severance is unnecessary, but it is sufficient if he has been deprived entirely of the use of the feet and hands as members of the body. And there can scarcely be any doubt as to the soundness of this view, for if the feet and hands cannot be used for the purpose of moving about or walking, or for holding and handling things, they are in fact lost as much as though actually severed from the body. Many of the companies have altered their policies so as to read, 'the loss of feet or hands by severance' thereof; but this provision has been held to be intended to refer to the manner rather than to the exact physical extent of the injury."

We do not cite these excerpts as being precisely in point in the present case, but rather to indicate the tendency of the courts to adhere to the spirit rather than the strict letter of these contracts; and, construing this policy in accordance with its spirit and substance, we hold that the plaintiff has suffered the loss of his hand by removal at the wrist, and therefore affirm the judgment.

Messrs. T. H. Conniff and Harry P. Atwater, for respondent:

Sanders, as plaintiff's agent, had no authority to appoint any subagent, or to receive anything but money; and any money deposited by Barnes Brothers in the bank was not in accordance with the authority, and would, therefore, not be binding upon the plaintiff.

Gates, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On or about April 1, 1913, respondent applied to S. E. Sanders of Wall, South Dakota, for a loan upon 160 acres of land owned by her. She caused a formal application to be executed, which contained, among other things, the following: "The statements made in this application are made by me for the purpose of obtaining a loan of money from John Hayes of Fort Pierre, South Dakota, and are true to the best of my knowledge and belief. . . . I hereby appoint and constitute S. E. Sanders, my agent, for the purpose of procuring said loan, and to whom I do hereby grant full authority to receive the funds herein applied for. Payment to my said agent of the amount due me under this loan shall be construed and held to be sufficient consideration for the execution and delivery to the mortgagee of the papers given for said loan."

This application was forwarded to John Hayes of Ft. Pierre. Mr. Hayes procured an abstract of title, approved the loan, and sent to respondent two mortgages for execution, both running to appellant Barnes Brothers, a corporation, one for the sum of $350, and one for the sum of $43.75. Upon the return of the executed mortgages to him, Mr. Hayes sent all of the papers, including the application, to Barnes Brothers, of Minneapolis, with instructions to deposit the money in a bank at Minneapolis to the credit and advice of the Citizens' State Bank of Ft. Pierre, of which Mr. Hayes was president. About that time the bank at Ft. Pierre was taken in charge by the state bank examiner, who has proceeded to wind up the affairs of the bank. The proceeds of the loan have never been paid to respondent nor to her agent, S. E. Sanders, but it is claimed by appellants that the money was virtually paid to respondent by reason of the fact that the books of the bank at Ft. Pierre show a credit to her. This action was begun in July, 1913, for the purpose of canceling said mortgages of record. It was alleged in the complaint that Barnes Brothers assigned the first mortgage to appellant Charles Schmit, by assignment duly recorded. Said defendant answered, separately admitting that the mortgage had been assigned to him, alleged that, before the commencement of the action, he had resold the same to Barnes Brothers, and he disclaimed any interest therein. Trial was had by the court, which made findings of fact and conclusions of law for the plaintiff, and entered judgment canceling the said mortgages of record. From the judgment and order denying a new trial, defendants appeal.

As we view this case, there are only two questions of importance to decide. The first relates to the authority of the mortgagee to pay the proceeds of the loan to any person other than the plaintiff or the agent Sanders. Our attention has been called to a number of decisions, where the actual custodian of the money failed to account to the borrower, and to decisions where the question of usury was involved, and to decisions where the question of knowledge of an encumbrance by the loan agent was involved, all of which we have carefully examined. But the principle involved in this case was absent from those cases. Here the question is: To whom should Barnes Brothers have paid the money? The claim of appellants that the corporation, Barnes Brothers, was an innocent purchaser for value from Hayes, is not sustained by the proof. It was the original mortgagee. Hayes was simply an agent. Whether he was agent for it or for the borrower in procuring the loan is immaterial in this case. If he was agent for the borrower, payment to him might, under certain circumstances, be held to be payment to the borrower. In the absence of a provision in the application for the loan designating the party to whom payment should be made, the lender, upon the authority of the cases cited, might have been protected by payment to John Hayes. But here there was a positive appointment of S. E. Sanders as agent to receive the money. The lender received this application. It must be held to be charged with knowledge of its contents. Whatever relation Hayes or the bank at Ft. Pierre bore to the respondent in the making of this loan, such relation did not authorize Barnes Brothers to make payment to them in the face of an explicit written declaration making Sanders her agent for the purpose of receiving the money. We are therefore compelled to hold that in failing to pay the money to the agent Sanders, or to the plaintiff, the appellant Barnes Brothers made payment to Hayes or the bank at Ft. Pierre, if it did so, at its own risk. Until the proceeds of the loan were paid to the borrower or to her agent, Sanders, there was no completion of the loan on the part of the lender. Therefore there was no consideration for the notes and mortgages given by the respondent to Barnes Brothers. 27 Cyc. 1054.

But it is contended that, even if the mortgages were invalid, the first mortgage of $350 was assigned to Schmit, a bona fide holder in due course before maturity, and that, when Schmit resold and assigned the same to the corporation Barnes Brothers, it took the mortgage freed from any defense that may have existed when it first held the paper. Some of the sections of the negotiable instruments act of 1913 (Laws 1913, chap. 279) are cited in support of this contention. That act was not in force when this transaction was had. We are of the opinion that, in repurchasing the paper, Barnes Brothers took it subject to the same defenses that existed when it first held it. We approve the reasoning of Mr. Justice Cooley on this subject in Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515, viz.: "It is perfectly true, as a general rule, that the bona fide holder of negotiable paper has a right to sell the same, with all the rights and equities attaching to it in his own hands, to whoever may see fit to buy of him, whether such purchaser was aware of the original infirmity or not. Without this right he would not have the full protection which the law merchant designs to afford him, and negotiable paper would cease to be a safe and reliable medium for the exchanges of commerce. For, if one can stop the negotiability of paper against which there is no defense, by giving notice that a defense once existed while it was held by another, it is obvious that an important element in its value is at once taken away. But I am not aware that this rule has ever been applied to a purchase by the original payee, nor can I perceive that it is essential to the protection of the innocent indorsee that it should be. It cannot be very important to him that there is one person incapable of succeeding to his equities, and who consequently would not be likely to become a purchaser. If he may sell to all the rest of the community, the market value of his security is not likely to be affected by the circumstance that a single individual cannot compete for its purchase, especially when we consider that the nature of negotiable securities is such that their market value is very little influenced by competition. Nor do I perceive that any rule or principle of law would be violated by permitting the maker to set up this defense against the payee, when he becomes indorsee, with the same effect as he might have done before it had been sold at all, or that there is any valid reason against it. . . . If the defendant had a legal and just defense to the note, either in whole or in part, arising from the conduct of the plaintiff, it was the duty of the latter to recognize and allow it, and he had no moral right to cut it off, or to attempt so to do, by any transfer. But having done so, and afterwards acquired the note a second time, the law, we think, will not permit him to take advantage of this wrong, but will remit the defendant to his original rights. Such, we think, should be the rule, because it avoids circuity of action, expense to the parties, and inconvenience to the courts, without, at the same time, endangering any substantial rights."

See also note in 54 L.R.A. 673.

Considerable evidence was received, both oral and documentary, that was not admissible. But there was sufficient competent evidence to sustain the findings and decision of the trial court.

Finding no prejudicial error, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF TENNESSEE EX REL. BELL
v.
WILL CUMMINGS et al.

(130 Tenn. 566, 172 S. W. 290.)

County — control by legislature over funds.

The legislature may divert the proceeds of bonds issued by a county under statutory authority for the construction of a particular highway to the construction of other highways within the county.

(December 12, 1914.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Hamilton County in complainant's favor in a mandamus proceeding to compel defendants to proceed with the construction of a system of highways substituted for that for which bonds had been issued. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. H. Ford for appellants.

Messrs. Cooke, Swaney, & Hope and T. S. Myers for the State.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1909 the general assembly passed an act authorizing Hamilton county to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $65,000, for the purpose of building a road across Lookout mountain, in that county. Acts 1909, chap. 417. The bonds were shortly thereafter voted and sold, realizing $65,000. A commission was appointed to supervise the construction of that road, but for some reason the fund was allowed to remain in bank almost wholly unused.

The general assembly at its 1913 session passed an act amending the above act of 1909 so as "to provide for the diversion of the fund arising from the sale of said bonds to other roads in said county, and to provide for the manner in which said funds shall be expended." Private Acts 1913, chap. 272.

The bill of complaint alleged these facts, in substance, and the further facts that Cummings, county judge and financial agent of the county, and the other defendants, who are the public road commissioners of the county, refused to recognize the act of 1913 as constitutional or in operation, and refused to proceed, after due demand, with the construction of the substituted system of highways. A mandamus was prayed for.

The defendants demurred and answered, contesting on several grounds that the amendatory act of 1913 is not constitutional,

Note.—Right of state to authorize or direct diversion of county funds to purpose other than that for which collected.

This note is confined to the consideration of the question of the power of a state legislature to change the purpose for which a county fund was raised. The question of the right of the legislature to apportion a county fund among different localities within the county, where there is no diversion to other purposes, is not within the scope. For such cases, see Sanderson v. Texarkana, 103 Ark. 529, 146 S. W. 106; Duval County but the chancellor decreed against them and in favor of complainants. This appeal resulted. Only one phase of defendants' case on appeal will be dealt with in this opinion, the others being disposed of orally and in the decree of this court.

The chief contention of the appellants is that, after the bonds were voted, issued, and sold for a specific purpose, that of constructing a highway over Lookout mountain, it was not in the power of the legislature to divert the fund, in whole or in part, to the construction of different roads, as was attempted by the act of 1913.

This involves a consideration of the relation sustained by a county as a public corporation to the state. In Demoville v. Davidson County, 87 Tenn. 214, 225, 10 S. W. 353, it was said: "The county is but an emanation from the state. It does not exercise any power or franchise under any contract between itself and the state. The latter creates, and it may destroy. The state delegates the power of taxation, but it may withdraw such power, and itself assess taxes for municipal purposes."

In the absence of constitutional restraints, and our Constitution contains none, it was declared in Luehrman v. Taxing Dist. 2 Lea, 425, 438, the maxim of republican government that local affairs should be managed in the local district is subject to such exceptions as the legislative power shall see fit to make.

"The legislature has the power to do whatever is not expressly, or by necessary implication, forbidden by the Constitution."

Ibid. Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 511, 28 L. ed. 204; Redistricting Cases, 111 Tenn. 234, 290, 80 S. W. 750.

It follows that a county as a mere arm of the sovereign power can have, as against the legislative power of the sovereign, no vested rights in the powers conferred upon it for governmental purposes, and that the legislature has plenary power to make provi-

v. Jacksonville, 36 Fla. 196, 29 L.R.A. 416, 18 So. 339; Hannibal v. Marion County, 69 Mo. 571.

The opinion expressed by Justice Field in Tippecanoe County v. Lucas, 93 U. S. 108, 23 L. ed. 822, set out in STATE EX REL. BELL v. CUMMINGS, that a county's tenure of property derived from the state for specific public purposes, or obtained for such purposes through means which the state alone can authorize, that is, taxation, is so far subject to the control of the legislature that the property may be applied to other public uses than those originally designated,—is sustained by the other cases in point, except so far as the power of the legislature in the premises has been limited by specific constitutional provisions.

The extent of the decision in STATE EX REL. BELL v. CUMMINGS would seem to be that the legislature may direct or authorize the diversion of a county fund so long as it is not to the purpose of another municipality. The decision finds support in Cage v. Hogg, 1 Humph. 49, where it was held that the legislature had power to convert a county internal improvement fund, which had been donated to the county by the state, into a common-school fund of the county, the court stating that the fact that the legislature has power to change direction of a donation to a county before it has been appropriated or a right acquired under it is too plain a proposition to require argument.

That none of the principles of taxation laid down in the Missouri Constitution were violated by an act directing a county to appropriate part of its funds to pay a portion of the police expenses of a city situated within the county was held in State ex rel. Police Comrs. v. County Ct. 34 Mo. 546, although the act directed the appropriation of county money already collected for a specific purpose. The court stated that the L.R.A.1915D.

specific purposes for which the money was collected were those heretofore directed by the legislature, and this act, being a later expression of the will of the legislature, controls the subject, and, so far as it conflicts with previous acts, repeals them.

The court said further, in the course of its opinion, that it is immaterial "in considering the constitutional authority of the general assembly to pass the act in question, to inquire how the county has acquired or may acquire the money necessary to make the payments required by the act. The money belongs to the county by virtue of acts of the general assembly, and is expended under the direction of the same authority. Counties are subdivisions of the state in which some of the powers of the state government are exercised by local functionaries for local purposes; in this instance, and generally, the functionary being the county court. The funds of the county are not strictly private property. They certainly do not belong to the citizens who may have contributed them. They are rather public property, the property of the state acquired from the people and the property in the county, and to be used and expended for the benefit of the same people and property. The general assembly, having the legislative power of the state, determines to what local uses the county funds shall be applied. . . . No vested right is taken away or impaired by the act, nor does it impair the obligation of any contract. It simply directs the application, to a particular purpose, of funds collected by the authority of the legislature, and over which the legislature could exercise a power to direct their application within certain limits, which include the object of this act. The previous acts of the legislature which provided the object for which county funds could be expended were at all times subject to repeal or alteration sion respecting and to direct the expenditure of the funds of a county raised and held by it under or based upon the taxing power delegated to it.

In the case of Tippecanoe County v. Lucas, 93 U. S. 108, 23 L. ed. 822, it appeared that the legislature of Indiana had by an act (1872) directed the restoration to taxpayers of a county of property that had been exacted from them by taxation, under a previous statute, so long as it remained in the possession of the county. Mr. Justice Field, holding that this exercise of power on the part of the legislature infringed no provision of the Federal Constitution said: "In this court also the validity of the act of 1872 is the sole question presented. The act is assailed here, as in the court below, as authorizing an invasion of the right of private property, and as impairing the obligation of an executed contract. Were the transaction one between the state and a private individual the invalidity of the act would not be a matter of serious doubt. Private property cannot be taken from individuals by the state, except for public purposes, and then only upon compensation, or by way of taxation; and any enactments to that end would be regarded as an illegitimate and unwarranted exercise of legislative power. And any attempt by the legislature to take private property from its grantee and restore it to its grantor would be in conflict with the constitutional inhibition against impairing the obligation of contracts. But between the state and municipal corporations, such as cities, counties, and towns, the relation is different from that between the state and the individual. Municipal corporations are mere instrumentalities of the state, for the convenient administration of government; and their powers may be qualified, enlarged, or withdrawn at the pleasure of the legislature. Their tenure of property, derived from the state for specific public purposes, or obtained for such purposes through means which the state alone can authorize—that is, taxation—is so far subject to the control of the legislature that the property may be applied to other public uses of the municipality than those originally designated. This follows from the nature of such bodies and the dependent character of their existence. But property, derived by them from other sources, is often held, by the terms of its grant, for special uses, from which it cannot be diverted by the legislature. In such cases, the property is protected by all the guards against legislative interference possessed by individuals and private corporations for their property."

so as to appropriate the funds in a manner or to objects different from those before provided. No rights have been vested under the previous acts which can be disturbed by this act."

It would seem from this decision that the only limitation placed upon the power of the legislature to divert the county fund is that it could not be diverted where a vested right had obtained to the fund, and this would seem to be the position of the Nevada court, as in Youngs v. Hall, 9 Nev. 212, it was said that while the revenue of a county is controlled by the legislature, such control does not extend to depriving a creditor of funds raised for the payment of his demand, to which he has a vested right.

But an act directing that license fees levied and collected by the parish in towns of the parish be held for the benefit of such towns, and any unexpended balance paid over to them, was held in State ex rel. Mansfield v. Police Jury, 47 La. Ann. 1244, 17 So. 792, to be in conflict with article 202 of the Constitution, which declares that the taxing power may be exercised by the general assembly for state purposes and by parishes and municipal corporations under authority granted to them by the general assembly for parish and municipal purposes.

The court stated: "We agree in opinion with the district judge, that the framers of the Constitution intended to keep separate and distinct the taxing power of the state, L.R.A.1915D.

that of the parishes, and that of the municipal corporations; that they never intended, in declaring that this power should be exercised by the parishes and municipal corporations 'under authority granted to them by the general assembly,' that this authority should extend to empowering either of them to do so for purposes other than those in which each were directly concerned. It is easy to see that through this act the taxing power of the towns could be supplemented by that of the parishes for town purposes."

The court further said: "But we fail to see the authority under and by which the general assembly can, after the parishes, in the exercise within constitutional limits of their taxing power, have acted for parish purposes, step in and apply the moneys arising from this legal exercise of their rights to purposes other than those which, in the opinion of the parish authorities, made the levy of the taxes and the imposition of the licenses necessary,—taxes and licenses which they never would have levied or imposed,—if they were to be forcedly taken away from them under orders of the general assembly. When the police jury exercises its authority to impose licenses through the parish, it necessarily does so by ordinances general in their character, necessarily taking in people within as well as without the towns,—its purpose is to utilize the moneys for general parish purposes,—and it is difficult to see by what authority it can be prevented from doing

The distinction thus taken by Mr. Justice Field between funds acquired and held by a county in the exercise of the governmental function of taxation and funds or property held in its quasi private or proprietary right is maintained in many cases. Worcester v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. 196 U. S. 539, 49 L. ed. 591, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327; Mt. Hope Cemetery v. Boston, 158 Mass. 509, 35 Am. St. Rep. 515, 33 N. E. 695; 1 McQuillin, Mun. Corp. §§ 230-232. The first is declared not entitled to "constitutional protection," while the latter is so safeguarded and may not be diverted by legislative act.

As demonstrating an equivalent power of the legislature of the state, this court held in Demoville v. Davidson County, supra, that the legislature could release individuals from liability to a county incurred by way of a privilege tax, assessed by the county under due legislative power, although the demand had been reduced to judgment before the act was passed that provided for the release.

In Worcester v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. supra, the Supreme Court of the United States (affirming 182 Mass. 49, 64 N. E. 581) held that the legislature could modify or terminate a contract, made by a municipality with a street railway company, and so by an arbitrary order from the legislature that a particular portion of the fund should be devoted exclusively to the interests of one particular portion of the parish, and then only in a certain contingency, which not happening, the moneys are not to be held in the parish treasury for other parish purposes, nor to be returned to the parties who paid the licenses, but to be turned over to the towns, who in the meantime may have exercised their power of taxing and licensing their own inhabitants up to the full constitutional limit."

In National Bank v. Barber, 24 Kan. 534, an act diverting to township purposes of certain towns the county tax arising from certain property situated in such towns was held to be in contravention of the constitutional provision that "no tax shall be levied except in pursuance of law, which shall distinctly state the object of the same; to which object only shall such tax be applied."

And by virtue of the same constitutional provision, it was held in Smith v. Haney, 73 Kan. 506, 85 Pac. 550, that an act permitting the diversion of unexpended balance of general revenue tax to the building of a courthouse was unconstitutional, the building of a courthouse being considered a special or extraordinary matter, and not one included in the purposes for which the general tax levy is made.

substitute another and different method of paving the city streets by the company, and this without the consent and notwithstanding the objection of the city.

The Worcester Case related to the superior power of the legislature over the city's streets. The control of highways is primarily a state duty, to be taken in immediate charge at will through its own agents. Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 48 L. ed. 148, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224. As was said by Chief Justice Gibson in O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 187, 189: "To the commonwealth here, as to the King in England, belongs the franchise of every highway as a trustee for the public. . . . In England a public road is called the King's highway; and though it is not usually called the commonwealth's highway here, it is so in contemplation of law, for it exists only by force of the commonwealth's authority."

It is to be observed, therefore, that in the case before us the legislature attempted to deal with a subject-matter within the province, highways, and that its effort to do so was by way of controlling that which had come into existence under its authority, funds produced by bonds to be redeemed by taxes.

In either or both aspects, it was within in pursuance of law, and every law imposing a tax shall state distinctly the object of the same, to which only it shall be applied," it was held in State ex rel. Lima v. Pohling, 1 Ohio C. C. 486, that an act providing that so much of the county road tax as was levied and collected in a certain city, together with any balance of such tax which may remain unexpended, levied, and collected in such city, shall be expended within the corporate limits of that city under the direction of the council, was unconstitutional.

In Nashville v. Towns, 5 Sneed, 186, it was held that an act providing that the county revenues collected within the limits of a certain city in such county shall be turned over to the treasurer of such city, to be expended therein, was in violation of the constitutional provision that "the general assembly shall have power to authorize the several counties and incorporated towns in this state to impose taxes for county and corporation purposes respectively in such manner as shall be prescribed by law." The court stated that the county court levies the taxes with a view of providing for the current expenses of the county, and if the legislature has the power to divert the funds thus levied to other and different purposes, it has the power to bankrupt the county at pleasure. The court in STATE EX REL. BELL v. CUMMINGS observed that the constitutional provision just referred to is the only limitation on the control of the legislature over county funds.

the competency of the legislature to act, and to divert the funds from one road to another in the county, as to it seemed proper.

Such a governmental arm of the state has not such a proprietary interest in money authorized to be raised as would prevent a subsequent legislature from giving another direction to the expenditure of the fund. State Bd. of Edu. v. Aberdeen, 58 Miss. 518; State ex rel. Police Comrs. v. County Ct. 34 Mo. 546, 571; State ex rel. Lott v. Brewer, 64 Ala. 287; Lucas v. Tippecanoe County, 44 Ind. 524.

The only limitation on the power of the legislature in that regard imposed by our Constitution, it seems, is that the legislature may not direct that the portion of the revenue of a county collected within the limits of a municipal corporation be paid into the treasury of the latter for its sole use and benefit. Nashville v. Towns, 5 Sneed, 186; Demoville v. Davidson County, supra; and see State ex rel. Board of Education v. Haben, 22 Wis. 660.

But here the effort is not to divert from the county to a city, or even from the roads of Hamilton county to another and different county purpose.

Another phase of the defendants' insistence is that if it be conceded that power existed in the legislature to provide for a change in the roads to be constructed, yet, as a condition of exercise, any change must be made through the local or county authorities, and that a discretion must be left to them, else that there would be a violation of the principle of local self-government.

This aspect of the contention is, we consider, covered by what has been said above in respect of the power of the legislature to immediately intervene and direct the change. The legislature need not act through such local agencies, however wise it may be deemed to be that it should. With the unwisdom of what was done by the legislature, the court as a co-ordinate branch of the state government is not concerned. Its power cannot be denied.

The chancellor upheld the act of 1913 as constitutional. His decree is affirmed, with remand for further proceedings.

TRINITY & BRAZOS VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

C. M. BLACKSHEAR.

(— Tex. —, 172 S. W. 544.)

Railroad — injury by article hurled from track — liability.

jury to a person near its right of way by a loose spike used to fasten the rail to the tie, which was hurled from the track by a rapidly moving train, even though the company knew of the condition of the spike, since such injury could not have been anticipated.

(January 13, 1915.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Hill County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. H. Lassiter, Robert Harrison, and Morrow & Morrow, for plaintiff in error:

The evidence fails to show any negligence, and defendant is not liable.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Oakes, 94 Tex. 157, 52 L.R.A. 293, 86 Am. St. Rep. 835, 58 S. W. 999; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Currie, 100 Tex. 136, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 367, 96 S. W. 1077; Terhune v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 151 App. Div. 927, 136 N. Y. Supp. 1149; Smith v. Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. 113 Mo. App. 429, 87 S. W. 74; Teel v. Rio Bravo Oil Co. 47 Tex. Civ. App. 153, 104 S. W. 422; Bishop, Non-Contract Law, § 829; Loose v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 10 Am. Rep. 623; Brown v. Collins, 53 N. H. 442, 16 Am. Rep. 372; Veith v. Hope Salt & Coal Co. 51 W. Va. 96, 57 L.R.A. 410, 41 S. E. 187; Broom, Legal Maxims, 8th ed. pp. 365, 367; Nitroglycerine Case (Parrott v. Wells) 15 Wall. 524, 21 L. ed. 206.

Plaintiff placed his right to recover on the ground of negligence alone, and thereby waived any right to recover without proof of negligence, and is estopped from so doing.

Note.—The liability of a railroad company for personal injuries to persons on adjoining property or highway by objects thrown by passing trains is covered in the note to St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Jackson, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 981; and see also note to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eaden, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 581, as to liability of railroad company for personal injuries by objects thrown from moving train.

It will be observed that in TRINITY & B. VALLEY R. Co. v. BLACKSHEAR, the railroad company was relieved from liability upon the ground that it could not have anticipated such an injury as a result of the condition complained of. The question of anticipation as an element of proximate cause is discussed in the note to Kreigh v. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 684. See further on this point, the opinion in Hubbard v. Bartholomew, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 443.

Biggins v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 102 Tex. 417, 118 S. W. 125.

Negligence cannot exist unless there is a duty to the person injured, and no duty to the plaintiff rested upon the railway company unless the conditions were such that a prudent person would have anticipated and guarded against the occurrence which caused his injuries.

Defendant would not be liable unless it was called upon to anticipate the occurrence causing the injuries.

Messrs. H. B. Porter, Walter Collins, Shurtleff & Cummings, W. F. Ramsey, and C. L. Black, for defendant in error:

It is not necessary, in a case of negligence, to show that the defendant ought necessarily to have anticipated the very occurrence, accident, or injury made the basis of the suit.

It is a perfectly plain duty of a railway company to use due care in the maintenance of its track and in the operation of its trains over its tracks, to the end that no injury will accrue to adjoining landowners. Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error constructed its road through a farm in Hill county (the name of the owner is not important), and was operating its trains thereon at the time the injury complained of occurred. There is evidence from which a jury might conclude that within the limits of the said farm the spikes which held the rails to the ties of the railroad track were in many instances loose, and in some instances they were lying upon the ground.

Defendant in error, Blackshear, was employed by the owner of the farm as a hand, and was engaged in plowing at the time at a point near to the railroad track. A freight train upon the railroad track passed by him at unusual rapid speed, and just as it passed something struck Blackshear in the side and caused the injury complained of. Blackshear was at the time about 50 feet from the railroad track. From the injury received in his side Blackshear was confined to his bed and room for about two weeks, and, when he was able to do so, he went back to the place at which he was plowing and where he was standing at the time he received the blow, and he found near there on the ground an iron spike such as was used on the railroad track, and he believed it was the spike that struck him and caused his injury.

The spike being negligently permitted to be upon the track of the railroad, or loose in the ties, the railroad company would be responsible for injury proximately caused by such negligence, which, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, the railroad company might have foreseen might result therefrom. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Bigham, 90 Tex. 223, 38 S. W. 162.

In the case cited, Chief Justice Gaines, in his usual thorough manner, examined and discussed this question, and announced the rule to be: "But we are not prepared to hold that in no case can the original cause of the injury be deemed the proximate cause, where an independent and disconnected agency has supervened and brought about the result. The fact of the intervention of an independent agency, it occurs to us, bears more directly upon the question whether the injury ought, under all the circumstances, to have been foreseen; and, where this latter fact appears, we think that the original negligent act ought to be deemed actionable. In Seale v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 65 Tex. 274, 57 Am. Rep. 602, Chief Justice Willie says: 'If the intervening cause and its probable or reasonable consequences be such as could reasonably have been anticipated by the original wrongdoer, the current of authority seems to be that the connection is broken.' It follows that, in our opinion, the question of probable cause ought to depend upon the further question whether a reasonably prudent man, in view of all the facts, would have anticipated the result,—not necessarily the precise actual injury, but some like injury, produced by similar intervening agencies."

In the Bigham Case the railroad company was negligent in not providing a safe latch to the gate of a lot in which cattle were placed, and was held liable for the injury to cattle which broke through the gate and escaped, but was held not to be liable for injury to a man who was attempting to prevent the escape by guarding the gate. The escape of the cattle should have been foreseen as a consequence, but the presence of the man at the gate could not have been anticipated; therefore the injury to him could not have been anticipated as a result of the negligence. In this case it was negligence to permit spikes to lie upon the track, and if Blackshear had been lawfully on or near the track in discharge of a duty, and had received his injury, there might be liability. In support of the case cited, we add the following: Sjogren v. Hall, 53 Mich. 274, 18 N. W. 812; American Brewing Asso. v. Talbot, 141 Mo. 674, 64 Am. St. Rep. 548, 42 S. W. 679, 3 Labatt, Mast. & S. §§ 1042-1045.

This doctrine is well stated in vol. 3, Labatt on Master & Servant, 2d ed. § 1042, in the following language:

"The negative form of the doctrine under discussion may be stated in its most general form as follows: 'A person is not . . . answerable at law for a failure to avert or avoid peril that could not have been foreseen by one in like circumstances, and in the exercise of such care as would be characteristic of a prudent person so situated.' In other words, it is not negligence to fail to provide against an accident of such a nature that nobody could have foreseen it, and that no prudence could have anticipated the need of guarding against it. After an accident has occurred it may be easy to see what would have prevented it; but that of itself does not prove nor tend to prove that reasonable or ordinary care would have anticipated and provided against it."

We have conceded the correctness of the jury's conclusions as the basis upon which to determine the rule of law applicable, but we do not concede that this court would be bound to accept such conclusion; for it is in disregard of the natural laws which govern in such cases that an iron wheel would lift an iron spike from the ground and throw it any distance. If it be admitted as true, then it proves that it could not have been foreseen by the railroad company's employees in this case, as such occurrence would be so rare that it could not be anticipated.

We therefore conclude that, admitting the truth of the statements made by the witnesses, the occurrence was of such a nature that it could not have been anticipated and guarded against. Therefore the railroad company was not guilty of negligence, and is not liable for the injury which was caused. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the District Court and the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that judgment be here entered that the defendant in error, Blackshear, take nothing by his suit, and that the plaintiff in error recover against him all costs of both courts.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

UNITED STATES, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CLARA HOLTE.

(236 U. S. 140, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 271.)

Conspiracy — against United States — white slave traffic — guilt of woman.

1. A woman may conspire "to commit an offense against the United States" within the meaning of the provisions of the Criminal Code of March 4, 1909, § 37, although the object of the conspiracy is her own transportation in interstate commerce for Note. — Indictment, of woman transported in violation of the white slave traffic act, for conspiracy to violate the laws of the United States.

As to the possible bearing of the opinion in UNITED STATES v. HOLTE, on the question of indicting, under the white slave traffic act, the woman transported in violation thereof, see citation of the case in note in L.R.A.1915A, 862, in which the construction, applicability, and effect of the act was considered.

On page 866 of the note to which reference has just been made, United States v. Diggs and United States v. Caminetti, unreported cases, were cited to the proposition that transporting a female person in interstate commerce for the purpose of having illicit sexual intercourse with her is an indictable offense under the statute. Both cases have now been affirmed in 220 Fed. 545, on the point to which they were there cited. It is also held to be immaterial that defendant did not actually purchase the transportation, it being understood between him and the person who did purchase it that the defendant would reimburse him.

The holding in UNITED STATES v. HOLTE, on the applicability of the general rule, that one who could not be indicted for an offense may be indicted for a conspiracy to commit the offense, to a female person who assists in transporting herself in violation of the act of 1910, appears to have resulted partly from a desire on the part of the majority to put an end to an evil which has arisen out of the broad construction heretofore given to the statute, i. e., blackmail. The almost unlimited scope given to the operation of the statute (see note in L.R.A.1915A, 862) furnished a wide field for the work of the blackmailer, and perhaps the opportunity was not neglected. See statement by the court where it supposes a case of blackmail, also statement in dissenting opinion as to the correct remedy for blackmail.

Neither the majority of the court, nor the minority, disputed the general rule that a person who could not be convicted of an offense may nevertheless, under certain circumstances, be convicted of conspiracy to commit the offense, the other conspirators purposes of prostitution, contrary to the white slave act of June 25, 1910.

(Mr. Justice Lamar and Mr. Justice Day dissent.)

(February 1, 1915.)

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment charging defendant with conspiring to cause her own transportation in interstate commerce for purposes of prostitution. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

being capable of committing the completed offense. Nor did they dispute the soundness of the exceptions to the general rule. The disagreement was upon the applicability of the rule to the facts in case of a woman conspiring to transport herself in violation of the act of 1910. The decision being by the court of last resort, it must be regarded as settling the question in favor of the applicability of the general rule, notwithstanding the apparently irrefutable arguments against it produced by the dissenting members of the court. Mr. Justice Lamar advanced at least two points which were not effectively refuted by the majority. First, he showed by the most convincing arguments that the general object of the statute is to protect the woman on the theory that she is the victim. The majority attempted to meet this proposition by supposing a case that would show that the theory of the law as stated is not based upon fact. Then they say that the general rule can be applied, "if we abandon the illusion that the woman always is the victim." The position taken by each side on this point can be seen clearly by making a comparison of the words, "whether with or without her consent," used in the statute, with the same words used in various state statutes, providing that any male person over a certain age who has sexual intercourse with a female person under a certain age, "with or without her consent," shall be guilty of the crime of rape. Could a girl under the age fixed by these statutes be convicted of conspiracy to commit rape upon herself, her codefendants being persons capable of committing the completed crime? "If we abandon the illusion that the woman always is the victim," that is, if we may abandon that illusion by supposing a case, and it takes no stretch of imagination to do so, that clearly demonstrates the fact that the woman is not always the victim, then she might be convicted of a conspiracy to violate one of these statutes. Mr. Justice Lamar would probably say that the courts should wait until the legislative power has "abandoned the illusion" by enacting a statute the theory of which is based upon fact. If, as may be the case, the majority meant that the illusion consists in supposing the theory of

Mr. William Wallace, Assistant Attorney General, for plaintiff in error:

Where the substantive offense requires combination for its commission, the same combination cannot be also used as the basis of a conspiracy charge; i. e., the prosecutor may not split the substantive offense into elements and frame an indictment on one element. But where the substantive offense may be consummated without a combination, the addition of that element furnishes the additional ingredient distinguishing conspiracy from the substantive offense, and makes it lawful to indict for either or both.

Guilty complicity on the part of the woman transported is not a necessary ingredient of the substantive offense.

Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 320, 57 L. ed. 526, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 905; Bennett v. United States, 114 C. C. A. 402, 194 Fed. 630, affirmed in 227 U. S. 333, 57 L. ed. 531, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 288; United States v. Westman, 182 Fed. 1017.

If the act prohibited by each statute demands for its accomplishment the doing of the same things, then there is legal identity. If, however, any element is demanded by either that is not essential to the other, then they are separately punishable as different offenses, even though the elements of both may be furnished by the same single happening.

State v. Crofford, 133 Iowa, 480, 110 N. W. 921; Gavieres v. United States, 220 U. S. 342, 55 L. ed. 490, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 421.

The later consummation of the main offense by Laudenschleger could not swallow up, or give immunity to, the earlier completed crime of conspiracy.

Heike v. United States, 227 U. S. 131, 144, 57 L. ed. 450, 455, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 226, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 123; Curley v. United States, 64 C. C. A. 369, 130 Fed. 1; United States v. Stamatoopoulos, 164 Fed. 524; Solander v. People, 2 Colo. 48; State v. Crofford, 133 Iowa, 478, 110 N. W. 921.

Though the penalty provisions of the crime punished by § 2 were limited exclusively to procurers, no corresponding limitation is to be found in § 37, which, being aimed at every person, must apply to the defendant Holte.

United States v. Portale, 235 U. S. 27, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; United States v. Lewis, 235 U. S. 282, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 44.

No appearance for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an indictment for a conspiracy between the present defendant and one Laudenschleger that Laudenschleger should cause the defendant to be transported from Illinois to Wisconsin for the purpose of prostitution, contrary to the act of June 25, 1910, chap. 395, 36 Stat. at L. 825, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8812. As the defendant is the woman, the district court sustained a demurrer on the ground that although the offense could not be committed the law to be that the "woman always is the victim," then its one illustration has no force, or at least it is not of sufficient force to overcome the arguments and facts produced by the minority. Secondly, the minority say that the woman had to be considered an object of traffic in interstate commerce in order to sustain the constitutionality of the statute (see Hoke v. United States, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906, note), hence Congress has no jurisdiction to punish her on the theory that she is not an object of traffic, but a free agent responsible for her own transportation. There is no comment by the majority on this point.

To summarize what has been said, supra, it may be added: (1) If the premise of the minority (that the statute was passed upon the theory that the woman is the victim) is conceded, their conclusion seems to be irresistible. It matters not whether the theory is an illusion or not if Congress based the statute upon it, for in that case the courts cannot abandon it. (2) The majority produced no argument that in any way overthrows the premise of the minority. The fact that individual cases arise in which the woman is not the victim does not disprove the statement that Congress based the law upon the theory that the woman is the victim, any more than it proves that the state legislature did not pass the statutory rape act on the theory that the girl is the victim. The minority produced some very convincing arguments in support of their premise. It is to be regretted that the majority did not attack these arguments and show that Congress did not act upon the theory that the woman is the victim. In this way only could they logically avoid the conclusion of the minority.

In the dissenting opinion it is also timely suggested that the holding by the majority will likely hamper the government in prosecutions in the matter of introducing evidence, the woman transported now being able to refuse to testify on the ground that she may incriminate herself.

J. W. M.

without her, she was no party to it, but only the victim. The single question is whether that ruling is right. We do not have to consider what would be necessary to constitute the substantive crime under the act of 1910, or what evidence would be required to convict a woman under an indictment like this; but only to decide whether it is impossible for the transported woman to be guilty of a crime in conspiring as alleged.

The words of the Penal Code of March 4, 1909, chap. 321, § 37 [35 Stat. at L. 1096, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 10,201], are "conspire . . . to commit any offense against the United States;" and the argument is that they mean an offense that all the conspirators could commit; and that the woman could not commit the offense alleged to be the object of the conspiracy. For although the statute of 1910 embraces matters to which she could be a party, if the words are taken literally, for instance, aiding in procuring any form of transportation for the purpose, the conspiracy alleged, as we have said, is a conspiracy that Laudenschleger should procure transportation and should cause the woman to be transported. Of course, the words of the Penal Code could be narrowed as we have suggested, but in that case they would not be as broad as the mischief; and we think it plain that they mean to adopt the common law as to conspiracy, and that "commit" means no more than bring about. For, as was observed in Drew v. Thaw (Dec. 21, 1914) [235 U. S. 432, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 137], a conspiracy to accomplish what an individual is free to do may be a crime (Reg. v. Mears, 4 Cox, C. C. 423, 2 Den. C. C. 79, Temple & M. 414, 20 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 59, 15 Jur. 66; Reg. v. Howell, 4 Fost. & F. 160); and even more plainly a person may conspire for the commission of a crime by a third person. We will assume that there may be a degree of co-operation that would not amount to a crime, as where it was held that a purchase of spirituous liquor from an unlicensed vendor was not a crime in the purchaser, although it was in the seller. Com. v. Willard, 22 Pick. 476. But a conspiracy with an officer or employee of the government or any other for an offense that only he could commit has been held for many years to fall within the conspiracy section, now § 37, of the Penal Code. United States v. Martin, 4 Cliff. 156, 164, Fed. Cas. No. 15,728; United States v. Bayer, 4 Dill. 407, 410, Fed. Cas. No. 14,547; United States v. Stevens, 44 Fed. 132, 140; State ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 110 Wis. 189, 246, 62 L.R.A. 700, 85 N. W. 1046, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 332. So a woman may conspire to procure an abortion upon herself when, under the law, she could not commit the substantive crime; and therefore, it has been held could not be an accomplice. Reg. v. Whitechurch, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 420, 422, 59 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 77, 62 L. T. N. S. 124, 38 Week. Rep. 336, 16 Cox, C. C. 743, 54 J. P. 472, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 1; Solander v. People, 2 Colo. 48, 63; State v. Crofford, 133 Iowa, 478, 480, 110 N. W. 921.

So we think that it would be going too far to say that the defendant could not be guilty in this case. Suppose, for instance, that a professional prostitute, as well able to look out for herself as was the man, should suggest and carry out a journey within the act of 1910 in the hope of black-mailing the man, and should buy the railroad tickets, or should pay the fare from Jersey City to New York,—she would be within the letter of the act of 1910, and we see no reason why the act should not be held to apply. We see equally little reason for not treating the preliminary agreement as a conspiracy that the law can reach, if we abandon the illusion that the woman always is the victim. The words of the statute punish the transportation of a woman for the purpose of prostitution even if she were the first to suggest the crime. The substantive offense might be committed without the woman's consent; for instance, if she were drugged or taken by force. Therefore the decisions that it is impossible to turn the concurrence necessary to effect certain crimes such as bigamy or duelling into a conspiracy to commit them do not apply.

Judgment reversed.

Mr. Justice McReynolds took no part in the consideration and decision of this case.

Mr. Justice Lamar, dissenting:

I dissent from the conclusion that a woman can be guilty of conspiring to have herself unlawfully transported in interstate commerce for purposes of prostitution.

Congress had no power to punish immorality, and certainty did not intend by this act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 825, chap. 395, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8812), to make fornication or adultery, which was a state misdemeanor, a Federal felony, punishable by $5,000 fine and five years' imprisonment. But when it appeared that there was a traffic in women to be used for purposes of prostitution, debauchery, and immoral purposes, Congress legislated so as to prohibit their interstate transportation in such vicious business. That there was such traffic in women and girls; that they were "literally slaves," "owned and held as property and chattels," and that their traffickers made large profits, is set out at length in the Reports of the House and Senate Committees (61st Congress, 2d Session), recommending the passage of the bill. So that an argument based on the use of the word "slave," "enslaved," "traffic in women," "business in women," "subject of transportation," and the like,—which might otherwise appear to be strained,—is amply justified by the amazing facts which those reports show as to the existence and extent of the business and the profits made by the traffickers in women. The argument based on the use of these words, and what they imply, is further justified by the fact that the statute itself declares (§ 8) that it shall be known as the "white slave traffic act." In giving itself such a title the statute specifically indicates that, while of right, woman is not an object of merchandise or traffic, yet for gain she has by some been wrongfully made such for purposes of prostitution; and that trade Congress intended to bar from interstate commerce.

The act either applies to women who are willingly transported, or it does not. If it does not apply to those who willingly go (47 H. R. 61st Cong. 2d Session, p. 10), then there was no offense by the man who transported her, or in the woman who voluntarily went,—and, in that event, there was; of course, no conspiracy against the laws of the United States in her agreeing to go. The indictment here, however, assumes that the act applies not only to those who are induced to go, but also to those who aid the panderer in securing their own transportation. On that assumption, every woman transported for the purposes of the business stands on the same footing, and cannot by her consent change her legal status. And if she cannot be directly punished for being transported, she cannot be indirectly punished by calling her assistance in the transportation a conspiracy to violate the laws of the United States. For if she is within the circle of the statute's protection, she cannot be taken out of that circle by the law of conspiracy, and thus be subjected to punishment because she agreed to go.

The statute does not deal with the offense of fornication and adultery, but treats the woman who is transported for use in the business of prostitution as a victim,—often a willing victim, but nevertheless a victim. It treats her as enslaved, and seeks to guard her against herself as well as against her slaver; against the wiles and threats, the compulsion and inducements, of those who treat her as though she was merchandise and a subject of interstate transportation. The woman, whether coerced or induced, whether willingly or unwillingly transported for purposes of prostitution, debauchery, and immorality, is regarded as the victim of the trafficker, and she cannot therefore be punished for being enslaved, nor for consenting and agreeing to be transported by him for purposes of such business. To hold otherwise would make the law of conspiracy a sword with which to punish those whom the traffic act was intended to protect.

The fact that prostitutes and others have used this statute as a means by which to levy blackmail may furnish a reason why that should be made a Federal offense, so that she and they can be punished for blackmail or malicious prosecution. But those evils are not to be remedied by extending the law of conspiracy so as to treat the enslaved subject of transportation as a guilty actor in her own transportation; and then punish her because she agreed with her slaver to be shipped in interstate commerce for purposes of prostitution. Such a construction would make every willing victim indictable for conspiracy. Even that elastic offense cannot be extended to cover such a case.

There are no decisions dealing directly with the question as to whether a woman assisting in her own illegal transportation can be prosecuted for conspiracy. There are, however, a number of authorities dealing with somewhat analogous subjects. For example, in prosecutions for abortion, the woman "does not stand legally in the situation of an accomplice, for although she no doubt participated in the moral offense imputed to the defendant, she could not have been indicted for that offense. The law regards her as the victim rather than the perpetrator." Dunn v. People, 29 N. Y. 523, 86 Am. Dec. 319; Com. v. Wood, 11 Gray, 86; State v. Hyer, 39 N. J. L. 598; State v. Murphy, 27 N. J. L. 114; Com. v. Follansbee, 155 Mass. 274, 29 N. E. 471; State v. Owens, 22 Minn. 244; Watson v. State, 9 Tex. App. 238; Keller v. State, 102 Ga. 510, 31 S. E. 92 (seduction). Contra apparently in England and Colorado. Reg. v. Whitchurch, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 240, 59 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 77, 62 L. T. N. S. 124, 38 Week. Rep. 336, 16 Cox, C. C. 743, 54 J. P. 472, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 1; Solander v. People, 2 Colo. 48. So, too, a person who knowingly purchases liquor from one unauthorized to sell it is not guilty of a criminal offense and is not an accomplice. State v. Teahan, 50 Conn. 100; Com. v. Pillsbury, 12 Gray, 127; People v. Smith, 28 Hun, 626, affirmed on opinion below, 92 N. Y. 665; State v. Baden, 37 Minn. 212, 34 N. W. 24.

Where the purchaser of liquor sold in violation of law was prosecuted for inducing the seller to commit a crime, the court said:

"Every sale implies a purchaser; there must be a purchaser as well as a seller, and this must have been known and understood by the legislature. Now, if it were intended that the purchaser should be subject to any penalty, it is to be presumed that it would have been declared in the statute, either by imposing a penalty on the buyer in terms, or by extending the penal consequences of the prohibited act to all persons aiding, counseling, or encouraging the principal offender. There being no such provision in the statute, there is a strong implication that none such was intended by the legislature." Com. v. Willard, 22 Pick. 479.

United States v. Dietrich, 126 Fed. 667, though not directly in point, sheds light on the subject. There two persons were indicted under Rev. Stat. § 5440, for conspiring to violate that law of the United States (Rev. Stat. § 1781) which makes it a criminal offense to agree to give or to receive a bribe. The court held that agreeing to give or receive a bribe was the substantive offense, and not a conspiracy. For when an offense, as bigamy or adultery, requires for its completion the concurrence of two persons, "the government cannot evade the limitations by indicting as for a conspiracy."

And in Reg. v. Tyrrell [1894] 1 Q. B. 711, 63 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 58, 10 Reports, 82, 70 L. T. N. S. 41, 42 Week. Rep. 255, 17 Cox, C. C. 716, where a girl under fifteen years of age was prosecuted for inciting a man to commit adultery with her, one of the judges considered that she could not be found guilty because she was under the age of consent, and the other said that the statute did not apply because "there is no trace in the statute of any intention to treat the woman or girls as criminals."

Applying these cases, it appears that under the white slave traffic act there must be a woman who is transported and a person who compels or induces her to be transported, or who aids her in such transportation. "There is no trace in the statute of any intention to treat the women or girls as criminals" for being transported, nor for agreeing that they will be transported, nor for aiding in the transportation. And if, as said in Com. v. Willard, 22 Pick. 479, Congress had intended that they should be subject to indictment for conspiracy, "it would have been declared . . . by extending the penal consequences of the prohibited act to all persons aiding, counseling, or encouraging the principal offender. There being no such provision in the statute, there is a strong implication that none such was intended by the legislature."

To this may be added the practical consideration, that any construction making the woman liable for participation in the transportation will not only tend to prevent her from coming forward with her evidence, but in many instances she will be in position to claim her privilege and can refuse to testify on the ground that she might thereby subject herself to prosecution for conspiracy, in that she aided in the violation of the law, even though it was intended for the protection of her unfortunate class.

The woman, whether treated as the willing or an unwilling victim of such transportation for such business purpose, cannot be found guilty of the main offense, nor punished for the incidental act of conspiring to be enslaved and transported. Indeed, if she could be so punished for conspiring with her slaver, the fundamental idea that makes the act valid would be destroyed. She would cease to be an object of traffic; and instead of being the subject of illegal transportation would—not be transported by a slaver as an object of interstate commerce, so as to be subject to regulative prohibitions under the commerce clause—but would be voluntarily traveling on her own account, and punishable by the laws of the state for prostitution practised after her arrival.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Day concurs in this dissent.

(December 28, 1914.)

APPEAL by relators from a judgment of the Superior County for Kitsap County in favor of respondents in a mandamus proceeding to compel them to permit relators to examine the books and records of a corporation in which they are stockholders. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. H. Allen for appellants.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relators, W. L. Gwinn and R. L. Thomas, stockholders of the Kitsap Title Abstract Company, seek by mandamus proceedings to compel the respondents R. E. Bucklin and E. A. Landolt, the president and secretary, respectively, of that company, to permit the relators to examine the books and records of the company. Upon a hearing had in the superior court, judgment was rendered denying the relief prayed for and dismissing the action. From this ruling and judgment, relators have appealed to this court.

The Kitsap Title Abstract Company is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of this state, having its capital stock divided into 1,000 shares. Relators own 497 shares, respondents own 502 shares, and a third person owns 1 share of the stock of the company. Respondents are president and secretary, respectively, of the company. They have the custody of its books and records and the active management of its business. They are willing to accord to relators the privilege of examining the books and records of the company except such books and records as show the list of the customers of the company and the particular prices paid by them for abstracts. Respondents insist that these particular books and records of the company constitute a portion of the good will and trade of the company and are such trade secrets that if made known to relators, who are proprietors of a rival abstract company in competition with the Kitsap Title Abstract Company, such knowledge by relators will result to the material injury of the business of the Kitsap Title Abstract Company. In this connection respondents allege: "That the only purpose of said W. L. Gwinn in seeking the examination of the books of said company has been to obtain the list of customers of said company, together with the prices quoted to the same for the making of abstracts, so that he may solicit such customers for patronage for the rival company operated by himself and to quote prices below the cost of making such abstracts so as to deprive the Kitsap Title Abstract Company from the patronage of such customers; likewise, the said Gwinn would make use of said information for the purpose of discrediting the work of said Kitsap Title Abstract Company, in so far as it would be possible for him so to do, and particularly discredit the management and control of said business by the respondents Bucklin and Landolt."

We assume for argument's sake that this allegation and the facts above stated are true, in so far as such facts may be relevant and controlling in this controversy. This constitutes as favorable a statement as can be made from the record, in respondents' behalf.

Counsel for appellants contend that they have the absolute right to examine the books and records of the company without such right being impaired in the least by respondents' claim of right to inquire into relators' motive and purpose in making such examination.

We are not here concerned with the mere common-law right of stockholders to examine the books and records of the corporation in which they hold stock, which right is not absolute, but subject to restrictions governed largely by the circumstances of each particular controversy. The nature and extent of such common-law right was reviewed by this court in State ex rel. Weinberg v. Pacific Brewing & Malting Co. 21 Wash. 451, 47 L.R.A. 208, 58 Pac. 584. We have no statute in this state bearing upon this subject, but the Kitsap Title Abstract Company has a by-law reading as follows: "Each stockholder shall have the right to inspect the books and records of the company at any time during regular business hours of said company."

This by-law, we think, has all the force and effect of a statute containing such a provision. Cummings v. Webster, 43 Me. 192; Wyoming Coal Min. Co. v. State, 15 Wyo. 97, 123 Am. St. Rep. 1014, 87 Pac. 337, 984; 10 Cyc. 351.

In Johnson v. Langdon, 135 Cal. 624, 87 Am. St. Rep. 156, 67 Pac. 1050, the court had under consideration the claimed right of the stockholder to examine the books and records of a corporation in which he held stock, under a statute of California providing that such records shall "be open to the inspection of any director, member, stockholder," etc. The secretary of the corporation, in resisting the stockholders' claim of right of examination, alleged affirmatively: "That the object and purpose of the plaintiff is to injure the corporation of which defendant is secretary, and to gain information for the private use of plaintiff, in connection with two other corporations, of which plaintiff is a stockholder, engaged in a similar business to that of the corporation represented by defendant."

It was conceded that appellants desired to see the list of the corporation's customers and their contracts. In sustaining the striking out of this defense by the trial court, the supreme court said: "At common law the stockholders of a corporation had the right to examine, at reasonable times, the records and books of the corporation. 2 Cook, Corp. § 513; Stone v. Kellogg, 165 Ill. 204, 56 Am. St. Rep. 240, 46 N. E. 222. But the writ would not issue as a matter of course to enforce a mere naked right, or to gratify mere idle curiosity; but it was necessary for the petitioner to show some specific interest at stake rendering the inspection necessary, or some beneficial purpose for which the examination was desired. High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 310. But the great weight of the American authorities is to the effect that where the right is statutory it is not necessary for the petition to aver or show the purposes or object of the inspection. Neither is it any defense to allege that the objects and purposes are improper, and that the petitioner desires to injure the business of the corporation. The clear legal right given by the Constitution and the statute cannot be defeated by stopping to inquire into motives. If this were so, the stockholder would be driven from the certain definite right given him by the statute to the realm of uncertainty and speculation. The small stockholder—whose rights are as sacred in the eyes of the law as those of the rich owner of the majority of the stock—would be refused the right of inspection given him by the statute, and when he comes into court setting forth his rights, and the fact that he is a stockholder, and has been refused permission to inspect the books, he is met by an answer of the corporation setting forth that he is not seeking the information nor the inspection for any legitimate purpose, and that his motives are improper. In the trial of this affirmative defense witnesses are required and expenses incurred. If the court should find in favor of the corporation, and deny the petitioner's right, he is driven to an appeal. In the appellate court he is met by the rule that a finding of fact based upon conflicting testimony cannot be disturbed. Thus the certain, adequate, and summary remedy for the right given by statute is L.R.A.1915D.

driven into the realm of uncertainty, expense, and delay. Such was not the intent of the framers of the Constitution, nor of the legislature in enacting the statute. The statute is founded upon the principle that the shareholders have a right to be fully informed as to the conditions of the corporation, the manner in which its affairs are conducted, and how the capital to which they have contributed is employed and managed. The shareholder is not required to show any reason or occasion for making the examination. Nor can he be met with the defense that his motives are improper."

This doctrine is adhered to in Kimball v. Dern, 39 Utah, 181, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 134, 116 Pac. 28, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 166, where the subject is treated at considerable length and many authorities reviewed. Among the decisions which seem to regard the statutory rule as being not quite so unqualified as indicated in the California and Wyoming decisions above noticed, we note that of Foster v. White, 86 Ala. 467, 6 So. 88, where, referring to the statute of that state giving the right of inspection, it is said: "The only express limitation is that the right shall be exercised at reasonable and proper times; the implied limitation is that it shall not be exercised from idle curiosity, or for improper or unlawful purposes. In all other respects, the statutory right is absolute. The shareholder is not required to show any reason or occasion rendering an examination opportune and proper, or a definite legitimate purpose. The custodian of the books and papers cannot question or inquire into his motives and purposes. If he has reason to believe that they are improper or illegitimate, and refuses the inspection on this ground, he assumes the burden to prove them such. If it be said this construction of the statute places it in the power of a single shareholder to greatly injure and impede the business, the answer is: The legislature regarded his interests in the successful promotion of the objects of the corporation a sufficient protection against unnecessary or injurious interference. The statute is founded on the principle that the shareholders have a right to be fully informed as to the condition of the corporation, the manner in which its affairs are conducted, and how the capital, to which they have contributed, is employed and managed."

This language seems somewhat inharmonious within itself. It would seem that, if the custodian of the corporate records cannot question or inquire into the motives or purposes of the stockholder in requesting the examination, that the custodian's right to withhold the privilege of examination is entirely at an end except as to reasonableness of time; yet the court seems to conclude that there may be motives and purposes on the part of the stockholder which would warrant the custodian in withholding the privilege of examination aside from the question of reasonableness of time. We find similar observations by the Maryland court in Weißenmayer v. Bitner, 88 Md. 325, 45 L.R.A. 446-457, 42 Atl. 245, where the right of examination was claimed under a statute reading: "The president and directors of every corporation shall keep full, fair, and correct accounts of their transactions, which shall be open at all times to the inspection of the stockholders or members."

The court said: "The right thus given to the stockholder is unconditional and unqualified. . . . It is stated in the answer to the petition that Weißenmayer is engaged in the manufacture and sale of hosiery and knit goods, and is a rival and competitor of the Windsor Knitting Mills in business, and that he desires an examination of the books, documents, and records of the corporation for the purpose of obtaining information to be used by him in the conduct of his own business, to the injury and loss of the said corporation. . . . But the petitioner's right would not be forfeited by any such cause. The right is given to him as a stockholder by statute, and is absolute, and not made to depend upon any circumstance but the ownership of the stock. It is easy to see that there might be good reasons for refusing an application; for instance, if it were made for some evil, improper, or unlawful purpose. And, if such purpose were alleged and proved, the writ would be denied."

Whatever the view of the court in this last quoted language is as to reasons and motives on the part of the stockholder warranting the custodian refusing inspection of the records, it is apparent that the fact that such stockholder is interested in a rival concern which is in competition with the corporation, and might, by the examination of the books of the corporation, acquire and use knowledge in aid of the other concern to the detriment of the corporation by way of competition, his right to the inspection of the books would not thereby be affected in the least. It is possible that the Alabama and Maryland courts had in mind a possible inspection of the books and records of the corporation by a stockholder with a view of disclosing some secret process of manufacturing an article, possessed and used by the corporation, or where the motives and purpose of the stockholder would be to get temporary possession of a record for the purpose of mutilation or theft of the record, or some other equally unlawful purpose. If the qualifying language of those courts means no more than this, we would be inclined to agree with them; but there is no such unlawful purpose of relators here alleged or shown. We are of the opinion that the inspection of the books and records here sought by relators cannot be withheld from them on the ground that they would thereby acquire knowledge which would be used by them in aid of the business of their other abstract company, to the detriment of the Kitsap Title Abstract Company.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to enter its judgment compelling respondents to permit relators to examine the books and records of the company, including its books and records showing the list of its customers and prices paid by them for abstracts.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA EX REL.
THOMAS G. AULTMAN,

v.

C. F. ICE, President, et al., Pliffs. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 84 S. E. 181.)

Mandamus — clerical error — amendment.

1. A clerical error in the date of the issuance of a mandamus nisi may be cured by an amendment.

Same — recital of petition.

2. An alternative writ of mandamus need not recite the filing of a petition for award thereof.

Parties — inspection of corporate books.

3. In a proceeding to compel the officers of a private corporation to allow one of its directors to inspect its books, papers, records, and correspondence, the corporation itself is not a necessary party.

Mandamus — to obtain inspection of books — capacity.

4. An alternative writ of mandamus, sued out for such purpose, is not vitiated by recital of the relator's dual status of stockholder and director, and failure formally to claim the right of inspection in one of the two capacities indicated by the recitals.

Same — motion — demurrer.

5. A motion for the award of a peremp-tory writ of mandamus, unaccompanied by a replication to the return to the alternative writ, is equivalent to a demurrer to the return.

Corporation — inspection of books — director.

6. That the inspection sought by a director may disclose a right of action in him against the corporation or some of its agents does not preclude his right to inspect the books, papers, and records of the corporation.

Mandamus — for inspection of books — defense — indefiniteness.

7. An averment, in general terms, that respondents are advised that one of the purposes of the relator, in seeking such inspection, is to enable him to obtain knowledge of the corporate business for communication to rival or competing concerns, unsupported by any allegation of facts, indicating the source of such information, the identity of such rival concerns, or connection of the relator therewith, is too indefinite, and therefore insufficient as a defense to the writ.

Corporation — inspection of books — aid of agent.

8. A director of a corporation is entitled to have the assistance of his attorney or agent, in the exercise of his right to inspect its books, papers, and records, provided the latter has no interest adverse to the corporation, rendering his employment therein improper.

It was error to sustain plaintiff's motion for a peremptory writ, and to award the same.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment of the intermediate court of Marion county, affirmed by the circuit court of that county, and brought here for review, awarded a peremptory writ of mandamus, commanding the respondents, president and secretary and treasurer of a corporation known as the Fairmont Box Car Loader Company, to permit the relator, a stockholder in the company and a director thereof, to inspect the records, books, papers, contracts, and other documents belonging to it and in their custody, and allow him the privilege of assistance by his agent in so doing.

Waged with vigor, skill, and ability on both sides, the contest developed, in the court of its initiation, several questions of procedure, and reliance, in the appellate courts, upon technical grounds for both affirmance and reversal.

One exception is based on an adverse ruling on a motion to quash the alternative writ, because: (1) Its date was two days earlier than that of the order awarding it; (2) it did not show the filing of a petition for issuance thereof; (3) the corporation was not made a party; and (4) although averring the relator to be both a stockholder and a director, it failed to set forth the capacity in which he desired relief.

An amendment, the propriety of which seems to be clear beyond doubt, cured the first one of these alleged defects. It was shown by affidavits to have been a mere misprision of the clerk of the court.

No recital of the petition was necessary. The writ itself constitutes the declaration in this form of action. Mason v. Ohio River R. Co. 51 W. Va. 183, 41 S. E. 418; Fisher v. Charleston, 17 W. Va. 628. The petition is, in law, a mere memorandum or affidavit, supplying the materials for the recitals of fact in the mandamus nisi.

No corporate interest in the litigation, not adequately represented by the governing officers proceeded against, is perceived. Through them, the corporation has notice, and they act for it, just as effectually as if it were a formal party. The situation differs radically from that in which the interests of a person having no notice and not in any sense represented are to be affected, as in Armstrong v. County Ct. 15 W. Va. 190.

The remaining ground of the motion is likewise untenable. Under some circumstances, the relator has admitted right of inspection in either and both capacities, and the same relief would be granted in either case. If the facts set forth in addition to the averment of his character as a stockholder do not confer such right upon him as a stockholder, but do give it to him as a director, the averment of his ownership of stock can be treated as harmless surplussage. Sprinkle v. Duty, 54 W. Va. 559, 46 S. E. 557. If, on the contrary, he has the right in both capacities, relief could not be denied him because he has unnecessarily shown himself to be doubly entitled to it.

Recital here of the contents of the pleadings, or even of the substance thereof, would not materially aid in the solution of the questions raised. The writ, return, and amended return all cover unnecessary ground and partake largely of the character of the pleadings in an equity suit. Right of personal inspection is not denied. On the contrary, it is distinctly admitted and had been formally invited. Only the alleged right of inspection by an agent or attorney is denied, and this denial is supplemented by the assertion of impropriety in the purpose for which the inspection is demanded. A few days before the writ was obtained, the relator caused a written demand for the right of inspection by himself and his agent or attorney to be served on the respondents. The president responded thereto by a letter, conceding in the most comprehensive terms the right to inspect as a director, and tendering for such purpose all books, papers, and records of the company; but the letter was silent as to the admission of an agent or attorney for such purpose. On the occasion of the delivery of the notice or demand, however, the right of inspection by agent or attorney was expressly denied and has never been conceded or admitted, and is not now.

Deeming the return and the amended return insufficient, the relator moved the court to grant the peremptory writ, and neither formally demurred nor replied. All parties treat the motion as the equivalent of a demurrer to the return and the amended return. Courts generally so regard it. Fisher v. Charleston, supra; People ex rel. Central P. R. Co. v. San Francisco, 27 Cal. 655; Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 405; Beard v. Lee County, 51 Miss. 542; State ex rel. Clark v. Smith, 104 Mo. 661, 16 S. W. 503. L.R.A.1915D.

The corporation was organized in November, 1905, under a charter issued under the laws of this state in October, 1905, to A. W. Rapp, Chas. L. Merrifield, C. D. Fleming, A. C. Ice, and S. A. Boehm; but Geo. T. Watson, Chas. F. Ice, and John H. Huhn took the bulk of the capital stock, in consideration of their assignments to the corporation of certain United States patents and applications for such patents then pending, all of which were for box car loaders and improvements upon such machines. Each of them so obtained 65 shares of the par value of $100 each. Only seven additional shares were issued. There is some controversy as to equitable interests and rights in the patents and applications for patents, but they are of minor importance, if at all material. The corporation does not manufacture any of the patented machines. They are made, exploited, and marketed by the Fairmont Mining Machinery Company, under a verbal contract, and the net profits divided between the two corporations. They are used by the Fairmont Coal Company and the Consolidation Coal Company, allied concerns, and unfairness to the Box Car Loader Company and its stockholders, in the relations of these companies, is charged. The relator seems to be of the opinion that the Box Car Loader Company should erect a plant and manufacture and market its own machines. Little, if any, materiality in the contentions respecting these matters is perceived. Aultman, the relator, purchased Huhn's stock and such other rights and interests as he had in and against the company, on the 15th day of June, 1909, and was subsequently elected a director. At the date of the award of the mandamus nisi, Aultman was prosecuting an action of debt against Huhn for the recovery of $400 which he claimed had been wrongfully paid to Huhn by the corporation or some of its agents. Dismissing said action, he commenced another action, one of assumpsit, against Huhn on the same demand, which seems to have been still pending at the date of the judgment here complained of. These facts, suggesting the possibility of a claim by the relator, against the company or some of its agents, on account of transactions with Huhn, constitute the basis of a charge of improper motive or purpose in the demand for inspection. They are supplemented by an averment, in general terms, of the existence of keen and active competition in the business of supplying car loading machines, and purpose on the part of the relator to obtain knowledge of the methods of the company and facts in its possession, for communication to its competitors, to its injury and damage. The alternative writ disclaims and disavows purpose and intent to make any improper use of any information that may be obtained.

Both sides base the right to relief on the state of the pleadings. The return admits the right of inspection, denying only right to the assistance of an agent or attorney, wherefore the relator says the writ must issue if the law accords such right of assistance. On the other hand, it is said admission of the improper motive or purpose arises from lack of a replication to the return, wherefore the writ must be denied. Replying to this contention, the relator, not denying the sufficiency of impropriety of motive as an objection to the demand for inspection, claims the charge made in the return is not sufficiently pleaded, because of its generality and meagerness of inculcating facts.

That the relator may suspect right in himself of a cause of action against the corporation or some of its agents, and may find revelation thereof in the records or documents inspection whereof is sought, is not inconsistent with his right of inspection, because it does not relieve him from duty as a director, nor excuse nonperformance thereof. As such, he is a trustee of the property and interests of the corporation and entitled to full and complete information as to its affairs, to the end that he may be able properly to execute his trust. An interest hostile to the corporation does not bar a director's right of inspection. People ex rel. Leach v. Central Fish Co. 117 App. Div. 77, 101 N. Y. Supp. 1108.

The charge of purpose to obtain information for disclosure to rivals or competitors in the business in which the company is engaged is entirely too general and indefinite. It is founded upon mere information and belief, without a single specification of fact. No interest in any rival concern is charged or shown, nor is any such concern specified, named, or suggested. The name of no alleged informant is given or indicated. A legal right ought no more to be withheld, upon such an allegation, than property should be seized under an attachment issued upon an indefinite and general charge of fraud, unless authorized by a statute.

It remains only to inquire whether, in the exercise of his right of inspection, a director is entitled to the assistance of an agent or attorney, having no adverse interests or connections, rendering his employment therein improper. An affirmative answer is given by the authorities. People ex rel. McInnes v. Columbia Paper Bag Co. 103 App. Div. 208, 92 N. Y. Supp. 1084. Reason accords with authority. A director L.R.A.1915D.

needs the same kind of assistance from specialists in law, accounting, and mechanical and scientific matters, in the exercise of this right, as are requisite to an efficient investigation pertaining to his individual business, and he is clearly entitled to whatever he needs to make his investigation full, complete, and intelligent.

Perceiving no error in the judgment, we affirm it.

WILLIAM BERG

v.

YAKIMA VALLEY CANAL COMPANY.

Water — irrigation company — privity of lessee — right to maintain action.

1. One leasing land under a ditch constructed by a mutual irrigation ditch company, from a holder of shares in the company, by an instrument providing that he will accept as full water right for said land a definite fraction of the water right held by the lessor, is in such privity with the ditch company as to enable him to maintain an action against it for negligent failure to maintain the ditch, in consequence of which he is deprived of the water to which he is entitled, to his injury.

Irrigation ditch company — failure to transfer stock — effect on liability for negligence.

2. A mutual irrigation ditch company cannot defeat an action for negligent failure to deliver water to one in possession of land under the ditch, because the shares of stock representing the water to be used

Note. — Right of stockholder in mutual irrigation company to maintain action against the company for negligent failure to furnish water.

Research has disclosed little authority on the question indicated in the title to this note. There are several cases in which stockholders of mutual irrigation ditch companies have successfully prosecuted actions against the company for failure to supply water, but their right to maintain the actions does not seem to have been seriously questioned.

In O'Connor v. North Truckee Ditch Co. 17 Nev. 245, 30 Pac. 882, cited in Berg v. Yakima Valley Canal Co., a water company organized for the purpose of owning and keeping in repair an irrigation ditch, and for controlling and dividing the water therein among the stockholders according to the amount of their stock, was held liable for damages at the suit of a stockholder for failure properly to control and divide the water, whereby the plaintiff was deprived of the water to which he was entitled. The on such land have not been transferred to the property owner on its books; at least, if it has recognized the right by delivering water to the one in possession.

Same — liability for negligence.

3. A mutual irrigation ditch company is liable to holders of its stock and their tenants for negligent failure to maintain the ditch in repair, so that water cannot be delivered to them, to their injury.

Same — time of cleaning ditch — negligence.

4. Failure of an irrigation ditch company to clean the ditch during the fall and winter when the water is not needed, and their deliberate performance of the necessary work in the spring, so that stockholders are deprived of water when needed for their crops, is negligence.

plaintiff and others in an association owning an irrigating ditch had deeded their rights in the ditch to the company in consideration of stock, and the court said that "the stated objects of the corporation, as expressed in the certificate and the stipulations in the deed, clearly define the duties imposed upon the corporation. By the terms and conditions thereof the corporation is bound to keep the main ditch supplied with water, and to regulate and divide its use among the several stockholders in accordance with their respective interests; and it must necessarily follow that for any neglect or failure to properly discharge its duty in this respect it would be liable to the stockholder who is injured thereby to the extent of the damages suffered by him."

The contention was overruled in O'Connor v. North Truckee Ditch Co. supra, that, as the testimony relating to the negligence of the company showed that some of the stockholders above the plaintiff's land had placed dams in the ditch, and diverted more water than they were entitled to, and that but for such acts the plaintiff would not have been injured, the injuries complained of were occasioned by the wrongful acts of other stockholders, and that the corporation was not guilty of negligence, and not liable for damages.

And in Rocky Ford Canal R. L. Loan & T. Co. v. Simpson, 5 Colo. App. 30, 36 Pac. 638, an irrigation company organized for the purpose of supplying water to its stockholders exclusively was held liable to a stockholder for breach of contract for failure to deliver her proportionate share of the water. In upholding the verdict for the plaintiff, the court said that the agreement of the company being to furnish water in proportion to the amount of stock, it devolved upon it, under the facts of the case, to explain its failure so to do, and that the sufficiency of the explanation was for the jury; that the duty assumed by the company was to use reasonable care and diligence in conveying the water, in keeping the means of conveyance in repair, and making a ratable distribution.

So, in Mountain Supply Ditch Co. v. Lindekugel, 24 Colo. App. 100, 131 Pac. L.R.A.1915D.

Damages — injury to crops.

5. The damages to be allowed for injury to a crop by failure to furnish water from an irrigation ditch is the value of the crop at the time of the injury, to be determined by its value on the land at that time, or its value at maturity less the cost of perfecting and marketing it.

Appeal — evidence to justify disturbing judgment.

6. That the evidence would have warranted a larger award of damages than was allowed by the trial court is no reason for the appellate court disturbing the judgment.

(Crow, Ch. J., and Chadwick, Fullerton, and Mount, JJ., dissent.)

(January 9, 1915.)

780, damages were recovered by a stockholder in a mutual ditch company for wrongful diversion of water from an upper to a lower reservoir, from which the plaintiff's land could not be irrigated. Regarding the duty of the company to the stockholder, the court said that "the defendant company, having been organized for the purpose of supplying water to its stockholders by means of a ditch and reservoir system, assumed and was charged by law with the duty of exercising reasonable care and diligence in procuring and storing the water, keeping its storage reservoirs in repair and condition to retain the same, and making ratable distribution thereof; and, if plaintiff's land was so situated that it could be irrigated from certain reservoirs only, it was its duty, if practicable, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, and without prejudice to the other stockholders, to retain a sufficient amount of water in such reservoirs to irrigate those lands;" that it was the failure to perform this duty, and the injury resulting to plaintiff, that was charged in the complaint.

Seeley v. Huntington Canal & Agri. Asso. 27 Utah, 179, 75 Pac. 367, was an action by a stockholder against a water company for damages for failure to deliver water to which the plaintiff claimed he was entitled, the only question considered, however, being the legality of an assessment which the plaintiff had failed to pay, such failure being set up as a defense to the action.

Among possibly other cases where stockholders have sought to enjoin irrigation companies from discrimination in the delivery of water, or from a wrongful diversion thereof, see Richey v. East Redlands Water Co. 141 Cal. 221, 74 Pac. 754, and McDermont v. Anaheim Union Water Co. 124 Cal. 112, 56 Pac. 779.

As to mandamus to enforce the right of a stockholder of a water company to water, see note to Miller v. Imperial Water Co. 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 372.

It is to be regretted in view of the novelty and importance of the suggestions in the dissenting opinion in the Berg case, that the majority did not make a more specific reply to them.

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Superior Court for Yakima County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligent failure properly to maintain and keep in repair an irrigation ditch; defendant appealing from a judgment in plaintiff's favor, and plaintiff appealing from the inadequacy of the amount allowed as damages. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas H. Wilson and Bogle, Graves, Merritt, & Bogle, for plaintiff:

It is the plain duty of the corporation, in the exercise of its corporate functions, to furnish water to the land, and it is liable for failure to perform that duty.

The water, or right to the use of the water, became an appurtenance (not inseparable) to the land, and so remains until severance by the act of the shareholder in the manner fixed by the articles and by-laws of the corporation, and as regulated by law.

While the water right remains appurtenant, a lease of the land and water for a term creates the relation of landlord and tenant in regard to the same. The lessee succeeds to and is entitled to all the rights and privileges of the lessor, through privity of estate and contract touching the subject-matter, and may maintain an action to redress injuries to such rights.

Main, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The purpose of this action was to recover damages alleged to be due to the negligence of the defendant in failing to properly maintain and keep in repair an irrigation ditch. The cause was tried to the court sitting without a jury. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff in the sum of $18,500. The defendant appeals.

The facts are substantially as follows: The defendant, Yakima Valley Canal Company, is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Washington. The object for which this corporation was formed, as set out in its articles, was to construct, maintain, and operate a canal to carry water for irrigation and domestic purposes from the Naches river in the county of Yakima to the lands owned by its stockholders situated in that county, and in township 13, range 18, E. W. M. The water was to be furnished at cost to the owners of lands upon the line of the canal or lateral branches, who should share in the cost of construction, or become owners of the corporate stock. By the amended articles of incorporation, the capital stock of the corporation was \$4,200, divided into 4,200 shares of the par value of \$1 per share. No dividends were to be paid upon this stock. The canal, after it was constructed, was to be maintained and kept in repair by assessments each year made upon the stockholders. The certificates of stock which were issued provided that the owner of the shares therein specified, in accordance with the articles of incorporation and the by-laws, was entitled for every share of stock to $\frac{1}{4200}$ part of the volume of water carried by the canal, so long as the water should be used upon the land described upon the back of the certificate.

On March 31, 1909, one William Steward became the owner, by purchase from E. B. Preble, of certain lands which were under the ditch. The certificates of stock which entitled Preble to water to be used upon this land were on this date assigned to Steward, but were not transferred upon the books of the corporation until February 21, 1911. On the 27th day of November, 1909, Steward leased for a period of two years 100 acres of the land above mentioned to William Berg, the plaintiff. This lease provided that Berg would plant the land leased in apple trees of specified varieties, and would cultivate and care for the same during the period covered by the lease, in a good and husband-like manner. During the time covered by the lease, Berg had the right to plant the entire tract to nursery stock, provided he should not plant any nursery stock or any other crops nearer than 3 feet distant from the apple trees. The lease also provided that Berg should have the right to use a specified portion of the water from the Yakima Valley Canal Company, which was then owned by Steward and covered by the certificates which had been assigned and delivered to him by Preble. Berg was a nurseryman, and immediately entered into possession of the land for the purpose of engaging in the nursery business somewhat extensively. During the spring of the year 1910 he planted approximately 70 acres of land in nursery stock. For this purpose he employed about twenty-five men. Berg claims that the defendant company was negligent in failing to properly maintain and take care of the irrigation ditch during the previous fall and winter, and for that reason he did not receive sufficient water during the spring of 1910 to grow the nursery stock which he had planted. By reason of the shortage of water, Berg claims damages in the sum of $73,150.

At the conclusion of the trial the court, at the request of one party and with the consent of the other, in company with a representative of each, examined the land. Other facts will be mentioned as they may become pertinent in connection with the consideration of the points urged for a reversal.

The questions to be determined are: First, the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action. Second, is the defendant company liable in damages for negligently failing to properly maintain and keep in repair the irrigation ditch? Third, does the evidence sustain the charge of negligence? And, fourth, the amount of the damages.

I. In order to reach the real question in the case without unnecessary preliminary discussion, it will be admitted, for the purposes of this opinion: (a) That the Yakima Valley Canal Company is what is known as a mutual ditch company (that is, that the company was formed for the purpose of supplying water to its stockholders only, and not to the public generally); (b) that the action must be founded either in tort or contract; (c) that the present action is not one sounding in tort; (d) that an action based upon a contract must be brought by one who is either a party or stands in a relation of privity; and (e) that Berg was not a party to the contract. If, therefore, the present action can be maintained by Berg, it is upon the ground of privity. Whether that relation existed between Berg and the canal company depends upon whether, when Berg took his lease, a right to the water passed to him as an appurtenance to the land. It will hardly be denied that, if the water right passed as an appurtenance to the land, this right to maintain the action is well founded.

In a mutual company the stock certificate represents the water right. A transfer or sale of the certificate may be made separate from the land for use on other land, and will transfer the water right. But where it has not been thus sold or transferred, the question whether the water right is appurtenant to the stockholder's land is generally a question of fact, as is also whether, on a sale or transfer of the land, the water right passes as an appurtenance. In 2 Wiel, Water Rights in the Western States, 3d ed. § 1269, speaking upon this question, the author states the rule as follows: "So long as the company remains purely a mutual one, the certificate of stock represents the water right. A transfer or sale of the certificate is governed by much the same rules as those elsewhere considered regarding transfers of water rights. Whether the water right is appurtenant to the stockholder's land is a question of fact in each case, as is also L.R.A.1915D.

whether, on a sale of the land, the water right passes as appurtenance. A sale of the certificate may be made separate from the land for use on other land, and will transfer the water right, where the change does not injure other existing water users by the new place of use (who alone, however, can raise the objection that they are injured); the transfer being complete when (and not until) entered on the books of the company. On the other hand, in the absence of any separate sale of the certificate or of any other evidence of any express intention to make a severance, a sale of the land on which the water is used will carry the water right and right to the certificate as an appurtenance."

In the present case the water right, as evidenced by the certificate, was appurtenant to the land.

The amended articles of incorporation specify that "each share of stock of this corporation shall constitute a water right for 1 acre of land, and shall, when duly issued and delivered, vest in the lawful owner thereof, his heirs and assigns, title to one forty-two hundredth ($\frac{1}{4200}$) part of the water at any time actually carried by said canal. . . ."

The by-laws of the corporation adopted by the stockholders specify the form of the certificate. The certificate provides that the owner of each certificate of stock shall be entitled to "one forty-two hundredth part of the volume of water carried by the canal of said corporation for each share of stock represented by this certificate, so long as he shall use said water upon the land described in the certificate upon the back hereof, and no longer, provided, however, that no water can be taken from said canal by virtue of the ownership of said stock until the certificate upon the back hereof has been filled out, signed, and sealed by the secretary of this corporation."

The land formerly owned by Preble and transferred to Steward was described upon the back of the certificates as issued to Preble, and assigned and delivered to Steward at the time of the purchase of the land by him. Considering the respective provisions of the articles of incorporation, the by-laws, and the stock certificate, it is plain that it was the intention to make the water right represented by the stock appurtenant to the land.

But it is contended that, even if the water is appurtenant to the land, it did not pass to Berg under the terms of the lease, in which it was provided: "That he [Berg] will accept as the full water right for said land one half of the water right now owned and held by said first party [Steward], to wit, one half of one hundred shares of capital stock in the Yakima Valley Canal Company's main canal."

For what purpose was this provision placed in the lease? Steward desired the land leased planted in apple trees. Berg agreed to plant the trees, tend, irrigate, and care for the same during the period covered by the lease. Berg had the right, for his own purposes, of planting the entire tract to nursery stock, except that he should not encroach upon the apple trees closer than 3 feet. The use of the water upon the land was absolutely essential to any practical attempt to carry out the provisions of the lease. Without the water the purpose could not be accomplished. While the language used is not as specific as it could have been, it is yet quite sufficient to make the intention of the parties evident. The lease transferred to Berg the right to use the water as therein specified. The lease, for the period of time covered by it, operated as an assignment of the water right, as therein provided. In 3 Kinney on Irrigation, 2d ed. § 1484, it is said: "So, again, where a tract of land is conveyed, 'with the water right appurtenant thereto,' or a similar expression used in the deed, and the shares of stock representing the water right were not assigned to the purchaser, such a conveyance must be deemed in law an assignment, and the purchaser can compel a transfer of the stock and delivery to him of all water which was actually appurtenant to the land at the time of the transfer."

The water, as appurtenant to the land, having passed to Berg by virtue of the lease, established his privity, and, as a result, his right to maintain the action. In Booth v. Chapman, 59 Cal. 149, the defendant had agreed to sell to the plaintiff 20 acres of land with the water right appurtenant. The water right had been purchased by Chapman from an incorporated irrigation ditch company. The plaintiff, not receiving the amount of water which he claimed he was entitled to, brought an action against his vendor. The court there held that the action could not be maintained, but should have been brought against the corporation which controlled the water. It was said: "The contract was delivered to the plaintiff, and by virtue of it he took and still retains possession of the land, and, as we construe the contract, he became thereby invested with the water right appurtenant to the land. If so, he must look to the corporation which controls the water for the pro rata share belonging to said lot. It does not anywhere appear in the record that the defendant ever agreed to deliver any water to the plaintiff; and the court did not so find."

As sustaining the contention that Berg cannot maintain the action, the authorities cited by the defendant which most nearly approach the question will here be considered. They are Knowles v. Leggett, 7 Colo. App. 265, 43 Pac. 154; Barstow Irrig. Co. v. Cleghon, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 93 S. W. 1023; First Nat. Bank v. Hastings, 7 Colo. App. 129, 42 Pac. 691; Oligarchy Ditch Co. v. Farm Invest. Co. 40 Colo. 291, 88 Pac. 443; 3 Farnham, Waters, p. 2001; George v. Robison, 23 Utah, 79, 63 Pac. 819.

In both the Knowles and Barstow Cases, the courts were considering leases where the owner of land had undertaken to furnish the tenant with a certain amount of water. In neither case was it attempted in the lease to transfer the water right to the lessee. There is an obvious distinction between a contract whereby the landlord undertakes to furnish water to his tenant, and a contract whereby he attempts to transfer the right to the water itself to the tenant, as in the present case.

In the First Nat. Bank and Oligarchy Ditch Co. Cases there will be found language sustaining the defendant's contention. But in neither case was it necessary, in deciding the cause then before the court, to pass upon the question. In the Bank Case there stood, in the name of one Dickson, stock upon the books of the ditch company. The bank brought suit and attached the stock. Prior to this time the land on which the water represented by the stock was used had been sold and transferred by Dickson to a third person. Construing a statute then in force in the state of Colorado, it was held that an attaching creditor was not required to look beyond the books of the corporation to determine who owned the stock. In the Oligarchy Ditch Co. Case there were two corporations, one known as Oligarchy Ditch Company, which was the owner of a ditch with an appropriation of water attached thereto; the other was the Oligarchy Extension Ditch Company. The latter corporation owned no water right and was organized solely as a conduit company. The stock in the extension company did not represent independent water rights, but only the right to carry water obtained from the Oligarchy Ditch Company. It was held that a deed conveying the land, together with all the rights to use water for irrigating the premises, did not include stock in the extension company. This company owning no water right, but being only a carrying company, it is plain that the right to have water carried, which the stock represented, would not pass as appurtenant to the land. There would seem to be a distinction between stock in a ditch company which represented the right to the water which had been appropriated and owned by the company, and stock in a corporation which owned no water rights, and only carried water for its members which they owned, evidenced by certificates of stock in another corporation.

Farnham on Waters, supra, states the doctrine broadly that water represented by shares of stock cannot be said to be appurtenant to land. In support of this statement the case of George v. Robison, supra, only is cited. An examination of that case will disclose that it does not support the declaration of the text writer. There the question arose between the vendor and the vendee of land. The vendee claimed the right to water as appurtenant under the covenant of warranty. Nowhere in the deed was there any express reference to water rights or water for irrigation or other purposes. It was held that the right to the water did not pass under the warranty. Had the right to the water been expressly mentioned or referred to in the deed, as it was in the Berg lease, the court there recognized that the rule would have been different, when it said: "From an examination of the evidence, the conclusion is irresistible that the water rights in question were treated by the owners as personal property, constituted no part of the realty, and, not being expressly mentioned or referred to in the deed, were not conveyed with the land, and that there is no proof that warranted the court in finding that the water was appurtenant to the land, or that the water rights were included in the warranty."

But even if it were conceded that the authorities just received do support the defendant's contention, we yet think the rule stated by Wiel, supra, is founded upon the better reason, and in its practical operations would be more just and equitable. To cause arid lands to become valuable for agricultural purposes, water is absolutely essential. The doctrine which makes it a question of fact whether the water right is appurtenant to the land, and whether it passes by a lease or other conveyance, seems to us sound.

Some claim is made that the corporation cannot be held liable because the stock still stood upon its books in the name of Preble. But this objection is not well founded. Prior to the time of the lease from Steward to Berg, the company had recognized the right of Steward in furnishing him water which was represented by the certificates. As to Berg, the officers and representatives of the corporation at no time refused to furnish him water because the stock had not been transferred upon the books of the corporation. There was no L.R.A.1915D.

dispute between them and him as to the amount of water to which he was entitled. Had the officers of the company refused to furnish him water until the stock had been transferred upon the books of the company, a different question would be presented, upon which we now express no opinion.

II. It is argued that a corporation organized for the purpose of furnishing water to its stockholders is not liable even to the stockholders on the ground of negligence, and therefore it would not be liable at the suit of a tenant. It must be admitted that, if the corporation would not be liable to its stockholders, a tenant of a stockholder would stand in no more advantageous relation. Little space need be devoted to the discussion of this question. One of the purposes of the corporation set out in its articles was "to construct, maintain, and operate a canal to carry water for irrigation and domestic purposes . . . to lands owned by its stockholders." By the by-laws it was provided that one of the purposes for which the annual water rental was charged was to meet the maintenance and operation of the canal. The rule is that, where a corporation is organized for the purpose of supplying water to its stockholders, it is its duty to exercise reasonable care in maintaining the ditch in proper repair and to see that each stockholder receives his proportionate share of the water. Failing in this duty, the corporation is guilty of negligence, and may be compelled to respond in damages at the suit of a stockholder. O'Connor v. North Truckee Ditch Co. 17 Nev. 245, 30 Pac. 882; Rocky Ford Canal R. L. Loan & T. Co. v. Simpson, 5 Colo. App. 30, 36 Pac. 638. In the O'Connor Case, speaking upon this question, it was said: "The stated objects of the corporation, as expressed in the certificate and the stipulations in the deed, clearly define the duties imposed upon the corporation. By the terms and conditions thereof the corporation is bound to keep the main ditch supplied with water, and to regulate and divide its use among the several stockholders in accordance with their respective interests; and it must necessarily follow that, for any neglect or failure to properly discharge its duty in this respect, it would be liable to the stockholder who is injured thereby, to the extent of the damages suffered by him."

III. It is next claimed that the evidence does not show negligence. The trial court found that the defendant was chargeable with negligence in two respects: First, that it failed to properly care for its canal during the fall of 1909 and the following winter and spring; that this negligence consisted in omitting to clean the canal so that it would carry the quantity of water that it was intended to carry; and that, by reason of this negligence, the plaintiff did not receive the water as early in the spring as it was needed, and as it was the duty of the defendant to furnish it; and, second, that the defendant did not supply the plaintiff with his proportionate share of the water that came down the ditch, but permitted other stockholders occupying lands further up the ditch, to take a greater portion of the water than they were entitled to; that by reason of this negligence the plaintiff lost a large portion of his nursery stock.

The trial judge filed in the case a written opinion. Speaking on the question of negligence he therein said: "The testimony of the officers in charge of the company during the spring of 1910 shows a clear case of negligence of a very pronounced kind. Very little effort was made to clean out any part of the ditch during the fall of 1909 after the time when it had a right to shut off the water for the purpose of cleaning out and making repairs. No repair work seems to have been done during the winter. It was all put off until the spring, and then the directors seem to have taken their time about everything. They turned the water on when it suited their pleasure, and shut it off to make repairs which might have been made before, showing an utter disregard for the rights of the patrons of the company. No shortage of water is claimed; no serious breaks in the ditch, causing unavoidable delays; in fact, no substantial reason is shown why water should not have been delivered by the first of April, and delivered with reasonable continuity throughout the entire season sufficient to have prevented the loss sustained by the plaintiff."

The views of the trial judge, as expressed in the findings of fact and in the written opinion, are abundantly sustained by the evidence. It would unnecessarily prolong this opinion and serve no useful purpose to review the testimony upon this question.

IV. The defendant in its brief proclaims vigorously against the amount of the judgment. But this invective overlooks the evidence in the record. The plaintiff's evidence shows the value of the nursery stock in its condition at the time of its loss by reason of the failure to receive water. The defendant offered no directly controverting evidence. The proper measure of damages for the loss of a growing crop is the value of the crop at the time of the loss. This value may be arrived at either by evidence showing the reasonable value of the crop upon the land at the time, or the market value at the time of maturity, less the cost of tilling, harvesting, and marketing. Shotwell v. Dodge, 8 Wash. 337, 36 Pac. 254; Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co. 64 Wash. 159, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 89, 116 Pac. 666.

The defendant offered evidence tending to show the inadaptability of the land for the purpose of producing nursery stock. The trial court, after the conclusion of the trial, as already stated, viewed the land. The plaintiff is prosecuting a cross appeal, claiming that the court erred in not making the award of damages sufficiently large. It is true that the evidence in the record would have sustained a larger verdict had the cause been tried to a jury and such a verdict returned. This, however, would not be a reason for our disturbing the judgment of the trial court.

Both parties having appealed, and neither having prevailed, no costs will be allowed in this court.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Chadwick, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the holding of the majority. Lack of time, owing to the change to be made in the personnel of this court within the next few days, prevents me from elaborating my views or going into the authorities. It will be enough to say that this action is brought against a mutual ditch company not organized for profits, of which Steward was a member. Upon the theory of the majority, he is as guilty of negligence as any other member of the company, and could not maintain an action in his own behalf. Berg stands in his shoes and can claim no greater right against the company than Steward could claim. Furthermore, a mutual ditch company should not be held to answer for the torts of one or more of its members. To do so would charge the innocent as well as the guilty, and put upon the innocent the burden of keeping a private contract made by one of the co-owners, and in which they had no interest whatever.

In consultation I asked the majority to tell me, or to state in the opinion, how the judgment in this case could be executed. The question was not answered, nor has it been answered in the opinion. The answer to that question furnishes the key to the whole superstructure of this case. As it now stands, plaintiff has a judgment which, in my opinion, is a paper judgment which cannot be enforced by taking the property or money of the unoffending members. They owed Berg no contract duty and no implied duty, and the water, which they had bought and paid for, is as essential to the tillage of their land as it was to the land leased by Steward to Berg. Surely no court will ever hold that the judgment can be executed by a sale of the ditch property. If it should, then may the property of the innocent and unoffending be taken at will, and justice will be a name without substance.

Messrs. W. M. Conaway and J. O. T. Tidler, for appellant:

Plaintiff's only full, complete, and adequate remedy was by suit in equity for the specific performance of the contract.

rop v. Columbia Collieries Co. 70 W. Va. 58, 73 S. E. 299.

In the above case it appeared that the party demanding the transfer of the stock and bonds was also seeking to obtain the title to the property of the corporation which issued the stock and bonds, and it was held that they were of peculiar value to him as they were really muniments of title; and as they could not be obtained in the market the court said that the usual reason against allowing specific performance in relation to stock and bonds cannot apply under such circumstances. Ibid.

A court of equity will specifically enforce a contract for the sale of stock upon deferred payments, which provided that the stock should be deposited in a bank, to be delivered to the purchaser in amounts equal to the payments made from time to time, since such contract did not amount to a sale in presenti, but was only an executory contract for the future sale of the stock, and with the stock held by the bank in escrow, the seller could not, in an action for the purchase price, truthfully allege a sale and delivery of the stock, and was not in a position of making a tender upon demanding payment of the amount due, and was without an adequate legal remedy for being deprived of the amount of the purchase money due by the terms of the contract. David v. McRae, 183 Fed. 812.

In Gilfillan v. Gilfillan, — Cal. —, 141 Pac. 623, it was held that one who had contracted for the purchase of stock in an oil company was entitled to have specific performance on the part of the seller upon showing that the corporation had no property except 40 acres of land upon which

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff filed his bill praying to have specific performance of an alleged contract oil had not been discovered, and the value was speculative, so that the stock had no market value, but its value could be ascertained only on the discovery of oil in the land and that adjacent thereto, and that the stock was owned by but a few persons, and none of it was for sale.

But specific performance of a contract for the transfer of corporate stock was denied, in Eckley v. Daniel, 193 Fed. 279, upon the ground that the bill failed to show want of an adequate remedy at law, where it was not averred that the stock could not be purchased in the market, or that its pecuniary value was not readily ascertainable, or that it had a peculiar value to the complainant.

One who subscribed in his name for corporate stock and bonds, on behalf of another who paid the consideration thereof, became a trustee for such other person upon the issuance of such stock and bonds, and may be obliged to transfer them to the beneficial owner by a court of equity, without the necessity of a showing that the remedy at law is inadequate. Bacon v. Grosse, 165 Cal. 481, 132 Pac. 1027. The court said that "undoubtedly it is the general rule that equity will not compel the delivery of specific personal property wrongfully withheld, nor enforce the specific performance of a contract to sell chattels, unless it is shown that money damages for the breach of the obligation would not afford adequate relief," but that the rule is not applicable L.R.A.1915D.

Equity will specifically enforce a contract made by a corporation to purchase its stock from a shareholder in consideration that the latter refrain from opposing the measures proposed by the other shareholders and that he withdraw from the corporation, where it appeared that, in fulfillment of the contract, he withdrew from participation in the management of the affairs of the corporation and allowed a policy which he opposed to be pursued, and it also appeared that the stock of the corporation could not be procured on the market and had no market price. Cole v. Cole Realty Co. 169 Mich. 347, 135 N. W. 329. The court pointed out that under the facts the defendant corporation would have been entitled to specific per-of sale to defendant of 3,400 shares of stock in the Mary Mining Company, a corporation, tendering therewith the certificates of stock duly assigned to defendant. He avers that he tendered the certificates, so assigned, on the day the sale was to be consummated by delivery of the stock and payment of the money therefor. He exhibits the contract of sale, which he avers was written by defendant himself, which is as follows:

Aug. 29, 1910.

I agree to take 3,400 shares of Haze Morgan (Mary mining stock) at 35¢ per share on or before Sept. 15, 1910.

[Signed] M. J. Bartlett.

I, Haze Morgan, bind myself to deliver to M. J. Bartlett the above number of shares of Mary mining stock at 35¢ per share on the above date.

[Signed] Haze Morgan.

He also avers that said corporation is of recent creation, and is reputed to have large copper and gold mineral holdings in the Republic of Mexico, which it is just beginning to develop, but that it has not yet paid any dividends; that it has issued and sold all the stock that it now proposes to sell, and no more stock is now for sale by it; that its formance if the shareholder had refused to comply with the contract; and that since there was a part performance of the contract by the shareholder of which the corporation had taken advantage, the damages to the shareholder caused by the failure of the corporation to perform its part of the contract, under the circumstances of the case, could not readily be ascertained or compensated if the shareholder was compelled to keep his stock and sue for damages in a court of law.

And in First Nat. Bank v. Corporation Securities Co. — Minn. —, 150 N. W. 1084, it was held that a shareholder who elected to sell his stock within the time prescribed in the contract for repurchase by the corporation, and made a sufficient tender thereof, was entitled to a degree of specific performance notwithstanding the fact that the agreement before the time of election was lacking in mutuality of remedy. The court said that mutuality of remedy is not the sole test of specific enforceability, and is not always essential thereto. The court quoted with approval from the opinion in Henry L. Doherty & Co. v. Rice, 186 Fed. 213, where it was said with reference to a contract for the sale of corporate stock, which originally lacked mutuality of remedy: "The objection of want of mutuality of remedy in the sense in which equity uses those terms no longer exists. Complainants seeking specific performance offer to perform on their part, and unreservedly submit themselves to the court to decree whatever may be proper in enforcing the L.R.A.1915D.

stock is not procurable in the open market for any known price, and its value is not readily ascertainable; that the stock has no provable value, and is sold by the holders thereof at different prices; that the enterprise of the corporation, from a financial standpoint, is uncertain, and therefore he cannot be compensated in damages for defendant's breach of contract.

Defendant answered, denying that he had contracted to buy the stock, but admitting that on the 29th of August, 1910, he and plaintiff had a conversation in regard to the purchase of the stock, and that the price talked of was 35 cents per share. He also admits that, on that day, a memorandum in writing was made of their agreement, which, he alleges, was an option, and not a sale. That memorandum he exhibits with his answer, and avers that it was made at a later hour in the day than the writing claimed by plaintiff to be their contract; that neither of them was bound by the agreement, but that it was only an option on the part of both; and that either party had a right to refuse to consummate it. The memorandum reads as follows:

Memo. 8/29/10. Dr. Bartlett agrees to buy Morgan's Mary Mining Company stock, rights of the other party to the contract. If defendants accept their offer, complainants cannot afterwards retract it, and thus escape a decree in favor of the defendants. If, on the other hand, defendants refuse the offer, and unsuccessfully resist specific performance, they cannot be compelled to perform, unless performance of every stipulation of the contract for their benefit is likewise coerced from complainants. In either event complete enforcement of the legal and equitable rights of the parties will be effected by one comprehensive decree, and the defendants cannot be remitted to a court of law for the enforcement of any of their rights."

But a contract for the sale of a part of the corporate stock of an amusement company in consideration of certain payments, which also provided that the amusement company should be entitled to first call upon a certain theater company—of which the purchaser owned a majority of the stock—for theatrical attractions that the latter company should produce for the period of ten years, will not be specifically enforced at the instance of the purchaser to compel a delivery of the stock, since it could not be enforced at the instance of the seller to secure a performance on the part of the theatrical company to furnish the stipulated talent to the amusement company continuously throughout the time designated, as equity will not award specific performance where the duty to be enforced is continuous and reaches over a long period of time, requiring constant supervision by the court.

3,400 shares, for $1,190, on or before 9/15/10, if Morgan will sell at that price when Bartlett gets ready to buy. Morgan agrees to sell at that price unless offered a better price.

[Signed] H. M.

Plaintiff replied generally, and depositions were taken by both plaintiff and defendant, and on the 22d of January, 1913, the cause was finally heard, and the decree denying relief and dismissing plaintiff's bill was made.

Apparently the court dismissed the bill for want of jurisdiction in equity. In this we think the court erred. That equity has jurisdiction to grant relief by decreeing specific performance of a contract for the sale of stock in a corporation, when the stock has a special or peculiar value and is not readily purchasable in the market, or when it has no certain ascertainable value, there can be little doubt. That such is the law of this state was held in Hogg v. McGuffin, 67 W. Va. 456, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 491, 68 S. E. 41, and Bumgardner v. Leavitt, 35 W. Va. 194, 12 L.R.A. 776, 13 S. E. 67. The former was a suit by the purchaser of stock in a coal company, and the latter was a suit by the seller of stock in a steamboat company, and the court entertained jurisdiction and granted relief in both cases. McGuffin had organized a corporation for the purpose of mining coal in Mingo county, and induced Hogg to purchase 50 shares of the capital stock at the par value of $100 per share, agreeing with him, at the time of his purchase, that, if he should wish to dispose of it within two years thereafter, he (McGuffin) would give him in exchange therefor 50 shares of stock in the Harvey Coal Company. Hogg elected to make the exchange within the time, and so notified McGuffin. But in the meantime McGuffin had sold his Harvey Coal Company stock to a third person, and therefore could not comply with his contract. The court held, however, that by virtue of his contract Hogg had a right to the funds derived from the sale of the Harvey stock. This was as near to a specific performance of the contract as the court could approach in that case on account of the intervening rights of innocent third parties. The first point of the syllabus in that case is as follows:

"Equity will decree specific performance of a contract for exchange of shares of stock in corporations when legal remedy is not adequate because the stock sought is of special and peculiar value, or is not readily

Defenses—uncertainty and incompleteness of contract.

A contract for the sale of corporate stock may be specifically enforced over the objection of uncertainty in regard to the price to be paid and the time and manner of payment, where it appeared that the contract clearly stated the price to be paid, and provided that a certain sum due from the seller to the buyer should be applied upon the price; that the buyer should assume and pay a certain sum, being one half of the seller's indebtedness to a third person, and should deposit the balance—$2,500—subject to call to meet future assessments, in consideration of the performance of which the seller agreed to deliver the stock as soon as it was released from pledge; it being held that since there were no assessments, the payment of the balance—$2,500—was due when delivery of the stock was offered or by the terms of the contract should have been offered. Gilfallan v. Gilfallan, — Cal. —, 141 Pac. 623.

But an agreement by one for the sale and transfer of stock owned by him in a certain corporation at a certain price per share, which did not mention the number of shares, and in which it was expressly understood that the seller would retain a portion of his stock as he did not wish to sever his connection with the corporation, is too indefinite to be specifically enforced. Sheehan v. Humphreys, 81 N. J. Eq. 416, 83 Atl. 189.

A contract for the sale of corporate stock may be specifically enforced over the objection that it is unfair, where it did not appear that advantage had been taken of the seller's financial circumstances; that the valuation was placed upon the stock by both parties, and was to be paid for by canceling the seller's present debts and advancing part of the price to meet expected obligations of the seller which he otherwise could not pay. *Gilfallan v. Specific performance will not be ordered to compel the transfer of a given number of shares of corporate stock, where it is not shown that defendant has the shares of stock in his possession. Lamb v. General Film Co. 130 La. 1026, 58 So. 867.

purchasable in the market, or has no certain ascertainable value, or a money judgment against the party would be worthless because of his insolvency, or other circumstance in the case calling for specific performance as the only adequate relief."

In the Bumgardner v. Leavitt Case, Mrs. Bumgardner had purchased stock from Leavitt in a steamboat which he was building, under a contingent agreement that he would repurchase the stock, at cost, or, if the boat depreciated in value, then at a fair cash value. The contingencies happened, and she gave him notice of her election to resell him the stock, and requested him to comply with his agreement. He declined and she sued for specific relief and obtained it. The same rule was again announced in Lathrop v. Columbia Collieries Co. 70 W. Va. 58, 73 S. E. 299. The following authorities are also in point: Safford v. Barber, 74 N. J. Eq. 352, 70 Atl. 371; Northern C. R. Co. v. Walworth, 193 Pa. 207, 74 Am. St. Rep. 683, 44 Atl. 253; Manton v. Ray, 18 R. I. 672, 49 Am. St. Rep. 811, 29 Atl. 998; Palmer v. Graham, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 476; 36 Cyc. 560; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 122.

The general rule is that for a breach of contract for the sale of personal property the parties are left to their remedy at law. But there are many exceptions to the rule. Where, because of the peculiar and exceptional value of the property, as in the case of slaves (Summers v. Bean, 13 Gratt. 404), or in case of heirlooms (26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 104), or the inability to duplicate the property in the market, and the uncertainty of its value, and, therefore, uncertainty in the matter of ascertaining the amount of damages. In such cases equity will generally compel performance. St. Regis Paper Co. v. Santa Clara Lumber Co. 173 N. Y. 149, 65 N. E. 967. Stock in a corporation, not procurable in the market and having an uncertain value, comes within the exception to the general rule respecting specific performance. Inadequacy of legal remedy is the basis for equity jurisdiction to enforce performance.

The general rule also is that the remedy is a mutual one. Bumgardner v. Leavitt, supra, and 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 28. To this general rule there may also be exceptions, as, for instance, where one party is bound by a writing signed by him, and the other has not signed it and is not so bound because of the statute of frauds. But it is not necessary to inquire into the exceptions to the rule, because the present case falls within the general rule respecting mutuality of remedy. If one party has the right to enforce the contract the other has also.

A number of persons in and around Clarksburg, where the parties to this suit resided, owned stock in the Mary Mining Company, and it is contended that plaintiff could easily have proved the value of his stock, and consequently the amount of his damage, if any he suffered. But it is shown by the depositions of witnesses that about the time the alleged agreement was made, and before and after that time, the stock had sold at different prices, ranging all the way from 15 cents to 65 cents per share, according to the degree of faith that the sellers and purchasers, respectively, happened to have in the success of the corporation's enterprise. Defendant was the owner of 19,000 shares at the time he made the alleged agreement with plaintiff, and he says he was offered shortly thereafter 2,000 shares, at 25 cents per share, by Mr. A. J. Simmons, of Clarksburg, who was the owner thereof.

This evidence proves that the stock had no certain market value. It had no rating in the stock market, and every man who had stock, and wanted to sell it, sold at such price as he was able to get. It also appears that about this time many of the stockholders, in and about Clarksburg, had lost faith in the ultimate success of the corporation's enterprise, and wanted to sell their stock. Under such conditions and circumstances, it would have been impracticable for plaintiff to prove the amount of his damages, and therefore his remedy at law was not adequate. Consequently, if he has proved his contract, he is entitled to have it enforced.

The next question is: Has the contract of sale been proved? We think it has. Defendant admits, in his deposition, that he signed the agreement exhibited with the bill, but insists that the option which he filed with his answer, signed "H. M.," was later, on the same day, left on his desk, and that it annulled the agreement signed earlier in the day by both parties. He does not say he was present when the option was written, or that it was handed to him by Morgan. He says: "My recollection does not serve me correctly as to the exact time I found it, but I found this on my desk after we had made this other contract."

We are forced to the conclusion, from this and other evidence, that defendant must be mistaken as to the time this option was written out and signed with the initials of plaintiff and left on his desk. It must have been before, and not after, the contract exhibited with the bill was written and signed by both parties. Plaintiff and defendant occupied adjoining office rooms, which communicated with each other, and they met frequently, sometimes more than once on the same day. Plaintiff swears that they had two transactions on the 29th of August, one before noon and one after noon; that in the former they had a conversation, and agreed orally to what is stated in the option signed "H. M.;" that after their talk he wrote out the option, retaining a carbon copy, and placed it in an envelop addressed to Dr. Bartlett, and then returned to deliver it to him, and did not find him in his office, and left it on his desk; that at that time he (plaintiff) did not wish to enter into a binding contract to sell at 35 cents a share, because he hoped to get a better price, and says that, a week before that, he had been offered 50 cents a share by E. F. Goodwin, an officer in the Mary Mining Company, who lived in Clarksburg; that, after talking with defendant, he again went to Goodwin and asked him what he ought to get for his stock, and found that Goodwin or his clients were not so anxious then to buy, and he again went to defendant's office in the afternoon and told him, if he would enter into a positive agreement of sale, he would sell him the stock at 35 cents per share, and that thereupon the contract sought to be enforced was written out by defendant, and was then signed by both of them. Defendant does not deny that the paper was then turned over to plaintiff, or that he wrote it. Is it not highly improbable that experienced business men (and they both appear to be such) should make a written contract, mutually binding, and then later attempt to convert it into an option, not binding on either of them, without canceling the original agreement? It was not only wholly unbusinesslike, but the so-called option was valueless and useless. It is not even a unilateral contract; it obligated neither party to do anything. It makes no reference to the original contract, and therefore does not seem to have been intended as a cancellation of it. The only rational explanation to be found for the existence of the two papers, the execution of both of which is admitted by the parties, is that the so-called option was made first and the sale contract later.

This conclusion leads to a reversal of the decree. A decree will be entered here requiring defendant to pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,190, with interest thereon from the 15th day of September, 1910, and that he be then entitled to the 3,400 shares of stock, and that he pay plaintiff his costs, both in this court, and in the court below.

Reversed, and decree entered here.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM DIBBERT, Resp.,

v.

METROPOLITAN INVESTMENT COMPANY, Appt.

(158 Wis. 69, 147 N. W. 3.)

Elevator — liability of owner to passenger.

1. The liability of the owner of an elevator in an office building to those rightfully using it is that of a common carrier to passengers.*

Evidence — burden of proof — fall of passenger elevator.

2. Proof by a passenger in an elevator in an office building that he was injured by its fall due to a defective bolt casts upon its owner the burden of showing that he took all the precautions to safeguard passengers which the law required him to take.

Same — test by manufacturer — necessity.

3. The owner of an elevator in an office building which falls to the injury of a passenger because of the breaking of the bolt which unites the cables to the car has the burden of showing that the manufacturer made a test of the tensile strength of the bolt if that would have disclosed its weakness, or if the apparatus had been used so long that the manufacturer's negligence might not have been the cause of the accident, he must show that he examined and tested the parts to ascertain whether or not they had been weakened by use.

Elevator — liability for manufacturer's negligence.

4. The owner of an elevator in an office building is liable for injuries to passengers because of the negligence of the manufacturer of the apparatus in using an unsafe bolt to unite the cables to the car.

Judge — prejudice — calling other judge.

5. There is no error in one of several judges of a trial court having co-ordinate jurisdiction calling in another judge to try a case after an affidavit of prejudice had been filed against himself, although the affidavit was not filed within the time specified by statute.

*Generally as to liability for injury to an elevator passenger, see notes in 25 L.R.A. 33, and 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 744.

Note. — Liability of a carrier for injury to passenger by latent defect in car.

The earlier cases on this question are discussed in the note to Morgan v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 790.

When a passenger is injured because of a latent defect in a car of the carrier, his right to recover for such injuries may be based either upon the negligence of the carrier or upon the theory that the carrier,

Evidence — transfer of office building — injury by fall of elevator.

6. In an action against a corporate owner of an office building to hold it liable for injury to a passenger on the elevator through a structural defect, there is no error in admitting evidence of the original owner of the building that he had conveyed it to the corporation of which he and his wife were the principal stockholders.

APPEAL by the defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Modified.

is an insurer. The latter theory, viz., that the carrier is an insurer, has never been adopted, but the passenger's right to recover is based upon negligence. It is a general rule that the carrier owes to passengers a very high degree of care, and any failure to exercise this high degree of care is regarded as negligence. It is in determining what acts or omissions of the carrier amount to a failure to exercise this degree of care that a difference of opinion arises.

The general rule that a carrier is not liable for latent defects is well established and is adhered to in Roanoke R. & Electric Co. v. Sterrett, 108 Va. 533, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 316, 128 Am. St. Rep. 971, 62 S. E. 385, in case of a defective bridge which the carrier had purchased from a thoroughly reputable and competent manufacturer.

It is the theory of some cases that the liability of the carrier is not determined solely by his care, that is, although he may have exercised the requisite degree of care in inspecting the car and maintaining the same, yet if the manufacturer has been negligent in failing to discover the latent defect, the carrier is liable for the manufacturer's negligence. This is the theory adopted in DIBBET V. METROPOLITAN INVEST. CO.

This was the theory of Morgan v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 790, and this theory was followed in a second appeal of this case reported in 129 Ky. 731, 112 S. W. 859. As shown in that note this theory is also adopted in New York and California.

This seems also to have been the theory of Gaiser v. Niagara, St. C. & T. R. Co. 19 Ont. L. Rep. 31, 14 Ont. Week. Rep. 42. In that case, however, there was the additional fact that the carrier did not make a proper examination of the car wheel; and the flange which broke owing to a latent defect arising from an air hole therein had been worn down so as to become thin over the air hole, and there was testimony to the effect that it might have been discovered by a proper examination, which the carrier failed to make; so that the decision might have rested upon the negli-

Statement by Barnes, J.:

On February 28, 1912, plaintiff, while riding as a passenger in an elevator in the office building of the defendant in the city of Milwaukee, was injured by the dropping of the elevator from the fourth floor to the basement. This action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained. It was a cable-hoisted hydraulic passenger elevator, running on guides. The elevator cage was attached to the cables by means of a drawbolt or kingbolt. The upper end of the drawbolt contained five eyes or holes. Through these holes three hoisting cables were fastened on one side, and two counterweight cables on the other side. The lower end of the bolt passed through a saddle strap, and a nut was screwed onto the gence of the carrier itself in failing to make proper tests.

It is apparent that this theory carries the liability of the carrier to an extreme. The fact that the carrier has selected a competent manufacturer is not alone sufficient to relieve it of liability, if such manufacturer has been negligent. See the cases in the earlier note holding the contrary doctrine.

Take the abstract case of an injury to a passenger due to a latent defect in a car. It is admitted, on the one hand, that the carrier is not an insurer, but is liable only for negligence. But negligence is a relative term, and depends upon the duty of the carrier. One theory might be that the duty of the carrier—and this seems to be the least duty that can be imposed on the carrier—is fulfilled when he has purchased the car of a reputable manufacturer; that he is under no obligation to inspect it. Another theory might impose more of a duty upon the carrier, and require him not only to purchase of a reputable manufacturer, but to inspect after the car had been in use. Or a still more burdensome duty might be imposed upon the carrier, and that would be to require him not only to purchase of a reputable manufacturer, but to inspect the car before it is put into use and continue this inspection at seasonable times thereafter.

It is conceivable that a court which adheres to the first theory might still be of the opinion that the carrier should not be relieved of liability for an injury due to a latent defect, and might, in order to furnish a basis for its decision, say that the carrier is liable for the manufacturer's negligence, whereas the defect may have been one that could have been discovered by the carrier by a proper inspection by it. In such a case it is more accurate to require a higher degree of care of the carrier, and base the decision upon a failure to comply with this degree of care; in other words, upon its own negligence rather than upon the negligence of the manufacturer.

A failure to distinguish in the degree of care or the duty which the carrier is held thread at the lower end of the bolt and under the saddle strap. The nut was held in place by a cotterpin, which ran through the bolt below the nut, the saddle strap resting on the nut. This strap went around the beam on the top of the elevator cage, and in this manner the cage was suspended. The drawbolt broke off flush with the upper side of the nut, through the threaded portion of the bolt, and this is what caused the elevator to drop.

The complaint charged the defendant with negligence for failure to maintain a reasonably safe and suitable elevator for the carriage of passengers; alleged that, for a long time prior to the accident, the elevator was in an unsafe and dangerous condition and defective; that it was not equipped with a proper safety device, as required by the city ordinance; that the drawbolt in question was placed in the elevator at the time the elevator was installed, nearly twenty years previous to the accident, and that long usage and the vibration from the elevator when in operation had caused the bolt to become worn and defective and the steel to become crystallized; further, that the bolt was defective at the time it was put in place, having a flaw known as a blowhole or sandhole at the place where it broke. The answer of the defendant denied all the material allegations of the complaint. The case was regularly called for trial in branch No. 3 of the circuit court for Milwaukee county, and, by order of the court, it was sent for trial to branch No. 2 of said court, where, bound to observe has led to a misinterpretation of the theory on which cases are based. This is true of the case of Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Snyder, 117 Ind. 435, 3 L.R.A. 434, 10 Am. St. Rep. 60, 20 N. E. 284, which involved an injury to a passenger from the falling of a bridge, for which the carrier was held liable. In the course of the opinion it is stated that the duty of a railroad company is not discharged by purchasing from reputable manufacturers the iron rods or other iron work used in the construction of its bridges. The court states: "The duty of the company is not discharged by trusting, without inspecting and testing, to the reputation of the manufacturers and the external appearance of such materials. The law requires that before the lives of passengers are trusted to the safety of its bridges, the company shall carefully and skilfully test and inspect the materials it uses in such structures." This case is not based on the theory that the carrier is liable for the manufacturer's negligence, as it has been interpreted, but that the carrier is liable for its own negligence in failing to perform its duty to "carefully and skilfully test and inspect the materials" it used.

It is apparent from the foregoing that if language is correctly applied to correct legal principles, the theory that the carrier is liable for the manufacturer's negligence requires the assumption that some latent defects which might have been discovered by the manufacturer by tests used by manufacturers could not have been discovered by tests used by carriers; or that the defects might have been discovered in the process of construction which could not be discovered thereafter in the exercise of the degree of care required of carriers. There seems to be more reason for holding the carrier liable in the latter case, that is, in case of a defect that might have been discovered in the process of construction, than in the former. But in either case, this theory requires that the carrier be more than a carrier; it is required to be a manufacturer and have its liability determined by rules applicable to manufacturers. As L.R.A.1915D.

stated in DIBBERT v. METROPOLITAN INVEST. Co., "the carrier is in no better position where it employs another to do its manufacturing for it than it would be if it were its own manufacturer." But a carrier does not necessarily engage in manufacturing, and where it has not done so, its liability should not be so determined.

The contrary doctrine is well stated in Nashville & D. R. Co. v. Jones, 9 Heisk. 29, a case involving the liability of a railroad company for wrongful death of an employee from the explosion of a boiler and therefore beyond the scope of the present note; but in which there is stated to be no difference between the liability of a railroad company to an employee and its liability to a passenger, in the application of the rule now under discussion. The rule that a carrier is liable for the manufacturer's negligence is disapproved. It is stated that "the legitimate obligation imposed upon the company by its contract with a passenger or employee is, that its engine and apparatus are then suitable, sufficient, and as safe as care and skill can make them, and that the company will be responsible for any injury resulting from defects therein which might have been discovered by the company or its agents by the proper care and skill in the application of the ordinary and approved tests. If the defects are such that they could not be discovered by the company or agents after a careful and skilful application of the ordinary and approved tests, then the company cannot be held responsible, although it may appear that the defects might have been discovered by the manufacturers, by applying the proper tests."

And see also Roanoke R. & Electric Co. v. Sterrett, 108 Va. 533, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 316, 128 Am. St. Rep. 971, 62 S. E. 385.

According to this theory the carrier has discharged his duty if he has purchased the appliance containing the latent defect, of a reputable manufacturer, exercised a high degree of care in inspecting it for such defects, and continues this high degree of care in watching the appliance for any suggestion of a weakened condition which over defendant's objection, it was tried. The jury returned the following special verdict:

"Question 1. Was the defendant guilty of negligence in failing to keep the south elevator provided, up to the time plaintiff was injured, with a drawbolt which was reasonably safe and sufficient for the carriage of passengers? Answer: Yes.

"Question 2. If you answer the first question 'Yes,' then answer this question: Was such negligence the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury? Answer: Yes.

"Question 3. At the time plaintiff was injured was the safety device on the south elevator in a reasonably safe condition for the purpose for which it was intended? Answer: No.

"Question 4. If you answer the third question 'No,' then answer this question: Was the defendant guilty of negligence in failing to keep such safety device in a reasonably safe condition for the purpose for which it was intended? Answer: No.

"Question 5. If you answer the fourth question 'Yes,' then was such negligence the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury? Answer: —.

"Question 6. At the time plaintiff was injured was the guidepost on the north side of the south elevator reasonably safe and sufficient for the purposes for which it was intended? Answer: No.

"Question 7. If you answer the sixth question 'No,' then answer this question: Was the defendant guilty of negligence in failing to have the guidepost, at the time of the accident, in a reasonably safe and sufficient condition for the purposes for which it was intended? Answer: No.

"Question 8. If you answer the seventh question 'Yes,' then was such negligence the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury? Answer: —.

"Question 9. If the court should be of the

it ought reasonably to suppose to be due to a latent defect.

Irrespective of whether the carrier can be held liable for the negligence of the manufacturer, if the carrier has failed to maintain a proper inspection of its cars, it is liable. See Gaiser v. Niagara, St. C. & T. R. Co. 19 Ont. L. Rep. 31, 14 Ont. Week. Rep. 42, supra.

In this connection it may be observed that when the discussion in a case holding the carrier not responsible for a latent defect is apparently directed solely to the question of care or negligence on the part of the carrier as the criterion of responsibility, and emphasizes the purchase of the car from a reputable manufacturer, without suggesting the possibility that the carrier might be responsible for the negligence of the manufacturer, the fact that it ap-opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, at what sum do you assess the plaintiff's damages? Answer: Three thousand dollars."

From a judgment entered in accordance with such verdict, defendant appeals.

Messrs. Doe & Ballhorn, for appellant:

Defendant was not guilty of negligence in failing to keep the south elevator provided, up to the time plaintiff was injured, with a drawbolt which was reasonably safe and sufficient for the carriage of passengers.

Messrs. Waldemar C. Wehe and Christian Doerfler for respondent.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant seeks to reverse the judgment because there was no evidence to sup-pears that adequate tests were made by the carrier to discover latent defects does not militate against the effect of the case as support for the view that the carrier is only responsible for its own failure to exercise a high degree of care to discover defects, and not for the failure of the manufacturer in that respect, since even in this view the carrier, in order to perform its duty, is bound to make adequate tests. To affect the value of such a case as a precedent for this view, it must be assumed that the adequate tests that were made were not only such as to establish a high degree of care on the part of the carrier, but also to negative the possibility of the discovery of such defects by the exercise of the high degree of care incumbent upon the manufacturer.

port a finding that it was negligent, and because there was a mistrial on account of other errors committed.

In deciding the motions made after verdict, the trial judge said: "Without contradiction, it appears that the defendant and its predecessor acted in the utmost good faith, and exercised extraordinary prudence in selecting the elevator which was installed, in arranging for frequent inspections thereof, in relying upon the recommendations and advice of the inspectors, and in promptly complying with their recommendations." We concur in this statement. We also think it was a matter of conjecture, under the entire evidence, whether the defect in the bolt was such that it could have been discovered by the so-called oil, whiting, or hammer tests when the elevator was installed. We shall assume that none of these tests would have discovered the flaw in the metal. This bolt was one of the vital parts of the elevator, just as vital as the cables or the beam which supported it. If any one of these things gave way, the elevator would fall, and injury would be likely to follow, unless, perchance, the safety device stopped the descent before the momentum became excessive.

The owner of an elevator in an office building is, to all intents and purposes, a common carrier, and his liability to those rightfully using the elevator is that of common carrier to passengers, and of such a common carrier as a railroad or steamship line. Ferguson v. Truax, 132 Wis. 478, 490, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 350, 110 N. W. 395, 112 N. W. 513, 13 Ann. Cas. 1092; Id., 136 Wis. 637, 643, 118 N. W. 251; Wanzer v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Philadelphia, 208 Pa. 127, 134, 65 L.R.A. 214, 57 Atl. 356, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 228.

The duty imposed on common carriers to provide for the safety of passengers is to exercise the highest degree of care reasonably to be expected from human vigilance and foresight, in view of the character of the conveyance adopted, and consistent with the practical operation of the business. This rule has been applied to both railroad companies and elevator owners. Oberndorfer v. Pabst, 100 Wis. 505, 513, 76 N. W. 338; Wanzer v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 108 Wis. 319, 84 N. the rule to be that the slightest neglect against which human prudence and foresight may guard and by which hurt is occasioned makes the carrier liable. Meier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 64 Pa. 225, 3 Am. Rep. 581; Fox v. Philadelphia, 208 Pa. 127, 134, 65 L.R.A. 214, 57 Atl. 356, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 228; Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 456, 26 L. ed. 141, 144, 10 Am. The carrier must use every precaution for the safety of its passengers that human skill and foresight could suggest, and, if there are certain known and satisfactory tests by which latent defects may be discerned in those appliances upon the soundness and strength of which the safety of the passenger depends, it is the duty of the manufacturer to make such tests. Hegeman v. Cork & B. R. Co. 13 Ir. C. L. Rep. 543. Mr. Hutchinson, after reviewing the authorities English and American on this point, states the rule as follows: "The established law in both countries may, therefore, be now stated to be that, while a carrier of passengers is bound to use the utmost care and skill in everything that concerns the safety of the passenger, he will not be responsible for injuries arising from latent defects in his vehicles or machinery, which no human care or skill could have either detected or prevented; or in other words, that, while it is his duty to apply every known and practicable test for the discovery of defects and imperfections in the vehicles and machinery which he employs for the transportation of passengers, he does not warrant that they are free from such defects and imperfections, and, if it appear that such defects actually existed, but were undiscoverable by such tests, he will not be held liable to the passenger for an injury which may re-

The plaintiff proved that he was injured by a fall of the elevator due to a defective bolt. There is no claim that he was guilty of any want of ordinary care. This proof raised a presumption of negligence on the part of defendant, and cast upon it the burden of showing that it took all the precautions to safeguard those whom it carried which the law required it to take. Meier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 64 Pa. 225, 230, 3 Am. Rep. 581; Miller v. Ocean S. S. Co. 118 N. Y. 199, 206, 23 N. E. 462; Breen v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 109 N. Y. 297, 300, 4 Am. St. Rep. 450, 18 N. E. 925, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 336.

It appears from the evidence of a number of witnesses what the tensile strength of this bolt would have been had it been sound and free from the sand flaw found therein and from other defects; so it appears that the tensile strength of the bolt might have been tested. It is quite as important for the safety of this elevator that the tensile strength of this bolt be tested as it is for the safety of a railroad train that the strength of a car or locomotive axle be tested, or that the resisting power of a locomotive boiler be tested. A break in any of these appliances is liable to result in the killing or maiming of human beings. It appearing that there was a known method of testing this bolt for a latent defect, which, had it been applied, might and in all probability would have discovered such defect, it was negligence on the part of the manufacturer not to test the tensile strength of the bolt, considering the use to which it was to be put. The evidence shows, without dispute, that, if this bolt had been sound and free from defects, it would have had sufficient strength to sustain a weight of from 60,000 to 80,000 pounds after it was threaded, and from 70,000 to 80,000 pounds before. The weight of the car and passengers at the time the bolt broke was about 3,600 pounds. The carrying capacity of the car at and before the injury was limited by the city to about 1,000 pounds in excess of the load carried when the bolt broke. The factor of safety was very large if the bolt was sound. It should have been capable of sustaining from 12 to 15 times the weight that was being actually carried when L.R.A.1915D.

it broke. It seems almost certain that a proper test of the tensile strength of the bolt would have disclosed its weakness.

Barring, for the present, one consideration which will next be discussed, the burden was on the defendant, under the authorities above cited, to show that an actual test of the tensile strength of the bolt had been made, in order to relieve itself from the presumption of negligence which followed from the facts shown by plaintiff's evidence. This it did not do.

The courts which exempt the carrier from liability in the case of appliances purchased from a reliable manufacturer, on account of latent defects not discoverable by ordinary inspection, where the manufacturer was negligent in not making known tests to discover latent defects, do so on these grounds: They say truly enough that the carrier is not an insurer; that the law does not contemplate that carriers will make their own appliances; that the manufacturers are not the agents of the carriers; that the carriers have the right to assume that a dealer of good repute has used such care as was incumbent on him to use in the construction of the appliance; that all that can be expected of a carrier is to purchase such an appliance as it has reason to believe is safe, giving it such an inspection as is usual and practicable; and that to adopt any other rule would make the carrier an insurer. The following cases follow the foregoing rule: Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Huntley, 38 Mich. 537, 547, 31 Am. Rep. 321; Frelsen v. Southern P. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 673, 7 So. 800, 9 Am. Neg. Cas. 394; Richardson v. Great Eastern R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 342, 24 Week. Rep. 907. There are some expressions to the same effect in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Phillips, 49 Ill. 234, but the question under discussion was not really involved in the case. There are also a number of other cases cited as holding the same doctrine in the note to Morgan v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 790. The cases have been examined, and are not considered in point. In practically all of them it is stated that adequate tests were made to discover latent defects. The only case we have found in this country in which the question is really discussed is that cited from the Michigan court, and that is based on the decision in Richardson v. Great Eastern R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 342, 24 Week. Rep. 907. The argument of the Michigan court that a different rule from that adopted would make the carrier an insurer does not appear to be sound. Liability can always be defeated by showing that an adequate test was, in fact, made. If the carrier were an insurer, this would not be so.

Turning to those cases which hold the carrier liable for the negligence of the manufacturer, we find that they proceed upon the following line of reasoning: The passenger has the right to insist that the carrier shall furnish appliances that will secure his safety, if they can be furnished by the exercise of the utmost care, skill, and precaution. The contract of carriage is between carrier and passenger, and the latter, having no control over or contract relations with the manufacturer, must look to the carrier to see that he is properly protected. The carrier itself may construct the appliance which it uses, or it may employ someone else to do so. In either case it engages that all that well-conducted skill can do will be done to make the appliance safe. A good reputation on the part of a manufacturer is not a substitute for a good vehicle. What is demanded and what is undertaken by the carrier is not merely that the manufacturer has the requisite capacity, but that it was skillfully exercised in the particular instance. In the ordinary course of things, the passenger does not know whether the carrier has himself manufactured the means of carriage or contracted with someone else for its manufacture. If the latter, the passenger does not usually know who the manufacturer is, and in no case has he any share in his selection. The liability of the manufacturer must depend on the terms of the contract between him and the carrier, of which the passenger has no knowledge, and over which he can have no control, while the carrier may make such stipulations and take such sureties as he deems proper for his protection. For injury resulting to the carrier himself for want of care on the part of the manufacturer, the former has or may provide for a remedy, while the passenger has none against the manufacturer for its breach of contract with the carrier. It is not to be presumed that, when the passenger makes his contract of carriage, he waives damages caused by a defective appliance which the manufacturer, in the exercise of due care, could have ascertained was defective. The only way that a remedy can be given in such a case is to hold the carrier responsible to the passenger and permit it to seek indemnity from the party whom it has selected to build the appliance and whose breach of contract has caused the mischief. The carrier is in no better position where it employs another to do its manufacturing for it than it would be if it were its own manufacturer; and, where it seems fit to employ another to do its manufacturing for it, the rule of respondet superior applies. The following cases hold the carrier liable for the negligence of the manufacturer: Hegeman v. L.R.A.1915D.

Considering the degree of care which a common carrier is required to use, we think the better reasoning, as well as the weight of authority, is to the effect that the carrier is liable for the negligence of the manufacturer, and we so hold. The New York decisions have been generously referred to herein, and we are not unmindful that it has been held in that state that an elevator owner is not a common carrier, and hence its liability is not measured by that of such a carrier. Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 188, 197, 52 L.R.A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630, 59 N. E. 925, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 336. That question is set at rest in this case, however, by the decisions of this court in the Pabst Case and in the two appeals in the Truax Case, which have been heretofore referred to.

The elevator had been in service for more than twenty years when the bolt broke, but we do not see how this long use could affect the situation. The fact remains that there was a large flaw in the bolt, which greatly weakened its strength; that in all probability a proper test of the strength of the bolt would have disclosed the flaw; that such test was not made; and that plaintiff was injured because it was not made. If long use would tend to acquit the manufacturer of negligence, then the exercise of due care would impose on the owner the duty of taking the machinery apart and examining and testing the bolt to ascertain whether or not it had become materially weakened from constant use, and this was not done.

The case was pending for trial before Judge Williams, and an affidavit of prejudice was filed against him. He held that the affidavit had not been filed within the time the statute required, but declined to try the case, and sent it for trial to Judge Fritz, who presided over another branch of the circuit court for Milwaukee county. It is said that Judge Williams erred in sending the case to another judge for trial, and that Judge Fritz erred in proceeding with the trial over defendant's objection, and further that the error was jurisdictional. There is but one circuit court for Milwaukee county, consisting of six branches presided over by different judges. The jurisdiction of these judges is co-ordinate, and litigants have no vested right to try their cases before one judge in preference to another, unless, perchance, the judge before whom a cause is pending is disqualified on some statutory ground. Surely Judge Fritz had the same jurisdiction to try the case that Judge Williams did. The latter, in common with most judges, felt some delicacy about trying a case after the filing of an affidavit of prejudice, even if it was not filed within the statutory time, and, in effect, called in another judge of the same court to try the case, because this is what the proceeding amounted to. We do not see where there was anything improper or prejudicial in the conduct of Judge Williams.

The building in which the elevator was located was originally built and owned by Mr. Cotzhausen. Later it was conveyed to the defendant corporation. Mr. Cotzhausen was called in as an adverse witness, and, under objection, testified that he and his wife were the principal stockholders in the corporation. It is argued that this was prejudicial error. If the change in ownership could in any case affect the question of liability, it did not do so here, where the change was practically nominal. Haynes v. Kenosha Electric R. Co. 139 Wis. 227, 119 N. W. 568, 121 N. W. 124; Wolf Co. v. Kutch, 147 Wis. 209, 132 N. W. 981.

The other detailed errors assigned become immaterial, under the view of the case taken by the court.

Judgment affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down on October 6, 1914 (158 Wis. 80, 148 N. W. 1095):

The verdict in this case was rendered June 25, 1913. Before the expiration of one year the defendant made a motion for a new trial in the circuit court on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The mandate of this court affirms the judgment of the circuit court. The defendant conceives that such mandate would preclude the trial court from passing on the motion for a new trial, and asks this court to modify its mandate, so as to order a new trial, or, in the alternative, to so modify it that the circuit court may do so, if satisfied that the motion should be granted. The merits of the motion should be passed upon by the lower court, and the mandate is modified, so as to affirm the judgment without L.R.A.1915D.

prejudice to the right of the defendant to have its motion for a new trial determined by the circuit court; otherwise, motion denied, without costs.

It is so ordered.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

BENJAMIN GOTFREDSON, Admr., etc., of Carrie B. Reading, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,
v.

GERMAN COMMERCIAL ACCIDENT COMPANY.

(— C. C. A. —, 218 Fed. 582.)

Insurance — accident — more hazardous occupation — proprietor operating elevator.

One insured against accident as "proprietor" of a trucking business, "no manual labor," does not, by undertaking to operate an elevator after working hours when the regular operator has gone home, in order to unload some trucks engaged in moving his business from one location to another, bring himself, as matter of law, within a clause in the policy making the amount recoverable in case of injury while insured is doing any act or thing pertaining to any more hazardous occupation such portion of the face of the policy as could be purchased by the premium paid at the rate fixed for such occupation, although the occupation of elevator operator is classed as more hazardous than the proprietorship of such business, but the question of the casual or habitual character of the act is for the jury.

Note. — Accident insurance: provision for forfeiture or reduction of benefits in event of injury while engaged in more hazardous occupation, or variations of that provision, as applied to occasional or temporary acts.

As to whether temporary pursuit of other activities amounts to a change of occupation within the meaning of a policy, see note to Taylor v. Illinois Commercial Men's Assn. 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1174.

Provisions for forfeiture or reduction in case of injury in any occupation or exposure classed as more hazardous.

Clauses in accident policies providing for a forfeiture or reduction in the sum payable if the insured is injured or killed in any occupation or exposure classed as more hazardous than that under which he was classified have frequently been before the courts. There has been little difference of opinion as to the applicability and effect of such provisions as applied to cases where the insured was injured while performing;

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan (Alexis C. Angell, District Judge), to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor for less than the relief demanded in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

Argued before Warrington, Krappen, and Denison, Circuit Judges.

Statement by Warrington, Circuit Judge:

This was an action to recover $5,000 upon a policy of accident insurance. The policy was to continue for one year from February 7, 1907, and was issued by the Commercial Mutual Accident Company of Philadelphia an occasional act relating to a more hazardous occupation, it being generally held that the classification intended by such provisions is a classification of occupations, and not of particular acts or exposures, and that therefore the fact that the insured occasionally performs acts pertaining to a more hazardous occupation does not have the effect of forfeiting the policy of reducing the amount of recovery.

This result has been reached under policies providing for a reduction of damages if the insured was injured in any occupation or exposure classed as more hazardous than that named in the policy—

—where one insured as a mining engineer (a preferred class) was killed while riding as a passenger on a locomotive. Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 121 Cal. 458, 41 L.R.A. 467, 86 Am. St. Rep. 49, 53 Pac. 918;

—where a brakeman was killed while making an ascension in a balloon, although the occupation of an aeronaut was classed as more hazardous than that of brakeman. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Van Fleet, 47 Colo. 401, 107 Pac. 1087;

—where one insured as a "freight flagman not coupling" occasionally coupled cars, and was killed while "putting in a slack pin." Hoffman v. Standard Life & Acci. Co. 127 N. C. 337, 37 S. E. 466;

—where one insured as baggageman was killed while coupling cars, an act generally done by brakemen, which was classed as a more hazardous occupation. Canadian R. Acci. Ins. Co. v. McNevin, 32 Can. S. C. 194.

In Canadian R. Acci. Ins. Co. v. McNevin, supra, Taschereau, J., said: "The deceased did not give up his occupation or employment as a baggageman to become a brakeman, and he was not injured in any exposure classed by the company as more hazardous. Occupations are classified according to the evidence, but not exposures. The word 'exposure' in the policy is a redundancy. It means nothing else than any occupation more hazardous."

The court in Fox v. Masons' Fraternal Acci. Asso. 96 Wis. 390, 71 N. W. 363, where the policy contained a provision for a reduction of the sum payable in case of injury in any occupation or exposure classed as more hazardous than that under which the insured was classified, also held that a particular exposure under such a contract, though not in pursuit of and as a part of the business or occupation mentioned in the policy, was not material as affecting the liability of the insurer. And in that case a motion for the direction of a verdict for the sum fixed for the occupation of a lumberman, which was classed as more hazardous than that of a sawmill owner and superintendent, which was given as the insured's occupation, was held properly refused, although the insured was injured while attempting to cut away the top of a tree with an ax. Ibid.

And in Stone v. United States Casualty Co. 34 N. J. L. 371, an indorsement on a policy excluding liability for injuries "received in any employment or by any exposure either more hazardous in itself or classified by the company as more hazardous" was held to have respect to employments, and not to individual acts, and it was held that for the insured to come within the terms of the indorsement he must, at the time of the injury, be in an employment more hazardous than his own. The court said: "If the company intended to say to the assured that if he did any act which did not strictly belong to his own occupation, but was embraced more properly in some other business, and if thereby any harm to him accidentally resulted, that in such event he could claim nothing under his policy, it was easy for them to do so in plain language. Such a stipulation would obviously be one of a most important character, and we could expect to find it in the body of the instrument. A qualification of the agreement so restrictive of the rights of the party insured ought not to be admitted, unless the terms of this indorsement will bear no other rational interpretation. If the terms used are imperfect or ambiguous it is the fault of the defendants; it is their contract, and the construction of it must be most strongly against them,—contra proferentes. Nor do I think the liberal interpretation of this clause which the delivered by Harvey J. Reading, and for the benefit of Carrie Reading, his wife. It was kept alive by annual payments of premiums and renewals until February 7, 1910, and, under the last renewal, was in terms continued for the ensuing year; but meanwhile, February 7, 1909, all liability under the policy was assumed by the German Commercial Accident Company, defendant, which received the premiums and made the renewals for the last two years. Both of these companies were corporations organized under the laws of Pennsylvania and maintaining agencies in the city of Detroit, Michigan. The present insurance was effected in that city, where Reading was living and engaged in business from the date of the policy until his death. The insured met in the name of Harvey J. Reading, and for the benefit of Carrie Reading, his wife. It was kept alive by annual payments of premiums and renewals until February 7, 1910, and, under the last renewal, was in terms continued for the ensuing year; but meanwhile, February 7, 1909, all liability under the policy was assumed by the German Commercial Accident Company, defendant, which received the premiums and made the renewals for the last two years. Both of these companies were corporations organized under the laws of Pennsylvania and maintaining agencies in the city of Detroit, Michigan. The present insurance was effected in that city, where Reading was living and engaged in business from the date of the policy until his death. The insured met with an accident June 1, 1910, and died within the next three days; his widow made and delivered proof of the death in July, but died in October; and thereupon Benjamin Gotfredson, plaintiff, was appointed and qualified as administrator of the estate of the beneficiary. The suit was brought in the circuit court of Wayne county, Michigan, December 14, 1910, and was removed the following day to the court below, on the ground of diversity of citizenship. An amended petition was filed in April following, and under a plea of the general issue three defenses were noticed: (1) That there had been a breach of warranty as to the condition of health of the assured at the time of the last renewal; (2) that the accident was not the direct cause of the death, but was the result of a diseased condition of the heart; and (3) that recovery, if any, must be limited to $1,000, because the assured was doing an act outside of the occupation in which he was insured. The verdict was against defendant as to its first and second defenses, and the court charged the jury, as matter of law, that recovery in any event must, under the third defense, be limited to $1,000 and interest. The administrator prosecutes error. The parties are alluded to as they stood below.

Mr. J. W. Dohany for plaintiff in error.

fense contends for a practical one. It would be difficult to put it in practice, for who can say, in many cases, what acts are properly incident to one occupation, and which are not so to any other? The subdivisions of employments are so numerous and minute that, in actual life, it is impossible to separate them by any visible and exact line; for instance, in the first of these classifications, the shopkeeper is placed, and in the second the laborer; the employments of these are distinct, but with respect to particular acts it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to classify them into those which are common to both occupations, and into those which are peculiar to each. It does not seem to me proper to bring into this agreement this confusion and uncertainty by construction."

The insured in that case, a school-teacher temporarily out of employment, had had two houses built for his own use, and was killed by falling from a barn which he was having erected, while inspecting it. Notwithstanding the trial court's erroneous instruction that the insurer was exempt from liability for injuries received in doing any act which fell peculiarly within the ordinary duties of a forbidden occupation, the jury found that the act of the insured was not more appropriately incident to other occupations than it was to that of a teacher, the finding being based on the idea that one who has a building in the course of construction may visit it as a spectator without doing anything which is aside from the ordinary line of his life. Ibid.

In accord with the foregoing cases in Hall v. American Masonic Acci. Asso. 86 Wis. 518, 57 N. W. 366, where the policy provided that if an injury was received in any occupation or exposure classed as more hazardous than that represented as the insured's occupation, only the sum payable for the increased hazard should be recoverable, the trial court instructed the jury that a grocer delivering goods was one who was engaged as a dealer in groceries, and who habitually delivered in person, but that an occasional delivery by him—the rule being that delivery was made by others—would not make him a grocer delivering goods, and the appellate court said that in the absence of an exception this was the law of the case, and that it was probably good law in any case; and a finding that one insured as a merchant and proprietor was not a grocer delivering goods by occupation was held to be supported by evidence that he occasionally delivered goods, but that his son delivered the principal part of them.

In Everson v. General Acci. F. & Life Assur. Corp. 202 Mass. 169, 88 N. E. 658, the insured was described as proprietor and manufacturer of infusorial earth, and his duties were entered as office and traveling only, and the policy provided that if he was injured fatally or otherwise in any occupation classified as more hazardous than that stated in the schedule of warranties the insurer should be liable only according to the rate fixed for the more hazardous occupation; but it was provided that claims for injuries sustained while engaged in games or sport for recreation, or while performing duties about his residence, should not be prorated. It appeared that the insured had been at his works in New Brunswick two or three weeks for a vacation, living in a cottage with his family, and that he had directed and assisted in making experiments with infusorial earth, in which experiments acid was used. There was evidence that the manual labor had been done by a workman, and that the insured's injury by burning with acids happened after the experiments had ended. An employee of the insurer testified that it was the business or employment from which the insured derived his livelihood by which the insurer determined its classification, and upon this evidence it was held that the question whether the insured was injured in a more hazardous occupation than that under which he was insured was properly left to the jury. The court said: "Occupation is a term of broad significance and includes the trade, calling, profession, office, employment, or business by which one usually gets his living. It is not incidental, recreatory, or even necessary suspension of the performance of regular duty, which constitutes a change of occupation. Vacation expedients differ almost as widely as the temperaments

Warrington, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling feature of the case is whether the limitation placed upon the amount of recovery involved merely a question of law for the court, or also a question of fact for the jury. It was shown without objection and by undisputed testimony that defendant had grouped its risks into five classes, and fixed premiums and losses according to the risks attending the occupations of the persons insured. Reading's occupation belonged to the first class and bore an annual premium of $25 and an indemnity of $5,000, while the occupation of an elevator conductor was in the fifth class, and bore a relatively higher, though undisclosed, premium, and an indemnity of $1,000. In addition to the language used in defining Reading's occupation, the fifteenth clause of the policy provided generally that, if an assured should be injured while doing an act "pertaining to any more hazardous occupation," the liability of the insurer should be fixed with reference to the more hazardous occupation. The trial court submitted to the jury the questions arising under the first and second defenses only, and, believing that merely a question of law was involved under the third defense, instructed the jury that it could not in any event find more than $1,000 under this defense. If error was committed, it was in failing to submit to the jury also the question of fact arising under this defense. Among the representations of fact made by of men. The occasional recurrence for diversion or recuperation to tilling the soil does not convert the business or professional man into a farmer. The statesman felling trees for exercise could not thereby be classified properly as a wood chopper by occupation. Where the nature of the employment is narrow and classification is strict and closely subdivided, change from one class of compensated work to another may effect a change, as was held in Aldrich v. Mercantile Mut. Acct. Asso. 149 Mass. 457, 21 N. E. 873. But where comprehensive phraseology is used, a slight variation from daily routine does not rise to the dignity of a change of the main purpose of one's business activity."

In Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 71 C. C. A. 79, 138 Fed. 629, under a policy providing that if the insured was injured in any occupation or exposure classed higher than that under which the insured was rated, the benefit payable should only be for such amount as the premium would purchase for the increased hazard, it was held that the beneficiary of one insured as a druggist could recover only the amount which the premium paid would have purchased one engaged in the occupation of a supervising farmer, upon its appearing from the evidence that his drug store had burned down eight months before he was injured, and that he and his family then went to live on a homestead claim which he had taken up and upon which he had built a house, and that he later built a barn on the claim, kept horses there, and had it cultivated, and did nothing in the line of the drug business except attempt to collect some accounts connected with his former business. The court here said: "The correct test in these cases is not so much as to whether the assured had in fact abandoned the occupation stated in his application and policy, but whether or not at the time of his injury he was in fact engaged in another occupation, not merely incidental, but as a business of a more hazardous classification."

52 Atl. 1048, in which a policy containing a provision the same as that just considered was involved, one insured as proprietor of a gristmill—supervision only—was held to have been engaged in the more hazardous occupation of farmer and farm laborer, where it appeared that he went to his father's farm and temporarily took charge of the haying during his father's absence, and was injured while hastily driving a rake under cover to avoid an approaching shower.

Provisions of the character under consideration have generally been invoked by the insurer in order to defeat or reduce the amount of recovery; but in Miller v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 39 Minn. 548, 40 N. W. 839, the insured attempted to have a provision limiting the insurer's liability in case he was injured while engaged in any occupation or exposure classed as more hazardous than that named in the policy as his occupation applied for his benefit. He was insured as a banker, and was injured while attempting to board a moving train. By reason of a provision exempting the insurer from liability under such circumstances his right of recovery was otherwise barred, and he claimed as a last resort the right to recover at least the same benefit that one whose business was that of boarding moving trains would have been entitled to recover. The court, however, refused to uphold his contention, and held that in order to bring a case within the provision of the policy in question the insured must have been within one of the classes; that is, actually engaged in one or more of the more hazardous occupations.

Several cases have arisen under provisions in effect the same as those under consideration, although not identical therewith, in which the view was taken that an occasional act in connection with a more hazardous occupation will not avoid the policy or reduce the benefit.

Thus, in Travelers' Preferred Acct. Asso. v. Kelsey, 46 Ill. App. 371, under an accident policy insuring one as an agricultural superintendent, and providing that the insured should be entitled to no indemnity

Reading in the application, and in terms warranted to be true at the date of the policy and its last renewal, were these: "I am a member of the firm H. J. Reading Truck Company, . . . whose business is that of trucking. My occupation and duties are fully described as follows: Proprietor. No manual labor."

The evidence shows that Reading owned the business and conducted it under this firm name; and that the business was extensive,—indeed, for a year prior to the accident, it included transportation in Detroit for 2 railroads and 150 wholesale houses, and also the storage of general merchandise. A change in location of the offices and storage plant had been going on some two months, when, on the evening of the accident, some of the effects of the old offices were brought to the new place for storage. The evidence tends to show that three loads of such articles arrived at this place as early as 5 o'clock. The removal of two of the loads into the building was not completed until the usual closing hour of 5:30. When the men were ready to discharge the third load, it was discovered that the elevator conductor had gone for the day. Reading's attention was called to this, whereupon he undertook to operate the elevator. The work of removing the articles contained in the third load to and from the elevator, so far as they were so carried, was performed by laborers; Reading doing nothing but run the car. One trip was made with the elevator to the basement and for injuries sustained in any employment more hazardous than that under which he was insured, there was held to be no change of occupation or vocation where the insured was injured while temporarily acting as superintendent of police at a state fair, without compensation.

And it has been held that one insured as a grocer's secretary and treasurer, by an accident policy providing that if he was injured "while engaged in work or duty classified as more hazardous" than the occupation for which he was insured, he should recover at the rate fixed for the increased hazard, does not, as a matter of law, come within the operation of that provision by returning to a farm owned by him less than a week after his employment as secretary and treasurer had ceased. Johnson v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 40 L.R.A. 440.

So it has been held that a bank cashier does not, as a matter of law, lose his right to recover under an accident insurance policy providing that it shall be wholly void as to all accidents occurring "when engaged in any profession, employment, or exposure not rated as a preferred occupation," by sawing off blocks from a board for his own use. Hess v. Preferred Masonic Mut. Acci. Asso. 112 Mich. 196, 40 L.R.A. 444, 70 N. W. 460.

And in Wilday Casualty Co. v. Sheppard, 61 Kan. 351, 47 L.R.A. 650, 59 Pac. 651, it was held that one insured as a barber and restaurant keeper was not injured while engaged in the occupation of hunting, which was classed as more hazardous, where he was injured while hunting rabbits in his orchard, it being held an individual act incident to his daily life, which could not be regarded as an occupation.

In Knapp v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Asso. 53 Hun. 84, 6 N. Y. Supp. 57, appeal dismissed in 130 N. Y. 635, 29 N. E. 150, where a certificate provided that it should be void "as to all accidents occurring in any occupation, profession, or employment, or exposure not named, or incident to the occupation under which" a person became a member, it was held that one insured as a retired gentleman could not recover for an injury received while operating a buzz saw in a wagon shop for amusement, since his act was not incident to the occupation of a retired gentleman.

In Simmons v. Western Travelers' Acci. Asso. 79 Neb. 20, 112 N. W. 365, where the constitution of the insurer provided that if a member should change his occupation to one classed as more hazardous than that stated, he should only be entitled to such benefits as were fixed for the increased hazard of occupation, and a person was insured as a traveling salesman, it was held that the question whether, at the time he died, he was engaged in the occupation of ranch foreman, supervising and superintending a ranch, an occupation classed as more hazardous, was for the jury where there was evidence that he lost his position as traveling salesman, and at the invitation of his father went to reside on the latter's ranch until he could obtain another position, and that for about two years prior to his death he did nothing but hunt and visit, but at the time of his death he was preparing to leave and take a new position as traveling salesman. (Generally as to change of occupation, see note in 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1174.)

In Batten v. Modern Woodmen, 131 Mo. App. 381, 111 S. W. 513, where the certificate and by-law forbade insured, a common laborer about railroad shops, from engaging in the hazardous employment of a railroad switchman, and also provided that one should be held to be engaged in any of the hazardous occupations mentioned when the work or duties incident to the insured's employment required him occasionally or continuously to perform any of the work or duties of or incident to the hazardous occupations, it was held that it could not be said as a matter of law that the insured was engaged in the prohibited occupation, although there was evidence that he occasionally assisted in using a small engine to move other engines into the shop, and occasionally threw a switch, but did not work out in the switch yard nor engage in the switching and braking attending the another to a floor above, and the car in both instances was returned in safety; but when the third load reached the fifth floor the cable separated, the car fell, and Reading received injuries from which he died.

It does not appear that Reading ever ran the elevator before; and the occasion for this act was the fact that the conductor left the building while the men were engaged in removing the articles. In view of the facts and circumstances of the case, was Reading's operation of the car merely a casual act and incident to the occupation in which he was insured, or was the act to be ascribed to the occupation of the conductor of the elevator, and Reading's indemnity reduced accordingly? Defendant's counsel say the act was "manual labor," performed in another and distinct occupation, and more hazardous than the one described in the policy; and further, that it was but one of a number of kindred acts Reading was accustomed to perform. It appears, for example, that he was in the habit of exercising superintendency over the business, over the change made in locations of the offices and storage plant,—in a word, that he "bossed the operations of the business,"—and, if we understand counsel, these acts are claimed to give color to the act which resulted in the insured's death. This does not, however, give effect to all the words that were used to define his occupation. He was engaged in the trucking business, and his "occupation" was described as "proprietor, no manual labor."

making up or breaking up of trains, and was never transferred to take the place of switchmen. The court said that the words "any work" of a switchman did not mean any work which a switchman or brakeman might do, since a part of the work of these two callings is common to all work, and to keep within the contract in absolute literalness one would have to forego any labor.

Provision as to injury received while temporarily or permanently engaged in any occupation or exposure to danger classed as more hazardous.

The addition to the provisions considered under the preceding subdivision of the words "temporarily or permanently," or "temporarily or otherwise," was apparently made for the purpose of effecting a forfeiture or reduction of benefit even in cases involving an occasional change of occupation. A number of cases have arisen involving policies containing these additional words.

Thus, in Baldwin v. Fraternal Accl. Asso. 21 Misc. 124, 46 N. Y. Supp. 1016, affirmed in 29 App. Div. 627, 52 N. Y. Supp. 1136, which was affirmed in 159 N. Y. 561, 54 N. E. 1089, where a manual of an accident company limited the indemnity for an injury received while engaged temporarily or otherwise in an occupation or employment classified as more hazardous than the one stated in the application, and provided that on changing occupation or employment the member should notify the insurer in writing, it was held that one insured as an undertaker did not change his occupation to that of bicyclist by riding a bicycle occasionally for convenience or pleasure, it being held that the provision referred to a person's regular occupation.

And in National Accl. Soc. v. Taylor, 42 Ill. App. 97, where the policy contained a provision like that involved in the preceding case, and the occupation of "pile driver-employee" was classed as more hazardous than that of a supervising farmer, under which the insured was classed, it was held that the insured, while driving posts with a sledge in making repairs to a bridge on his farm, was not engaged as a pile driver, either in the capacity of a pile driver or employee, and it was further held that there was no change of occupation or business on account of the making of the repairs.

In Neafie v. Manufacturers' Accl. Indemnity Co. 55 Hun, 111, 8 N. Y. Supp. 202, it was held that a description of the insured as an "iceman (prop.)" did not describe him merely as engaged in the management of a business, but was broad enough to include the actual delivery of ice by him on his own behalf; and that no reduction in the indemnity payable for any injury received while delivering ice could be claimed under a provision of the policy that if a person receives an injury while engaged temporarily or otherwise in an occupation or employment classified as more hazardous than the one stated, there shall be a certain reduction in the sum payable.

In Loesch v. Union Casualty & Surety Co. 176 Mo. 654, 75 S. W. 621, where an accident policy provided that for any injury received by the insured "while exposed temporarily or otherwise to a hazard classed by the company in its manual . . . as more hazardous than that given" in the application the insurer should be liable to the amount the premium paid would purchase in the more hazardous class, and one was insured as a stock dealer whose duties were "visiting yards, not working or tending in transit," and this occupation was classed as a preferred risk, while a stock dealer and tender in transit was classed in the manual as extra hazardous, it was held that there was no evidence to sustain the hypothesis that the insured was only a stock dealer visiting yards, not working nor tending in transit, where his evidence showed that he was injured while unloading a car of cattle which had just arrived at the stock yards.

The court held that the meaning of the hazard clauses was that the insured agreed that for any injury received while exposed to a hazard peculiarly incident to an occupation classed in the manual as more haz-

The company's agent, who solicited and obtained the insurance, in substance testified that these were not the words of Reading, but that they were employed by the agent to describe Reading's occupation. To be sure, according to another portion of the application, Reading warranted these words "to be true and complete;" but aside from the rule that would require the policy to be interpreted strongly against the defendant, associating the words "trucking business" with the words "proprietor, no manual labor," and considering their apparent intent, it would seem that their natural and necessary meaning would include mere casual acts, even though the acts involve temporary manual labor. It must be kept in mind that these words were used to describe the occupation, the regular business, of the applicant. Occupation is a very comprehensive term. It compasses the incidental as well as the main requirements of one's vocation, calling, business. It is defined by lexicographers to be "that which occupies or engages the time and attention; the principal business of one's life; vocation; employment; calling; trade." And see Everson v. General Acci. Fire & Life Assur. Corp. 202 Mass. 169, 175, 88 N. E. 658; Union Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Frohard, 134 Ill. 228, 234, 10 L.R.A. 383, 23 Am. St. Rep. 664, 25 N. E. 642.

It is not too much to say that the parties here possessed the common knowledge that is derived from observation and experience respecting the occasional and unexpected arduous than that given by him as his occupation, the insurer's liability should be limited; and held an instruction erroneous which told the jury that unless the manual classified the insured's act of untying the animal which injured him as more hazardous than the occupation of a stock dealer not tending stock in transit, they should find a verdict based on the occupation stated in the application, since such instruction followed too literally the language of the clause. Ibid.

In Aldrich v. Merchantile Mut. Acci. Asso. 149 Mass. 457, 21 N. E. 873, where a policy described the insured as a "spare conductor," and contained a provision the same as that involved in the preceding case, and different rates were charged for brakemen and conductors, the occupation of the former being classed as the more hazardous, but there was no classification of spare conductors, it was held that recovery could be had only for the indemnity fixed for brakemen where the insured was killed while performing the duties of a brakeman. The beneficiary in this case claimed that the term "spare conductor" meant one employed to do anything and go anywhere on any train, but no such general use of the term was shown, and it did not appear that the insurer had any knowledge that it had such a meaning, and it was accordingly held that when one was insured as a conductor on a freight train, it was to be inferred that his duties were those of a conductor.

In Stanford v. Imperial Guarantee & Acci. Ins. Co. 18 Ont. L. Rep. 562, where a policy provided that if the insured should be injured while temporarily or permanently engaged in any occupation or exposure to danger classed as more hazardous than that in which he was insured, the sums payable should only be those provided for in case of the more dangerous occupation, it was held that recovery could be had only for the amount provided for those engaged as brakemen, upon its appearing that one insured as a traveler was killed while making a trial trip as brakeman, for which position he had applied.

Provisions regulating recovery in case of injuries while doing or performing any act or thing pertaining to an occupation classed as more hazardous.

To avoid the construction of the provisions considered in the preceding subdivisions, which the courts refused to hold applicable in cases of occasional acts pertaining to more hazardous occupations, further changes appear to have been made by the insertion of clauses providing for a forfeiture or reduction of the benefit in case of injuries received while doing or performing any act or thing pertaining to any occupation classed as more hazardous than that under which the insured was classed.

In several cases these provisions have been construed to prevent a recovery of the full amount of the indemnity where the insured was injured in doing an occasional act which pertained to a more hazardous occupation.

Thus, in Montgomery v. Continental Casualty Co. 131 La. 475, 59 So. 907, where one was insured as "a draftsman with office and traveling duties only" by an accident policy providing that if he was injured after having changed his occupation to one classed as more hazardous than that given, or should be injured while doing any act or thing pertaining to any occupation so classified, the insurer should only be liable for such proportion of the principal sum as the premium paid would purchase at the rate fixed for the more hazardous occupation, it was held, upon its appearing that the insured was injured while operating a drill for recreation in the establishment by which he was employed, that in operating the drill he was performing an "act or thing pertaining to" the occupation of machinist, which was classed as more hazardous, and that he could recover only the reduced indemnity. The court said: "Notwithstanding the clear and unequivocal meaning of the clause quoted, plaintiff insists that the phrase 'while doing any act or thing pertaining' to an occupation 'classified by the company as more hazardous' should be interpreted as reading, necessities which exact of men whose occupations are not regarded as comprising manual labor, the doing of an act which, in a literal sense, may be called manual labor. It is hardly conceivable that the policy would ever have been written and received upon any other understanding.

These views are re-enforced and made plain when the assured's method of conducting and supervising his business is considered. His secretary and treasurer testified without contradiction: "He (Reading) usually went around the city and looked after teams to be loaded at different business houses, hurry them out, getting them unloaded, and looking after the shipping clerks, getting them to get a hustle and get the teams under way. Then he would be called upon to go to the various railroads to look after the general superintendency of getting the business moving."

And in going from place to place to do these things "He drove around with a horse and buggy." Had he precluded himself from driving the horse attached to his buggy? In the event of a driver of one of his trucks having become suddenly ill, would the policy have forbidden the assured to drive the truck to his place of business? What he did here was, in the absence of the conductor, temporarily to drive the elevator at his place of business.

The position of defendant's counsel comes at last to the claim that, in order to have rendered the act in question permissible, the words describing the occupation of the "while engaged in an occupation classified by the company as more hazardous;" and that consequently, as the doing of an isolated act, such as the operation of the drill for recreation on a single occasion, was not an engaging in a more hazardous occupation within the meaning of the clause as thus interpreted, plaintiff should recover the full amount of insurance. To adopt such an interpretation would be to confer upon the clause a meaning wholly opposed to that which is clearly and unequivocally conveyed by the language employed. It would be tantamount to making a new and different contract between the parties, and this the court cannot do under the guise of interpretation or otherwise. It is true that the Iowa court has in one case [Holiday v. American Mut. Acci. Asso. 103 Iowa, 178, 84 Am. St. Rep. 170, 72 N. W. 448] given a similar clause the interpretation for which plaintiff contends, but we are unable to approve or appreciate the reasons or principles upon which this result was based."

And in Lane v. General Acci. Ins. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 113 S. W. 324, where a policy provided for a reduction in the benefit if the insured should be injured while doing any act or thing pertaining to any occupation classed as more hazardous, and one insured as a sheep farmer was injured while hunting for recreation, it was held that only a recovery of the benefit provided for hunters, hunting being an occupation classed as more hazardous, could be had, since he was engaged in doing an act or thing pertaining to the occupation of a hunter when injured.

And in Thomas v. Masons' Fraternal Acci. Asso. 64 App. Div. 22, 71 N. Y. Supp. 692, where a policy provided that for any injury received while performing "temporarily or otherwise, an act or thing pertaining to any occupation or exposure classified . . . as more hazardous than those accepted in the application . . . or if injured in a more hazardous occupation or exposure . . . [he] shall be entitled to recover only such amount for that particular accident as could be received by L.R.A.1915D.

a member insured under such occupation or exposure in accordance with the classification as laid down in the occupation manual," and the manual classed hunting for pleasure or profit as more hazardous than the profession of a lawyer, it was held that the beneficiary of one insured as a lawyer could recover only the indemnity fixed for hunters, where insured was killed while hunting for pleasure.

In Holiday v. American Mut. Acci. Asso. supra, the case referred to adversely by the court in Montgomery v. Continental Casualty Co. supra, where a policy provided that if injury occurred while performing an act pertaining to an occupation classed as more hazardous than the one under which the certificate was issued the benefit should be for a less amount, it was held that one insured as a bookkeeper, an occupation classed as less hazardous than that of a hunter, was entitled to recover the indemnity fixed for the first occupation although he was shot while hunting for pleasure, it being held that the classification of the insurer was based on occupations, and not upon acts, and that the classification by which the hazard of hunting was fixed was that of hunting as an occupation.

And in Eaton v. Atlas Acci. Ins. Co. 89 Me. 570, 36 Atl. 1048, where an accident policy provided "that for any injury received while doing any act or thing pertaining to any occupation or exposure claimed by the company as more hazardous" the insured should be entitled only to a reduced benefit, the court disposed of the condition by remarking that it related to an occupation, employment, or business,—a vocation,—and not to an avocation occasional, exceptional, and outside the insured's usual and regular vocation. It does not appear in the case what the insured's business was, but he was injured while riding a bicycle for pleasure.

In Thorne v. Casualty Co. 106 Me. 274, 76 Atl. 1106, where a policy described the insured as a member of a firm, or employed as manager by a wholesale beef company, and his duties as office and traveling only, assured, instead of being "proprietor, no manual labor," should have been "proprietor, occasional manual labor;" and, in support of this, resort is had to the 15th clause of the policy, which provides: "If the assured is injured after having changed his occupation to one classified by the company as more hazardous than that herein stated, or is injured while doing any act or thing pertaining to any more hazardous occupation, the liability for any loss specified shall be such an amount as the premium paid by him will purchase at the rate fixed by this company for such more hazardous occupation."

If we are at all right in what we have already said in respect of the words "proprietor, no manual labor," it is clear that counsel's suggested change of one of the words would have wrought no material change in the true meaning of the phrase; and the effect sought to be ascribed to the 15th clause would have failed for the same reason. However, independently of this, it must be observed that the 15th clause in terms applies to injuries received "while and the policy provided that if he was injured while at work pertaining to any occupation classed by the insurer as more hazardous than that stated, the company's liability should be only for the amount of indemnity the premium paid would purchase at the rate fixed for the more hazardous risk, it was held that the insured had a right to direct the performance of any part of the business, and that the insurer was liable for the full amount of the policy where the insured was injured while illustrating to the workmen in the refrigerator how to do certain work, since the provision did not contemplate the inhibition of acts the performance of which was necessarily implied from the vocation named in the policy. And see in connection with this case, GOTTFREDSON V. GERMAN COMMERCIAL ACCL. CO.

In Eggenberger v. Guarantee Mut. Acci. Asso. 41 Fed. 172, where a policy provided that if the insured should be injured while doing or performing any act or thing pertaining to an occupation classed as more hazardous than the occupation under which the certificate was issued there should be a reduction in the benefit, and one insured as a stationary engineer, an occupation classed as less hazardous than that of a wood chopper, was injured while chopping wood for his own use, it was held that it should have been submitted to the jury to determine whether the act or thing which the insured was doing at the time of his injury more properly pertained to the business of a wood chopper than to his own occupation.

In Roseberry v. American Benev. Asso. 142 Mo. App. 552, 121 S. W. 785, where one classed as a railroad pumpman was injured while carrying gasoline, it was held that the question whether he was injured while engaged in the performance of any act pertaining to an occupation or hazard classed in the manual of the association as more hazardous than that of a railroad pumpman should not have been submitted to the jury where there was nothing in the manual relating to the classification of the hazard incident to the occupation or act of handling gasoline, although the manual classed the occupation of laborers about oilcloth and linoleum factories and laborers about oil wells as more hazardous than that of a railroad pumpman.

Provisions as to injuries while engaged in any act, occupation, or exposure more hazardous.

Thus, in Union Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Frohard, 134 Ill. 228, 10 L.R.A. 383, 23 Am. St. Rep. 664, 25 N. E. 642, where one insured as a hardware merchant by an accident policy was accidentally killed while hunting for recreation, it was held that the beneficiary was not prevented from recovering the full amount of the insurance by reason of a by-law and clause in the policy to the effect that when any member was fatally injured while engaged temporarily in any act or occupation more hazardous than the one in which he was accepted there should be a reduction in the benefit, although by the policy the occupation of hunter was classed as more hazardous than that of a hardware merchant, the court holding that the word "occupation" had reference to the vocation, profession, or trade in which the insured was engaged for hire or profit, and that it did not preclude him from engaging in mere acts of exercise, diversion, or recreation, and that the meaning of the provision was the same as if the word "act" had been omitted.

In Metropolitan Acci. Asso. v. Hilton, 61 Ill. App. 100, where a policy provided that in case of injury sustained while engaged in any act, occupation, or exposure more hazardous than that given in the policy, the insured should receive the amount the premiums paid would purchase under the more hazardous class, it was held that one insured as "proprietor of livery, office duties," who was injured while driving one of his own cabs, could recover only the indemnity fixed for those classed as cabmen,—such occupation being more hazardous. The court said: "It is quite clear that the act of the plaintiff in driving the cab was not merely incidental to his general occupation, but was in fact a part of it. Apparently he was doing so for hire and profit, and that in the line of his business as a livery proprietor. It was not, however, such an act as would be included within the range of office duties specified in class A, and no doubt was more hazardous." J. T. W.

doing any act or thing pertaining to any more hazardous occupation." The 15th clause must in each instance be interpreted with reference to the particular occupation of an assured. We have seen that the occupation in question was that of proprietor of a large commercial trucking business, and that it necessarily embraced occasional physical activities. Admittedly the business comprised departments, and consequently occupations subordinate to the occupation of the proprietor. The company had classified occupations and assigned this assured to one of its classes; and now to construe the 15th clause so as to preclude the insured from doing an isolated act, such as the one here involved, would in effect be to prevent an assured from incurring such dangers as are essentially incident to the whole business comprised in his occupation. It might well be conceded that in such circumstances an employee in a particular department, say an insured bookkeeper, could not rightfully have operated the elevator even in an emergency; but it would by no means follow that the managing proprietor could not have done so. Counsel concedes, and rightly, that this clause is not applicable to an act done outside of the business, as, for example, on a hunting excursion resulting in an accident (Union Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Frohard, supra; Stone v. United States Casualty Co. 34 N. J. L. 371, 373; North American Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43, 53, 8 Am. Rep. 212; National Acci. Soc. v. Taylor, 42 Ill. App. 97, 100, 102; Taylor v. Illinois Commercial Men's Asso. 84 Neb. 799, 802, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1174, 122 N. W. 41; Johnson v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 115 Mich. 86, 90, 40 L.R.A. 440, 69 Am. St. Rep. 549, 72 N. W. 1115; Hess v. Preferred Masonic Mut. Acci. Asso. 112 Mich. 196, 199, 40 L.R.A. 444, 70 N. W. 460; but the contention is that where the act done pertains to the business of the assured and to a more hazardous occupation therein, the indemnity must be reduced accordingly. We are not impressed with this difference. It does not amount to a valid distinction (see Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Fraser, 22 C. C. A. 499, 44 U. S. App. 694, 76 Fed. 705, 708, 709, [C. C. A. 9th C.], where the occupation described in the application was: "Proprietor of a bar and billiard room, not tending bar;" Neafie v. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. 55 Hun, 111, 113, 8 N. Y. Supp. 202; Fox v. Masons' Fraternal Acci. Asso. 96 Wis. 390, 397, 71 N. W. 363; Hall v. American Masonic Acci. Asso. 86 Wis. 518, 524, 57 N. W. 366).

It results that unless the policy is open to the interpretation we have indicated, it is contradictory in itself; at least its language, when taken as a whole, is ambiguous in the sense that it is susceptible of two or more constructions; and it is settled that the rule of interpretation in respect of policies of this character is to "construe all language used to limit the liability of the company strongly against the company." Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 58 Fed. 945, 956, 22 L.R.A. 620, 7 C. C. A. 581, 16 U. S. App. 290, (C. C. A. 6th C.); Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Randolph, 24 C. C. A. 305, 78 Fed. 754, 761, 762 47 U. S. App. 260 (C. C. A. 6th C.); Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527, 533, 30 L. ed. 740, 743, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 685; Travellers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 666, 32 L. ed. 308, 310, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1360; Burkheiser v. Mutual Acci. Asso. 26 L.R.A. 112, 10 C. C. A. 94, 18 U. S. App. 704, 61 Fed. 816, 818 (C. C. A. 7th C.) and citations.

However, we think the evidence gives rise to questions of fact, which should have been submitted under appropriate instructions to the jury. There was error in assuming, as matter of law, that the mere performance of the act of temporarily running the elevator justified the practical assignment of the assured to a more hazardous occupation and the reduction of his indemnity accordingly. The facts and circumstances under which the act was brought about would naturally characterize it, and so open the case to legitimate inference as to the existence or not, for example, of an unforeseen necessity or emergency under which the elevator was operated. Indeed, the ultimate issue of fact might fairly be resolved under an inquiry whether the operation of the elevator by the assured was casual or habitual. If the former, the indemnity should be allowed as it was written; if the latter, the indemnity should be limited to that of a conductor of an elevator. The usual course is to submit such questions to the jury. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Fraser, supra, Eggenberger v. Guarantee Mut. Acc. Asso. (C. C.) 41 Fed. 172, 173; *Fox v. IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

RE HARRY S. KESSLER.

Tax — use of highway — valuation.

1. That a tax upon the right to use the highways with motor vehicles is in excess of the cost of policing the highways, and is not graduated according to the value of the cars, does not bring it into conflict with a constitutional provision that the legislature shall provide revenue by levying a tax by valuation.

Same — inherent power of legislature — effect of constitutional grant.

2. A constitutional grant of power to the legislature to raise revenue by certain specified methods does not interfere with its inherent power to employ other methods for that purpose.

Same — uniformity — license fees.

3. A license tax on motor vehicles for revenue purposes, graduated according to the power of the machines, does not violate a constitutional provision that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, since that provision does not apply to license fees.

uniform, fair, and practical standard, they constitute no burden on interstate commerce."

And a provision of a motor-vehicle law, that all motor vehicles, before being operated on the highways of the state, must be registered at a cost varying from $6 to $18, according to horse power, is not so arbitrary or unreasonable as to constitute, when applied to vehicles moving in interstate commerce, a direct and material burden upon such commerce. Ibid.

county, Idaho, in violation of the provisions of chapter 179 of the Session Laws of 1913, in that he had not caused the said motor cycle to be registered nor paid the fee incident thereto.

Said chapter creates a state highway commission and provides, among other things, a comprehensive plan of state highway construction and improvement and of policing motor traffic upon the public highways. Section 12 thereof is as follows:

"Except as hereinafter provided, no motor vehicle shall be operated or driven upon any state or other public highway or upon the public streets of any city or incorporated village in this state until the said motor vehicle shall have been registered with the secretary of the State Highway Commission."

Said chapter provides the manner in which registration shall be applied for and the manner in which a record thereof shall be kept; that the application for registration of a motor vehicle of 30-horse power or less shall be accompanied by a fee of $15, and of a motor vehicle of over 30-horse power and up to and including 40-horse power by a fee of $20, and of a motor vehicle of over 40-horse power and up to and including 50-horse power by a fee of $25, and a motor vehicle of over 50-horse power by a fee of $40, and in case of a motor cycle by a fee of $5. Said chapter also provides for the issuance to the applicant a certificate of registration and a number.

The fees above mentioned are to be paid annually, and shall be in lieu of all taxes, general or local, and the chapter expressly provides that all motor vehicles for which this annual fee is to be paid and which have been so registered shall be exempt from taxation. It is also provided that the violation of any of the provisions of this chapter in question shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding $300, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Under the terms of the chapter all such fines are to be turned over to the secretary of the State Highway Commission, who shall pay them over to the state treasurer, together with all fees collected under the provisions of said chapter, and said moneys shall go into the state highway fund.

This chapter was before the court for consideration in the case of Achenbach v. Kincaid, 25 Idaho, 768, 140 Pac. 529, wherein the constitutionality of the law was questioned, and it was held to not violate the Constitution in the particulars therein considered, but the court held the questions here presented were not properly before it in that case.

In this case the respondent contends that the registration fee on motor vehicles provided for in § 16 of said chapter 179, is an attempted taxation other than by valuation, and violates § 2, art. 7, of the Constitution of Idaho, which is as follows:

"The legislature shall provide such revenue as may be needful, by levying a tax by valuation, so that every person or corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property, except as in this article hereinafter otherwise provided. The legislature may also impose a license tax (both upon natural persons and upon corporations, other than municipal, doing business in this state); also a per capita tax. Provided, the legislature may exempt a limited amount of improvements upon land, from taxation."

It is contended that the said chapter, in so far as it provides for the payment of fees for registration, in an amount in excess of that necessary to properly police the use of motor vehicles upon the public highways, is a revenue measure. That it does raise considerable revenue in excess of an amount necessary for police purposes, and that it appropriates the money so raised to a fund for the construction and maintenance of public highways, is quite true. In this connection, however, it may be observed that the license or fee is exacted, not upon the ownership of the motor vehicle, but upon the right to use it upon the public highways.

Respondent also contends that said § 16 is an attempted taxation in violation of the rule of uniformity required by § 5, art. 7, of the Constitution, which is as follows:

"All taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits, of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws, which shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, real and personal, provided, that the legislature may allow such exemptions from taxation from time to time as shall seem necessary and just, and all existing exemptions provided by the laws of the territory, shall continue until changed by the legislature of the state, provided, further, that duplicate taxation of property for the same purpose during the same year, is hereby prohibited."

The respondent, in presenting his petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and the district court, in granting it and in ordering him discharged from custody, seem to have proceeded upon one of two erroneous theories: Either that the legislature of the state of Idaho possesses no inherent power in matters of taxation, but may raise revenue only in conformity to a grant of authority so to do, expressed in the Constitution; or that a prohibition against raising revenue in the manner attempted by said chapter 179 is expressed in, or is to be implied from, the language of the Constitution.

In the case of Achenbach v. Kincaid, supra, this court said: "As to the question of taxation: The legislature possesses plenary power, except as such power may be limited or restricted by the Constitution. It is not necessary that the Constitution shall contain a grant of power to the legislature to deal with the question of taxation. It is sufficient proof of its power if there be found in the Constitution no prohibition against what the legislature has attempted to do as stated by the supreme court of Oregon in the case of State v. Cochran, 55 Or. 157, 104 Pac. 419, 105 Pac. 884: 'A state Constitution, unlike a Federal Constitution, is one of limitation, and not a grant of powers, and any act adopted by the legislature not prohibited by the state Constitution is valid, and such inhibition must expressly or impliedly be made to appear beyond a reasonable doubt.' See St. Joe Improv. Co. v. Laumierster, 19 Idaho, 66, 112 Pac. 683; Walker v. Spokane, 62 Wash. 312, 113 Pac. 775, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 994; People ex rel. Simon v. Bradley, 207 N. Y. 592, 101 N. E. 766.

Rose*, 203 Ill. 46, 87 N. E. 746; House of Reform v. Lexington, 112 Ky. 171, 65 S. W. 350; Com. v. Barney, 115 Ky. 475, 74 S. W. 181; State v. Thompson, 144 Mo. 314, 46 S. W. 191; Ex parte Loving, 178 Mo. 194, 77 S. W. 508.

"An act of the legislature will not be declared unconstitutional unless in plain violation of some provision of the Constitution. Brady v. Mattern, 125 Iowa, 158, 106 Am. St. Rep. 291, 100 N. W. 358.

"The court, in construing a statute, must adopt such construction as will sustain the constitutionality of the statute, where that can be done without doing violence to the language thereof. State v. Barrett, 172 Ind. 169, 87 N. E. 7. The courts must, as far as possible, uphold and give effect to all statutes enacted by the legislature. Com. v. International Harvester Co. 131 Ky. 768, 115 S. W. 755."

Judge Cooley, in vol. 1 of his work on Taxation, 3d ed. p. 9, says: "Everything to which the legislative power extends may be the subject of taxation, whether it be person or property, or possession, franchise, or privilege, or occupation or right. Nothing but express constitutional limitation upon legislative authority can exclude anything to which the authority extends from the grasp of the taxing power, if the legislature, in its discretion, shall at any time select it for revenue purposes; and not only is the power unlimited in its reach as to subjects, but in its very nature it acknowledges no limits, and may be carried even to the extent of exhaustion and destruction, thus becoming in its exercise a power to destroy. If the power be threatened with abuse, security must be found in the responsibility of the legislature that imposes the tax to the constituency which must pay it. The judiciary can afford no redress against oppressive taxation, so long as the legislature, in imposing it, shall keep within the limits of legislative authority, and violate no express provision of the Constitution. The necessity for imposing it addresses itself to the legislative discretion, and it is or may be an urgent necessity which will admit of no property or other conflicting right in the citizen while it remains unsatisfied."

See also Lowe v. White County, 156 Ind. 163, 59 N. E. 466.

Certainly our Constitution does not expressly prohibit the people of Idaho from raising revenue in the manner provided in chapter 179 of the Session Laws of 1913; and, while it is true there are three methods of raising revenue expressed in § 2 of article 7 of the Constitution, we cannot infer from this that an implication arises prohibiting the state from also raising revenue pursuant to its inherent power to do so in any other manner its legislature may see fit to adopt.

It is earnestly urged that this is not a property tax; that it is a license, and raises more revenue than sufficient to police motor vehicles upon the public highway. We are fully convinced that in this contention respondent is correct, but it does not follow that the law is in contravention of the Constitution.

By way of sustaining his contention that this law is intended to raise revenue, respondent quotes from Rosebloom v. State, 64 Neb. 343, 57 L.R.A. 922, 89 N. W. 1055, as follows:

"We agree with counsel in the view that the primary and paramount, if not the only, object of the law, is to obtain revenue by imposing a tax upon the business of peddling. The only thing the peddler is required to do is to pay his tax and exhibit the appropriate evidence of payment to any person who may wish to see it. The only thing he is forbidden to do is to pursue his calling without having first paid the tax. No police inspection or supervision is provided for. If the things commanded and forbidden are to be regarded as features of regulation or repression, they are not, to say the least, so pronounced or conspicuous as to suggest the idea that the law is referable to the police power, rather than to the power of taxation."

By beginning to quote from the point in that decision where respondent leaves off, the attitude of the supreme court of Nebraska and of this court upon this question is very clearly stated as follows: "But, granting the contention of counsel for defendant that the statute is a revenue measure, pure and simple, we are not able to discover any valid objection to the enforcement of it in the manner provided by the legislature. It is settled doctrine in this and in every other jurisdiction that courts will not adjudge statutes unconstitutional unless they are plainly so. Now, with what express provision of the higher law does the statute in question clash? We know of none."

Respondent seeks to distinguish from this case that of Salt Lake City v. Christensen Co. 34 Utah, 38, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 898, 95 Pac. 523, where a revenue raising license fee was sustained, and with that end in view quotes from the Utah Constitution as follows: "Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prevent the legislature from providing a stamp tax, or a tax on income, occupation, license, franchise, or mortgages."

This paragraph of the Utah Constitution merely points out the proper construction of that document, which would prevail even in the absence of the paragraph.

In like manner respondent seeks to distinguish from this case that of Re Schuler, 167 Cal. 282, 139 Pac. 685, decided by the supreme court of California, which upholds the right of the legislature of California to enact a law exacting from the owners of motor vehicles a revenue for their use upon the public highways, which revenue was to be used for the upkeep of said highways, by reason of this paragraph in the California Constitution: "The legislature shall have power to establish a system of state highways or to declare any road a state highway, and to pass all laws necessary or proper to construct and maintain the same, and to extend aid for the construction and maintenance, in whole or in part, of any county highway."

It is perfectly clear that the foregoing provision of the California Constitution neither grants to, nor takes from, the legislature of that state the power to raise revenue. Said paragraph only points out one of the ways in which the moneys of the state may be expended.

able length from the case of Vernor v. Secretary of State, a Michigan case, reported in 179 Mich. 167, 146 N. W. 338. This case is not in point, except to show that the principal purpose of the law was to raise revenue, rather than a police regulation. The act was held to be unconstitutional, upon the ground that the title was insufficient, not upon the ground that revenue cannot be raised by requiring those who operate motor vehicles upon the public highway to procure and pay for a license so to do.

The respondent maintains that the law under consideration violates § 5, art. 7, of the Constitution, in that the registration fees therein provided for are not uniform upon the same class of subjects, and that it does not secure a just valuation of the property thus taxed. The provision of that section of our Constitution, requiring all taxes to be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and to be levied and collected under general laws which shall prescribe such regulations as shall insure a just valuation for taxation of all property, real or personal, refers solely to taxation according to the commonly accepted meaning of that term, by assessment, levy, and collection, and does not apply to license or registration fees. It is to be borne in mind that the law under consideration does not impose a tax upon property, but imposes a registration fee, or license, upon the privilege of operating motor vehicles upon the public highways.

It has been frequently held by this court that liquor licenses, pool and billiard table licenses, taxes by way of licenses imposed upon persons and corporations engaged in loaning money within the state, and upon railway and express companies doing business within the state, are not taxes contemplated by §§ 2 and 5 of article 7 of the Constitution, but constitute a separate and distinct way of raising revenue, independent of taxation in the commonly accepted meaning of that term. State v. Doherty, 3 Idaho, 384, 29 Pac. 855; State v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 8 Idaho, 240, 67 Pac. 647; State v. Jones, 9 Idaho, 693, 75 Pac. 819; Re Gale, 14 Idaho, 761, 95 Pac. 679; Northern P. R. Co. v. Gifford, 25 Idaho, 196, 136 Pac. 1131. See, also, Salt Lake City v. Christensen Co. and Re Schuler, supra.

The respondent complains that, as between the owners of motor vehicles, the law is unfair and unjust; that the owner of such a vehicle worth but a couple of hundred dollars is required to pay the same tax as the owner of one worth $2,000 or $3,000, or more, provided, of course, the machines happen to be of the same horse power. We fail to see wherein the value of the machine affects the value of the right to use it upon the public highway. Even though this act does not fairly distribute the burden of building and maintaining roads among the owners of motor vehicles used upon them, or between that class of persons and other citizens of the state, it may be said with equal force that ever since the dawn of civilization the problem of raising revenue has been with governments, as with individuals, one of the chief causes of concern, and that a scientific and satisfactory solution of it has never been reached. If chapter 179 of the Session Laws of 1913 is unskillfully drawn, or the plan to raise revenue therein provided is unscientific, or for any other reason unsatisfactory, recourse for its correction must be had to the legislature, and not to the courts, for this branch of the government cannot declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional, unless it violates some provision of the Constitution.

The supreme court of New Jersey, in the case of Kane v. State, 81 N. J. L. 594, L.R.A. —, 80 Atl. 453, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 237, in upholding a statute much like the one under consideration, said: "The imposition is a license or privilege tax charged in the nature of compensation for the damage done to the roads of the state by the driving of these machines over them, and is properly based, not upon the value of the machine, but upon the amount of destruction caused by it."

In the recent decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hendrick v. Maryland, 235 U. S. 610, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140, a case closely resembling this in many important particulars, the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice McReynolds is, in part, as follows: "The movement of motor vehicles over the highways is attended by constant and serious dangers to the public, and is also abnormally destructive to the ways themselves. Their success depends on good roads, the construction and maintenance of which are exceedingly expensive; and in recent years insistent demands have been made upon the states for better facilities, especially by the ever-increasing number of those who own such vehicles. As is well known, in order to meet this demand and accommodate the growing traffic, the state of Maryland has built, and is maintaining, a system of improved roadways. Primarily for the enforcement of good order and the protection of those within its own jurisdiction, the state put into effect the above-described general regulations, including requirements for registration and licenses. A further evident purpose was to secure some compensation for the use of facilities provided at L.R.A.1915D.

great cost from the class for whose needs they are essential, and whose operations over them are peculiarly injurious."

Idaho is a mountainous state, wherein vast sums of money have been, and still greater sums must in the future be, expended in the construction and maintenance of public highways. The motor vehicle is a conveyance requiring a different and better class of roads than ordinary traffic has heretofore demanded. These motor vehicles have been found to be exceedingly destructive of the highways, and particularly is this true of those propelled by engines of great power, especially when driven at a high rate of speed. It seems probable that by reason of these conditions the legislature enacted said chapter 179, but, whatever the reason for its enactment may have been, said chapter is not repugnant to the provisions of the Constitution.

The order of the District Court granting the writ of habeas corpus and discharging the defendant from custody is reversed, with instruction to said court to quash the writ and to remand the respondent to custody.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

OSCAR W. BROWN, Appt.,

v.

WALTER NICHOLS et al.

(93 Kan. 737, 145 Pac. 561.)

Highway — forbidding use — validity.

1. A city ordinance which, in effect, prohibits one who owns and operates a machine shop from using the streets in bringing and taking traction engines and heavy vehicles to and from his shop, and thereby arbitrarily deprives him of an opportunity to carry on his business, is unreasonable and void.

Injunction — against prosecution.

2. Ordinarily a court will not enjoin the prosecution of a criminal proceeding, but the remedy of injunction may be employed to protect personal and property rights, although it may operate incidentally to restrain a prosecution under an invalid ordinance.

Johnston, Ch. J. delivered the opinion of the court:

In an injunction proceeding, Oscar W. Brown attacked the validity of an ordinance of the city of Abilene which purports to prohibit the driving of "any engine or heavy machinery upon the paved streets of the city of Abilene," and prescribes a fine not exceeding $50 for its violation. He also asked a recovery of damages for the loss sustained by reason of being deprived of the use of the streets. In his petition he alleged that he was conducting a machine shop in the city, which was so situated that he is unable to reach the railway stations with engines or heavy machinery, except by passing over paved streets, and that, unless patrons are permitted to use these streets in order to bring in and take from the shop traction engines and other heavy machinery, he will be unable to carry on his business; that his machine shop will be a total loss for the purposes for which it was acquired; and that it has already resulted in damage to him to the extent of $1,000. There was an allegation that since the passage of the ordinance in June, 1913, the officers of the city had forcibly prevented him from taking machinery from the shop across Third street, and that it is impossible for him to reach the depots of the railways in carrying on his business without crossing that street. A demurrer to his petition was sustained by the trial court, and the main question presented on his appeal is whether the ordinance is so unreasonable as to be invalid.

Power is not expressly conferred on cities of the second class to prohibit the use of the streets for any particular kinds of travel and transportation, but under the general welfare clause it is doubtless within the power of the city to make reasonable regulations as to the use of streets, and thus provide for the safety and convenience of travel and against unnecessary injury to the streets used. It is competent for the city to regulate the weight of loads that shall pass over the paved streets, and to prescribe the width of tires of vehicles carrying heavy loads. It has been determined that municipalities may confine the passage of heavily loaded traffic to certain streets and exclude it from others, but the regulation must not be such as will deprive a citizen of access to his home or business house, nor from all use of the streets for any of the recognized means of travel. Notes in 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 682, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1152, and 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1203. In Bogue v. Bennett, 156 Ind. 478, 83 Am. St. Rep. 212, 60 N. E. 143, it was held that a city ordinance prohibiting the running of traction engines or other vehicles not propelled by animal power over the streets and alleys of a city was unreasonable, and therefore void. In State v. Boardman, 93 Me. 73, 46 L.R.A. 750, 44 Atl. 118, the validity of an ordinance which provided that teams with loaded wagons should be confined to a certain part of a street was challenged. The court held that a traveler is not entitled to the whole width of a street for his accommodation, but "is entitled to a reasonably safe, convenient, and practicable opportunity for travel and passage." p. 78. It was there decided that a regulation restricting the travel of heavily loaded vehicles to a part of the street would, in many cases, be both reasonable and salutary, but that, if the part of the street open to travel for such vehicles was out of repair or in such a condition as to be impassable for loaded vehicles, it would operate to deprive those who had occasion to use the street of their right to use it for the purpose of travel. It was said that "for such a by-law, then, to be reasonable and valid, with reference to such a way and in such a locality as in this case, that portion of the street which may be used by heavily loaded vehicles must be reasonably suitable for the purpose; and the by-law will be valid or invalid, depending upon whether that portion of the way, to which such vehicles are restricted, is or is not reasonably suitable for the purpose." p. 79.

The streets are provided for the public in general for purposes of travel and transportation, and the appellant, who is engaged in a legitimate business, is entitled to a reasonable use of the streets in taking traction engines and heavy machinery to and from his shop. Traction and other motor wagons are not illegal vehicles, and an ordinance which deprives him of the use of the streets for such vehicles, in order that he and his patrons may reach his shop, is not reasonable. Undoubtedly a regulating ordinance may be framed under which appellant may use some of the streets or parts of them for the necessary traffic to and from his shop, and under such restrictions as will protect the streets and prevent interference with the rights of others traveling over them. Under the allegations of the petition the ordinance operates, not as a regulation, but as an absolute prohibition, of a recognized use of the public streets. A class of traffic which is legal, and which ordinarily passes over highways, is prohibited, so far as appellant's business is concerned, and he is not only deprived of the use of the streets of the city in conducting a legitimate business, but the result is the destruction of the value of his property for the purposes for which it was acquired. The L.R.A.1915D.

ordinance is therefore unreasonable, and must be held to be void.

It is next contended that the equitable remedy sought by appellant is not available to him, as the invalidity of the ordinance in question could be presented as a defense in a criminal prosecution for the violation of the ordinance. Ordinarily injunction will not lie to prevent the prosecution of criminal actions, but this proceeding is not brought for that purpose, and in his prayer the appellant does not ask for such relief. He asks for damages resulting to him and his business from the deprivation of the use of the streets, and also asks that the city and its officers be enjoined from interfering with the traffic to and from his business. The proceeding does challenge the validity of the ordinance because the officers, who are preventing him from using the streets leading to his machine shop, justify their action under the ordinance, but it does not appear that any prosecutions have been begun, and the appellant does not ask that prosecutions be enjoined. An exception is made to the rule invoked by appellee, where the restraint of the criminal prosecution is only incidental to the protection of personal and property rights. Davis & F. Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 189 U. S. 207, 47 L. ed. 778, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 498; Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 49 L. ed. 169, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18; Coal & Coke R. Co. v. Conley, 67 W. Va. 129, 67 S. E. 613; Bluefield Water Works & Improv. Co. v. Bluefield, 69 W. Va. 1, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 759, 70 S. E. 772; Atlanta v. Gate City Gaslight Co. 71 Ga. 106; Cuba v. Mississippi Cotton Oil Co. 150 Ala. 259, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 310, 43 So. 706; Austin v. Austin City Cemetery Asso. 87 Tex. 330, 47 Am. St. Rep. 114, 28 S. W. 528; note in 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 193.

In this action the appellant is seeking to protect his personal property rights and to prevent the destruction of his business. The deprivation of which he complains shuts him out from carrying on his business, and he is not required to wait for a prosecution to be commenced nor to provoke an arrest in order to obtain relief from the interference with and destruction of his business. Indeed, the defenses that he might make in possible prosecutions following unsuccessful attempts to conduct his business would not have been an adequate remedy. However, as we have seen, the principal purpose of the action is not the injunction of criminal proceedings.

The decision of the District Court sustaining the demurrer to appellant's petition will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

J. C. FROGG, Appt.,

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

Appeal — search warrant — absence of affidavit.

1. The objection that a warrant for search of premises for intoxicating liquors was not supported by affidavit as required by statute cannot be raised for the first time on appeal from a conviction for wrongful possession of the liquors found.

Intoxicating liquor — possession for shipment to other state — punishment.

2. One having possession of intoxicating liquor to be delivered to carriers for shipment to other states upon receipt of the price is within the operation of a statute providing for punishment of one who has such liquors in possession for purpose of sale.

(February 25, 1915.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for McCreary County convicting him of having in his possession intoxicating liquors for sale in violation of law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Rawlings, Robert Harding, and L. G. Campbell, for appellant:

It was no violation of the local option law of McCreary county for defendant to have the liquor in his possession in the manner and way he obtained possession, because he made it, and his possession of it was acquired in a perfectly legitimate way; and the statute under which the warrant was drawn does not apply to distillers, whose possession of liquor is obtained by making it in a legal way.

Mr. W. W. Watts, amicus curiae:

Kentucky distillers, wholesale dealers and brewers, including those in dry territory, may now ship intoxicating liquors into dry territory in Kentucky, if properly marked as required by the act commonly called the shipping bill.

Note. — The question as to the place where a sale of intoxicating liquor is deemed to be made is discussed at length in the note to Fisher v. Com. 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 435; and see especially cases cited at pages 466 and 467 of that note, as to when the sale is deemed to take place on the premises of the seller.

Adams Exp. Co. v. Crigler & C. Co. 161 Ky. 89, 170 S. W. 542.

The right to possess the United States tax stamp, and to possess and receive the liquors, notwithstanding the dry territory, made the sale of the liquors a necessary incident thereto.

Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; 26 Cyc. 532.

The liquors were being prepared for shipment to purchasers in Tennessee and marked for personal use. Such shipment was permitted in Kentucky under the shipping bill, and the transaction was lawful as a matter of interstate commerce.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The county judge issued a warrant for the arrest of the appellant, John Frogg, charging him with unlawfully having in his possession intoxicating liquors in McCreary county for sale in that county, contrary to law. The warrant also commanded the arresting officer to search the residence and other premises of the appellant and seize and take possession of any intoxicating liquors there found, "and if you find such liquors you are commanded to arrest the said Frogg, and bring him before me or some magistrate of McCreary county, to be dealt with according to law." Whisky was found, and Frogg was arrested, and, on a trial before the county judge, he was convicted and fined $50 and sentenced to confinement in the county jail for ten days. He appealed from this judgment to the circuit court, and there the case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, and the same judgment rendered as in the county court.

Before coming to the merits of the case, we will deal with an objection to the warrant. That part of the warrant directing a search of the premises is authorized by chapter 78 of the Acts of 1914, being an "Act Providing for the Search of Premises in Local Option Territory," and approved March 21, 1914. Any judge or justice of the peace, under that act, when affidavits of three or more reputable persons are filed with him, may, by his warrant, cause any house in local option territory to be searched for the detection of intoxicating liquors kept there for purposes of sale, and arrest the person in charge of the house.

The record does not show whether the warrant was supported by the affidavits, and appellant says that the warrant was issued without the affidavits, and was therefore an unlawful act upon the part of the county judge. For the purpose of this case, conceding that the judge acted unlawfully in issuing the warrant without the affidavits, yet if the party was in fact guilty of the offense charged, the absence of affidavits to support the warrant cannot serve as a defense in the prosecution. No demurrer or other step attacking the sufficiency of the warrant was interposed in either court below, and no reference is made to it in the motion for a new trial preparatory to an appeal to this court, so that, in any event, it is too late now to raise the question. Baldrige v. Com. 28 Ky. L. Rep. 33, 88 S. W. 1076; Cheek v. Com. 162 Ky. 56, 171 S. W. 998.

The real question presented is whether, under present state and Federal laws, the proprietor of a distillery situated in prohibition territory in Kentucky may have in his possession whisky for purpose of sale by retail (that is, in quantities less than 5 gallons) to mail order customers residing in another state, who forward the purchase price with their order to the distiller at his place of business. Stating the facts in an abbreviated way, it appears that Frogg owned and operated a registered distillery in McCreary county, which was local option territory, and had in his possession, and at his residence, United States government license authorizing him to retail liquors of his own manufacture, and that, at the time he was arrested, he had withdrawn from his distillery, and taken to his residence near by, 13 gallons of whisky, and was there putting it up in packages (that is, in bottles containing less than 5 gallons each), and preparing them for shipment in the packages to certain named parties living and residing in the state of Tennessee, and four of the packages were already marked by Frogg and ready for shipment to Tennessee. In addition to the four packages or bottles of whisky labeled and ready for shipment, the officers seized about 10 gallons of whisky yet in the original barrel. This residue was intended to be put in packages of less than 5 gallons and marked for "personal use" and shipped by way of the Southern Express Company to consignees in the state of Tennessee. Had it not been seized, the whisky would have been shipped to purchasers in the state of Tennessee, and they had already mailed to him, and Frogg had received, their orders containing the money in payment for it. Frogg had not sold or had in his possession for sale by retail (that is, in quantities less than 5 gallons) whiskies or other intoxicating liquors in McCreary county in any manner except as above stated.

As already indicated, the offense charged is that of having in possession liquors for sale in local option territory. The 1914 act of the legislature provides that one who has paid United States internal revenue tax, permitting the sale of any such liquors, shall be deemed to have paid the tax with the intent to violate the prohibition laws, but the act especially exempts distillers from that rule; that is, possession by a distiller of government license is not presumptive evidence against him that the liquors in his possession are for purposes of sale in violation of law. The law that appellant is charged with violating, and of which he is not presumptively guilty by having in his possession a government license, is subsection 2 of § 2557b of the Kentucky Statutes, which is as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person to sell, lend, give, procure for, or furnish to another, any spirituous, vinous or malt liquors, or to have in his possession spirituous, vinous or malt liquors, for the purpose of selling them in any territory where said act is in force, and any person so offending shall be fined not less than fifty nor more than one hundred dollars, and imprisoned not less than ten nor more than fifty days. The possession of a United States special tax stamp (commonly called United States license) for carrying on the business of a retail dealer in spirituous, vinous or malt liquors, or the having of such tax stamp or license stuck up at the place of business in such territory shall be prima facie evidence of guilt under this section."

In other words, the 1914 act, as to distillers, repeals the last paragraph of the section quoted, and which has reference to prima facie evidence of guilt. But the liquor in question was not at his distillery. He had withdrawn it from the bonded warehouse and taken it to his residence, where he admits he had it for purpose of sale in quantities less than 5 gallons.

Sections 2558 and 2558a exclude distillers from the provisions of the local option law as to sales of whisky of their own manufacture by wholesale to dealers (that is, in quantities of 5 gallons and over), which is delivered at one time, and not to be drunk on the premises. In other respects they, like other persons, are subject to the local option statutes. So that for two reasons Frogg does not show himself protected in sales of whisky by any of the exceptions to the local option law: (1) The sales or intended sales were in quantities of less than 5 gallons; and (2) the whisky was kept for sale and the sales made at his residence, and not at the distillery, the place of manufacture.

But appellant contends that he is not guilty of a violation of the law because he did not intend to sell it to anyone in Kentucky, nor did he intend for anyone to use or consume it in Kentucky. Furthermore, he insists that as the business was a part of interstate commerce, and the whisky was to be delivered to an interstate carrier for shipment to consignees in the state of Tennessee, an application of the prohibitory liquor laws of Kentucky to such business would be an interference with interstate commerce, and therefore contrary to Federal law. We have reached the conclusion that the facts do not show any interference with interstate commerce, nor do they constitute a defense to a prosecution for violating the state law. In our opinion, the admitted facts make appellant guilty of selling whisky in violation of the local option law; and, to have been guilty of that offense, he was necessarily guilty of the offense of having or possessing whisky for purposes of sale. He admits that he had 13 gallons at his residence for the purpose of drawing it off into bottles, each containing less than 5 gallons, and that he had received letters with cash or money order inclosures from parties in Tennessee for such packages, and in the case of four packages he had already separated them from his own whisky and marked and labeled them as the property of the purchaser (that is, in the name of the consignee with his address), so that they were ready for shipment, and he intended to deliver them to an interstate carrier for that purpose. This state of facts shows a complete sale in McCreary county. The liquor was paid for and marked and set apart for and as the property of the buyer, and he held it as agent or bailee of the buyer, and the buyer could have possessed himself of it by an order of delivery. In the event of Frogg's death, the title to the liquor so sold would not have passed to his personal representative. 35 Cyc. 192, on the subject of sales, says: "And when specific articles are sold, if they are marked as purchased by the buyer, and set aside for him, this is such an appropriation as will constitute a delivery."

In 35 Cyc. 313, the rule is again stated: "Unless a contrary intention appears, the property will pass as between the parties, although the goods remain in the custody of the seller as bailee of the buyer."

After noting the fact that this rule does not apply in the case of creditors and subsequent purchasers, the author proceeds with a discussion in this language: "There will, however, be a delivery and change of possession sufficient to pass the property as against third persons, although the goods remain in the apparent possession of the seller, if it clearly appears that he is in possession merely as an employee of the buyer, or that he is in possession as a bailee or trustee for the buyer; but there must be some act or circumstance to indicate the change in the character of his possession and give notice to the world of the change of ownership, or the possession will be regarded as continuing in the seller."

On page 315 the same author, in discussing the effect of segregation or setting apart, says: "Although the goods remain in the physical possession of the seller, yet there is such a delivery as will pass the property in the goods, even as against third persons, if they are segregated and set apart for the buyer, or marked as his property." The case of United States v. Lackey (D. C.) 120 Fed. 577, is in point. It was a prosecution for selling liquor without license. The defendant delivered C. O. D. shipments to his own servant to carry by wagon from Woolwine to Roanoke, Virginia. The immediate point in the case was whether the sale took place at Woolwine or Roanoke. The court said: "Assume that the contract of sale on credit has been made; that the desired article has been segregated from the vendor's stock, and marked distinctly as the property of the vendee, and is still in the vendor's possession awaiting an opportunity for shipment. Is this enough to transfer the title? In case where there is no express or implied agreement that the sale shall not be complete until delivery, I think the acts above mentioned transfer the title to the vendee."

After further discussing the C. O. D. feature, and holding that in such shipments the sale was undoubtedly completed on delivery to the carrier, it was nevertheless further stated: "To my mind, in all such cases, where we have no certain guide showing a different intent, the acceptance of the order for the article, as shown by the act of the seller in segregating the specific article from his stock and marking it with the address of the purchaser, is sufficient to mark the contract as closed, and to effect a transfer of title. But, if not so, certainly when delivery by the seller to a carrier—even his own servant—is added to the other acts done by him, there is no question but that the title has passed."

Many cases have come here from courts in local option territory where parties were prosecuted for selling liquor in such territory when the facts showed that the sale was made in wet territory, and the liquor shipped by a common carrier from wet to dry territory. In order to determine the venue, and in discussing the facts with reference to the place of sale, the court used such expressions as this: "The title to the whisky vested in the purchaser on its delivery to the common carrier, and the sale therefore took place in Catlettsburg, and not in Carter county." Josselson Bros. v. Com. 159 Ky. 468, 167 S. W. 374.

And in the case of Josselson Bros. v. Com. 154 Ky. 795, 159 S. W. 559, the place of sale is thus located: "Therefore, when the whisky was delivered to the carrier at Catlettsburg, the agent of the purchaser, the title thereto vested in the purchaser, and the sale took place at Catlettsburg, and not in Pike county."

But in none of the cases where such expressions are used was the court considering the elements necessary to complete sale. Unquestionably there was a complete sale when the seller delivered the article to the common carrier. But the court did not mean to say that a completed sale cannot be otherwise consummated. The inquiry the court was making was as to place of sale, not the time of, or the ingredients of, the sale.

From what we have said, we do not believe it necessary to discuss the question as to whether a state law prohibiting sales of liquor is an interference with interstate commerce, when it is intended to transport the liquor to another state. The sales in question were completed before delivery to the interstate carrier. But if the state of facts did show that there was not a complete sale until the liquor was delivered to the carrier in local option territory, we still believe it would be a sale made in local option territory, and in violation of the local option law. A leading case on this question is Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. L.R.A.1915D.

1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6, in which it was held that a statute of the state of Iowa which forbade the manufacture or sale of liquor at any point within the state of Iowa, did not restrict interstate commerce as to manufacturers of such liquor who might intend to dispose of it exclusively to interstate purchasers. This case was followed by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Delamater v. South Dakota, 205 U. S. 93, 51 L. ed. 724, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 447, 10 Ann. Cas. 733.

So we have admitted facts which, in our opinion, constitute not only possession of whisky for purpose of sale, but actual sale of the whisky in territory where local option law is in force. In our opinion, there is a complete offense, and it makes no difference, with reference to guilt or innocence, that the purchaser may not intend to drink the liquor in Kentucky, or in local option territory, or that he may not get the actual possession within the state.

Appellant insists that the act of March 19, 1914, commonly called the shipping bill, repealed § 2557, with its subsections, and § 2558 and subsections, of Kentucky Statutes in so far as they applied to distilleries; and it is argued that he may now possess, prepare for shipment, and deliver liquor to carriers for carriage to consignees in dry territory in Kentucky, although the quantity be less than 5 gallons. We do not believe the 1914 act is susceptible of any such construction, nor did the case of Adams Exp. Co. v. Crigler & C. Co. 161 Ky. 89, 170 S. W. 542, so hold. The 1914 act in unmistakable terms shows to what extent §§ 2557 and 2558, Kentucky Statutes, are changed, and we have already called attention to the changes. That is, a government license to sell liquors is not presumptive evidence against a distiller as to the purpose for which he holds and possesses liquor, and a distiller may receive shipments of liquor, although they are not labeled for "personal use," as required in case of other consignees. As to shipments of liquors by a common carrier within the state, the act of 1914 did repeal § 2569a of the statute, so that a common carrier is now permitted to receive and transport between points in Kentucky intoxicating liquors, subject to the restrictions imposed upon them by the act of 1914, and the Crigler Case so holds. So far as this case is concerned, we are unable to see that the act of 1914 repealed or amended §§ 2557 or 2558 in any other manner than we have already indicated.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

It is generally held that the owner or proprietor of a private hospital or sanitarium, operated for profit, is liable in damages for the negligence of his employee. This rule rests upon the general doctrine that a master is responsible for the torts of his servant in the scope of his employment. Richardson v. reasonable care and attention for his safety as his mental and physical condition, if known, may require. Wetzel v. Omaha Maternity & General Hospital Asso. supra; see also infra.

A hospital which is an adjunct of a medical school, and is conducted for profit, is not a purely public charity, so as to be exempt from liability for the negligence of its servants, although it takes some free patients. The fact that a corporation organized as a business corporation to conduct a hospital receives a patient who is a county charge, under a contract with the county for less remuneration than the service is worth, does not preclude him from holding it liable to him for injuries caused by the negligence or incompetence of nurses. Gitzhoffen v. Sisters of Holy Cross Hospital Asso. 32 Utah, 46, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1161, 88 Pac. 691. In the above case the defendant sought to escape liability by showing that the hospital was conducted solely as a charitable institution, and not for profit; but the court held that a corporation organized as a business corporation to conduct a hospital cannot, by parol evidence, show itself to be a charitable organization.

The fact that a powerful man, suffering from delirium tremens, is left in an insecure apartment in a hospital, in charge of a woman, powerless to restrain him, the hospital authorities knowing his condition, and that such a person may reasonably be expected to become violent, uncontrollable, and dangerous at any time, is evidence of negligence upon which a jury may base a verdict in an action against the hospital because of injuries due to his assault on another patient. University of Louisville v. Hammock, supra.

A verdict for $1,000 for injuries received by a sick woman in an attack upon her in a hospital by a mad patient who was negligently suffered to escape from his apart-poison in his room and took it thinking it was medicine, when promptly repeated to the nurse by the inquirer, who followed her directions, the statements may be admitted in evidence as admissions or declarations tending to prove negligence on the part of the hospital.

Hospital — negligence — liability.

5. A hospital conducted for private gain is liable to a patient for the negligence of nurses, while acting within the scope of their employment.

Physician — negligence of nurse — liability.

6. Where a patient in a hospital is treated by a physician who does not manage or control the hospital, he is not liable for the negligence of hospital nurses or internes, if he had no connection with any negligent act.

Hospital — contract duty.

7. A patient is generally admitted to a ment is not too much, where she is immediately made much worse thereby, and her health to some extent permanently impaired. Ibid.

Where a delirious patient was injured by falling out of the window of a private sanitarium, the proprietor's liability was held a question for the jury in Richardson v. Dumas, supra. The court stated that the patient was under the control and care of such owner or proprietor, and his employee, the nurse; under the contract it was the duty of the proprietor to give the patient all the attention required; the facts presented by the evidence, the very nature of the occurrence, shows a prima facie case of negligence in failing to exercise due care in nursing and looking after the patient.

In an action against a hospital conducted for private gain, to recover damages for negligence in caring for a delirious patient whose death resulted from his jumping from an unprotected, unfastened, and unguarded window in the absence of an attendant, the issue of negligence was, in Wetzel v. Omaha Maternity & General Hospital Asso. supra, held to be for the jury, where the evidence tended to show that he was knowingly admitted to the hospital under an implied obligation that he should receive such reasonable care and attention for his safety as his mental and physical condition required, and that the nurse in charge, at the time of the accident, had been absent for a period estimated by one witness to be less than five minutes, and by another to be about an hour.

The decision in Duncan v. St. Luke's Hospital, 113 App. Div. 68, 98 N. Y. Supp. 867, affirmed in 192 N. Y. 580, 85 N. E. 1109, denying a husband's right to recover damages from a hospital for the death of his insane wife in consequence of a breach of contract to keep a constant watch and guard over her, as a result of which she threw herself out of a window and was killed, was upon the ground that the case was not within the statute giving an action for death, L.R.A.1915D.

Evidence — presumption of continued insanity.

8. A mere fitful or temporary mental disorder will not be presumed to continue.

Trial — jury — negligence.

9. Whether a hospital was negligent in allowing a patient, while suffering from a fitful mental disorder, access to a sink-room, in the night, without an attendant, where poison was kept, held a question for the jury.

and there was no right of action independently of the statute.

Where a patient in a hospital was burned apparently by coming into contact with an open gas fire burning in the room, as a consequence of being left alone to look after his own safety, he being unconscious and oblivious to all his surroundings, and yet physically able to get up and tumble about, the court in Hogan v. Clarksburg Hospital Co. 63 W. Va. 84, 59 S. E. 943, reversing a judgment for defendant, stated that "there can be no question about the liability of a hospital which is being conducted for private gain, and not for charitable purposes, for damages to its patients through the negligence or misconduct of its officers and employees. It is bound to exercise that degree of care towards its patients placed therein measured by the capacity of such patients to look after and provide for their own safety. It is the duty of such hospital to employ only competent physicians and nurses, and to treat such patients with such skill and care as ordinarily obtains in conduct of such institutions, and to protect its patients in such manner as their condition may render necessary; and such degree of care and diligence should be in proportion to the physical or mental ailments of the patient rendering him unable to look after his own safety.

. . . A hospital is not an insurer of its patients against injury inflicted by themselves, or that a patient in a hospital must be attended continuously by a nurse or other attendants, as it is claimed would be the case, as a matter of law, if the decision herein of the court below should be reversed as indicated by defendant's counsel. On the other hand, hospitals will only be required as heretofore to use ordinary and reasonable care and diligence in the treatment and care of their patients."

The hospital was responsible for the negligent acts of its employees.

Stanley v. Schumpert, 117 La. 255, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 306, 116 Am. St. Rep. 202, ing in contact with a hot water bag through the physician's negligence, the court stated that the negligent acts of the nurses, employees in a private hospital run for profit, in connection with the practice of medicine and surgery, by a physician and surgeon as owner and proprietor thereof, resulting in injury to a patient who has for hire entrusted himself to such hospital owner for professional treatment and hospital nursing, render such proprietor liable as a master. The court further stated that a patient's right of recovery is not defeated by any subsequent neglect to cure himself of the injury suffered.

A judgment awarding $1,250 damages for a burn on the leg of a patient in a private sanitarium conducted for profit, caused by a nurse leaving a hot water bottle in the bed, was, in Pensacola Sanitarium v. Wilkins, 64 Fla. 407, 60 So. 128, reversed because of the admission of mortuary tables, followed by an apparently accepted verdict for an injury not shown to be permanent in its nature. At a subsequent trial a verdict for $1,500 was rendered. As an alternative for a new trial awarded, the amount of the verdict was reduced by remittitur to $1,000, and the defendant took a writ of error. The supreme court, in affirming the trial court's determination, ruled thus: 1. Where, in an action for personal injuries, the damages claimed are solely for alleged actual negligence, it is not error to exclude evidence as to the competency of the negligent employee. 2. It is not error to exclude a question relative to the extent of the plaintiff's injury when it was coupled with matter relating to a settlement of the claim for damages, which latter was not material to the issues being tried. 3. Where the trial court has allowed a remittitur, the appellate court will not reverse the judgment for excessiveness in amount, where the award is not patently excessive.

In Williams v. Pomona Valley Hospital Asso. 21 Cal. App. 359, 131 Pac. 888, the complaint alleged plaintiff's entrance as a patient in defendant's hospital; that while in said hospital and unconscious, a servant of defendant placed a hot water bag or bottle on or about plaintiff's feet in such a careless and negligent manner that his feet were badly burned and scalded, from which he suffered damages. The trial court instructed that since the allegations of negligence and carelessness were confined to the manner of the placing of the hot water bottle on or about plaintiff's feet, in order to find for plaintiff it must be shown that the hot water bottle was placed on or about plaintiff's feet in a careless and negligent manner, and that the burns resulted from, and were the direct and proximate result of, the manner of the placing of the hot water bottle. Also that since plaintiff in his complaint did not charge that any employee of the defendant was negligent or careless in placing at his feet a hot water bottle that was too hot, or that would cause burns by reason of being too hot, the allegations of the complaint on which plaintiff must recover if at all were that the employees of defendant were negligent and careless in the manner of placing the hot water bottle on or about plaintiff's feet. Consequently if the evidence showed that the hot water bottle was not placed at plaintiff's feet in a careless or negligent manner, there must be a finding for the defendant. The trial court further instructed that "the fact that plaintiff's feet were burned is not a fact or circumstance to be taken into consideration by you in determining the question of whether or not Miss Melone [nurse] was guilty of negligence in applying the hot water bottle to plaintiff's feet. The burning of plaintiff's feet was a subsequent event. In other words, you are to determine the question of whether or not she was negligent by the circumstances as they existed at the time she applied the hot water bottle, and not by what afterward happened." These and other instructions, tending in the same direction, stated the appellate court, could have had no other effect than to instruct the jury that when the nurse applied the hot water bottle to the feet of plaintiff, exercising ordinary care in the manner in which the same was placed, she was absolved from all further care or attention in relation to the patient

Rose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover $40,000 for alleged negligence resulting in the death of Adolph F. Broz, a farmer, who, with his wife and two children, had resided on a farm in Saline county. Plaintiff is the administratrix of his estate. The Omaha Maternity & General Hospital Association, defendant, is a corporation conducting at Omaha a hospital for private gain. Broz was a patient therein from April 18, 1910, until June 21, 1910, paying for his room and care $15 a week. In the petition it is alleged that Broz was knowingly admitted as a patient when suffering from a mental disorder which caused at times a delirious condition, impelling him intermittently to leave his bed and otherwise to act irrationally; that while a patient of defendant he took poison, the result being fatal; that defendant was negligent in permitting him to remain for a long time unattended and unguarded in his room and in the hallways of the hospital, and in negligently leaving in an exposed and unguarded place the poison which he took; that, after defendant was apprised that he had taken poison, it negligently failed to administer proper as regards the effect produced by the application of the hot water bottle. The court was of the opinion that too restricted construction was placed upon the averments of the complaint. The word "manner" in the connection under consideration means the way of doing anything. The use of the term "manner" in the complaint should be taken to comprehend the way the act was performed, having in view the condition of the patient and the character of the remedies applied. To place a hot water bottle of such high temperature upon the feet of an unconscious man as would burn or scald the feet cannot be said to be a proper way of doing such a thing; and a pleading which refers to the manner as having produced the injury should, under § 452 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be given such a liberal construction as would work substantial justice between the parties. To give it the construction adopted by the trial court, that the subsequent effect of the application in producing burns and scalds was not to be considered, eliminated from the consideration of the jury one of the vital and principal questions presented. The court further stated that the duty of a nurse, and assuming that a nurse must only exercise the ordinary care which a trained and skilled nurse would be required to use, is a continuous duty. Dealing, as she was, with an unconscious patient, unable to care for himself, it was her duty to observe the effect upon the patient of the application of the remedy as much as it was to test its temperature in the first instance. There were instructions given relative to the degree of care which a nurse was required to exercise. These were in general terms; but, when the court came to the concrete case of presenting to the jury the question of the care which the nurse should exercise, it sought to restrict that care and that attention to the moment of time when she was applying the remedy, and excludes all subsequent care and attention. This, said the appellate court, was clearly error, and so prejudicial in its nature as to warrant a reversal of the judgment and of the order denying a new trial.

In Croupp v. Garfield Park Sanitarium, 147 Ill. App. 7, the court, while conceding that it was negligence to leave a helpless patient on a bedpan alone in a room for five minutes, held that such negligence could not be regarded as the proximate cause of injury to him by the ignition of bandages on his legs, apart from proof that the nurse knew, or, in the exercise of reasonable care, would have known, of the presence in the bed of the match which ignited.

In the Croupp Case the court said that, irrespective of the question whether or not the defendant was at fault in connection with the burning of the patient, it was bound to give him reasonable care and nursing after that injury, and while there was evidence tending to show that the room was kept in an unsanitary condition, yet there was no sufficient evidence to show that the patient's condition was aggravated or his suffering increased thereby.

Where a hospital, for the consideration of $21 per week, agreed to provide a patient with a skilful, trained, and competent nurse, and the person furnished, instead of being a trained nurse, was a mere pupil of limited experience, who placed an unprotected rubber bag, containing very hot water, to the patient's leg, burning it and causing serious injury, it was held, in Ward v. St. Vincent's Hospital, 39 App. Div. 824, 57 N. Y. Supp. 784, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 164, that it was for the jury to say whether, in furnishing this careless pupil, the hospital fulfilled its contract obligation to the patient; and that if it did not, and the injury resulted from the breach of that obligation, to award adequate compensation for such injury. In determining the validity of certain instructions it was held in a later appeal (65 App. Div. 64, 72 N. Y. Supp. 587) proper to instruct the jury that, notwithstanding certain testimony, defendant was not bound to assign plaintiff the best nurse in its hospital, but only a nurse who was ordinarily well trained, competent, and skilful; and in 78 App. Div. 317, 79 N. Y. Supp. 1004, certain questions were held proper, the answers to which bore directly remedies and antidotes; that the facts pleaded constitute a negligent omission of duty and a breach of defendant's implied undertaking to furnish and supply him with all the care, nursing, medical treatment, and oversight necessary, suitable, and proper for him in view of his known physical and mental condition. In its answer defendant denied negligence, but admitted that Broz was affected with a mental disorder when taken to the hospital; that about midnight June 19, 1910, he was found in his room, dangerously ill, and nurses then on duty were soon afterward apprised that he had taken poison; that he died June 21, 1910. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $7,000. From a judgment for that sum defendant has appealed.

The first assignment of error is directed to the admission in evidence of standard tables of expectancy of life. On this point defendant says: "As a matter of fact, Broz was suffering from a mental disorder of such a nature that he could never fully recover, and his chances of a partial recovery were none too good. The probable duration of the life of a person in such a condition is very uncertain and cannot be shown by the introduction in evidence of the ordinary life tables, for those tables are applicable only to persons in good health."

In support of this argument, Lincoln v. Smith, 28 Neb. 762, 45 N. W. 41, and Roose v. Perkins, 9 Neb. 304, 31 Am. Rep. 409, upon the question whether the nurse erred in judgment, by reason of lack of training and skill, in placing the hot water bag next to the plaintiff's leg, or whether it was a thoughtless or careless act upon her part. If the latter, no liability attached, and it was for the jury to say which it was.

Physician or surgeon.

In O'Brien v. American Casualty Co. 58 Wash. 477, 109 Pac. 52, an action for malpractice against a corporation maintaining a hospital for profit, its successor, a casualty company, and a physician in their employ, it appeared that a general verdict for plaintiff was rendered in the lower court, the jury finding specified sums against the corporation, its successor, and the physician, and also making special findings. On the return of the verdict the plaintiff, the patient, moved, first, for a joint and several judgment against all three defendants in the sum of $7,000; or second, for a joint and several judgment against the hospital association and the physician in the sum of $5,000, and a joint and several judgment against all three defendants in the sum of $2,000; or, third, for a judgment on the general verdict, special findings, pleadings, and testimony. On the other hand, the hospital association and the casualty company moved for a judgment in their favor, notwithstanding the verdict, and later amended their motion by leave of court and asked in the alternative that a joint and several judgment be entered against all three defendants in the sum of $1,000, to be satisfied as to all by the payment of the amount of the judgment into court by the defendant's physician. The court denied the several motions interposed by the plaintiff, and granted the amended motion of the defendant. A motion for a new trial, thereafter interposed by the plaintiff, was denied, and from the final judgment of the court, this appeal is prosecuted. The appellate court stated that the permanent injury to the appellant (patient) resulted from the negligence and incompetency of the respondent's physician, if it resulted from negligence at all, and, in the absence of a finding fixing the responsibility for such negligence on either the hospital association or the casualty company, or both, no verdict such as was here returned should be permitted to stand. The court was convinced that there was a substantial mistrial in the court below, and that a new trial should be awarded.

In Robinson v. Crotwell, 175 Ala. 194, 57 So. 23, 2 N. C. C. A. 386, the defendant, a physician, who kept a hospital, procured a surgeon to perform an operation for a compensation agreed upon and to be paid by plaintiff, the patient. The defendant took part in the operation only to the extent of administering the anæsthetic, and advising that the effort to complete the operation be abandoned on account of the patient's ebbing vitality. There was no suggestion that in these things defendant showed any lack of skill or committed any error, nor was there any suggestion in pleading or in proof that defendant negligently advised the employment of an unskilful or incompetent surgeon to perform the operation. Under these circumstances it was held that the defendant was not responsible for any default on the part of the operating surgeon, who was practising his profession as an independent agent. It was argued in this case that defendant contributed to the result of the operating surgeon's alleged negligence by furnishing an inadequately equipped place in which to perform the operation. This, however, said the court, leaves the question at issue, to depend upon defendant's responsibility for the operating surgeon; for if the condition of the hospital and its equipment was such as, in itself, to import an element of negligence or unskilfulness into an operation performed there, the responsibility for that element of the operation rested upon the surgeon whose judgment determined upon and directed the operation. Moreover, the medical men who testified in the case, including the one upon whose testimony plaintiff's case at last depended, and who had performed operations there, gave their approval to the hospital.

J. D. C.

2 N. W. 715, are cited. The question now presented was not involved in either of those cases. While good health was shown, neither opinion contains the statement that mortality tables are inadmissible in absence of proof of that fact. As data or evidence, tending to show expectancy of life, mortality tables are not conclusive. Friend v. Ingersoll, 39 Neb. 717, 58 N. W. 281; Vickaburg & M. R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545, 30 L. ed. 257, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 574; Joliet v. Blower, 155 Ill. 414, 40 N. E. 619; Central R. Co. v. Crosby, 74 Ga. 737, 58 Am. Rep. 463, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 140; Scheffer v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 32 Minn. 518, 21 N. W. 711. They are competent evidence to aid the jury or court in determining the probable duration of life when that question is in issue, and may properly be submitted with other evidence, showing health, age, existence of disease, physical and mental condition, vocation, or employment, and other pertinent facts.

As evidence, the effect of mortality tables, if any, is determinable by the triers of fact. Friend v. Ingersoll, 39 Neb. 717, 58 N. W. 281; South Omaha v. Sutcliffe, 72 Neb. 746, 101 N. W. 997. Proof that the person whose expectancy of life is under consideration conforms to the standards of health and vigor adopted in compiling mortality tables is not essential to their admissibility.

Evidence of disease or of ill health or of hazardous employment may impair or destroy the probative effect of tables of expectancy of life, but it does not make them inadmissible. Arkansas Midland R. Co. v. Griffith, 63 Ark. 491, 39 S. W. 550, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 105; Greer v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 94 Ky. 169, 42 Am. St. Rep. 345, 21 S. W. 649; Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Wilmer, 97 Ala. 165, 11 So. 886; Mary Lee Coal & R. Co. v. Chambliss, 97 Ala. 171, 11 So. 897; Coates v. Burlington C. R. & N. R. Co. 62 Iowa, 486, 17 N. W. 760. In the Arkansas case cited the court said: "The question is whether we can still make the tables of service in making the calculation, notwithstanding it is shown that plaintiff's condition and health were below the average, and that, in fact, he was not an insurable risk. This is an element of uncertainty that must necessarily be found in the case of one of feeble health and not insurable, in all cases, whether we call to our aid the mortality tables or not. When we do so, however, when, by reason of enfeebled physical condition, the standard tables are not strictly applicable on that account, yet they are more or less efficient aids in arriving at an approximation of the L.R.A.1915D.

truth, and that is the best that can be hoped for, after all."

This assignment of error is therefore overruled.

Another assignment of error challenges the admissibility of statements by Broz that the poison was on a table in his room, and that he took it, thinking it was his medicine. Over objections of defendant, statements of this nature were proved by Dr. Mares. There is testimony tending to show: Dr. Mares was a brother-in-law of Broz. The poisoning was discovered before midnight. About 8 o'clock the next morning Dr. Mares was notified and promptly went to the hospital. Upon his arrival he conversed with the head nurse. He testified: "I asked the head nurse what happened, and she told me that Mr. Broz took poison, and that it was bichlorid of mercury. I asked her how could she tell it was bichlorid of mercury, and she told me she could tell by the symptoms; and I asked her, 'How did he get it?' She told me to go in his room and ask how and where he got it and what it was."

Dr. Mares went to the room of the patient, interviewed him, and reported the conversation to the head nurse, who said: "That is what I thought." The statements of Adolph F. Broz were thus reported by Dr. Mares in his own language, as follows: "When I came in the room, I said: 'Adolph, what did you do, and what did you do it for?' and he said, 'I did not do anything.' He said, 'I took four tablets off of the tray on the table.' He pointed at the table and he said he thought it was his medicine; and I asked him what kind they were, and he said they were blue in color, and a little smaller than usual; and then he told me that he took them because lately they were changing medicine on him, and so he thought it was his medicine, and I asked him if he used to take so many, and he said, no, he only took two, and sometimes only one, and those were grayish in color and a little bit larger; and then he also told me that he drank a glass full of something that tasted oily. I asked him, 'Did it make you sick?' and he said, 'No, not right away.' But in a few minutes he started to get cramps and pains in his stomach and started to vomit."

The question is: Did the trial court err in admitting this testimony and other proof of a similar nature? It is argued that defendant is not bound by such statements; that Broz was under the care of his own physician, and the latter's instructions were obeyed by the nurses and other employees of the hospital; that Broz, under specific directions of his physician, was allowed the freedom of his room and of the halls in the hospital; that bichlorid of mercury was used in the hospital as an indispensable disinfectant, and that it was kept for that purpose in a sinkroom, where Broz found the tablets; that he took the poison with suicidal intent, there being at the time no reason to suspect that he would do so. Defendant adduced proof in support of the positions thus taken. If, however, the statements of Broz were properly admitted, there is evidence of negligence on the part of defendant. Intermittent mental infirmities of the patient were pleaded in the petition and admitted in the answer. The pleadings, evidence, and circumstances justify a finding that he was admitted to the hospital under an implied obligation that he should receive such reasonable care and attention for his safety as his mental and physical condition required. The physician employed by him did not relieve the hospital of responsibility for negligence on its part, if any. The patient was under the personal observation of his physician only a small portion of the time. In the latter's absence and during emergencies he was under the care of the nurses and the interne, who were employees of the hospital. Within the scope of their employment their employer is legally responsible for their negligence to a patient. Wetzel v. Omaha Maternity & General Hospital Asso. 96 Neb. 636, 148 N. W. 582, 7 N. C. C. A. 82. The patient's physician did not manage or control the hospital, and he is not liable for the negligence of hospital nurses and internes, if he had no connection with any negligent act. Harris v. Fall, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1174 and note (100 C. C. A. 497, 177 Fed. 79, 3 N. C. C. A. 176). In absence of the physician employed by Broz, and in absence of the latter's wife, and of his relatives and friends, while he was under the exclusive care of hospital nurses, he took bichlorid of mercury and died as a result. These facts are indisputably established. Several hours after the poison had been taken, the hospital authorities in the meantime having had ample time to make an investigation, Dr. Mares called upon the head nurse, and, according to his testimony, was told that the patient had taken poison. "How did he get it?" was then asked. This was a proper inquiry by the patient's brother-in-law. It was directed to the head nurse, an employee of defendant. She was the person who would be most likely to know the truth. The inquirer had a right to know the fact. The nurse, instead of fully answering the question, directed the inquirer to go to the patient's room and ask how and where he got the poison and what it was. Dr. Mares did as she directed, L.R.A.1915D.

returned, and told her what the patient said. She replied, "That is what I thought." This is the story of Dr. Mares. Were the statements of the patient, in connection with what the head nurse said, admissions binding on defendant? The expression, "That is what I thought," may fairly be construed to imply previous knowledge on part of the head nurse, and to indicate the approval of the patient's version of what he took and where he obtained it. An eminent text writer says: "The admissions of a third person are also receivable in evidence, against the party who has expressly referred another to him for information, in regard to an uncertain or disputed matter. In such cases, the party is bound by the declarations of the persons referred to, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if they were made by himself." 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 182.

Even if no reply had been made by the head nurse to the statements tending to show negligence on the part of defendant's employees, silence might be considered an admission, under the circumstances, since the head nurse would naturally deny statements implying negligence, if untrue. 16 Cyc. 956. Defendant is a corporation and could only act through officers, agents, or servants, and it is bound by what they do in the performance of their duties. Where a hospital patient takes poison at night, in the absence of his physician and friends, while he is under the exclusive care of nurses and internes, harsh and technical rules of evidence should not be enforced to exclude proper testimony tending to throw some light on material facts which, on account of the pecuniary interests and the reputation of the hospital, there might be a temptation to conceal. The conclusion is that there was no error in overruling objections to the admissions or declarations proved.

It is further contended that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of defendant in treating the patient after he had taken the poison, and that the trial court erroneously submitted the question to the jury. At night, during the absence of the patient's physician, it was clearly the duty of the hospital interne, who was a physician, and the nurses in charge, to give such treatment and attention as the emergency demanded, when known. Defendant was prepared for such an exigency. One of the purposes of a hospital in assuming control of a patient, for private gain, is to furnish promptly modern equipment, facilities, and treatment. To avail himself of these advantages the patient left his farm in Saline county and intrusted himself to the care of defendant. The duties which such a hospital owes to a patient are commensurate with the responsibilities assumed. The approved rule is that a patient is generally admitted to a hospital, conducted for private gain, under an implied obligation that he shall receive such reasonable care and attention for his safety as his mental and physical condition, if known, may require. Wetzel v. Omaha Maternity & General Hospital Asso. Within the meaning of this rule, the interpretation which the trial court put upon the proof of negligence on the part of defendant in treating Broz, after he had taken bichlorid of mercury, is approved upon an examination of all of the circumstances of the case, and error in submitting the question to the jury is not affirmatively shown. It may fairly be inferred from all of the proofs relating to this subject that nurses were promptly apprised of the taking of the poison, and that proper treatment was negligently delayed.

Another reason urged as a ground for reversal is the absence of evidence that Broz would have recovered, with an earning capacity justifying the verdict. A mere fitful or temporary mental disorder will not be presumed to continue. Turner v. Rusk, 53 Md. 65; People v. Francis, 38 Cal. 183; Hall v. Unger, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 507, Fed. Cas. No. 5,949; Leache v. State, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 638, 3 S. W. 539; Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385. In the present case there is proof tending to show that the mental disorder was temporary, and that the patient would have recovered, had he not taken poison. An earning capacity sufficient to support the judgment is also shown. On these issues the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence were questions for the jury, and in the respects mentioned no sufficient reason for setting aside the verdict has been suggested.

A direction to the jury submitting the question of negligence on the part of defendant in leaving Broz unattended in his room and in the halls is criticized as erroneous. In this connection it is insisted that the physician employed by Broz instructed defendant to allow him the freedom of his room and the halls, that employees of defendant did so, and that it is not chargeable with negligence for complying with instructions. The directions of the physician should be considered with the duty of the hospital to give the patient such reasonable care and attention for his safety as his mental and physical condition required. Defendant was not instructed to allow the patient, who had been suffering from a fitful mental disorder, access to a hospital sinkroom, where poisons, in the form of medicine tablets, were kept. Whether there was negligence in allowing the patient access to such a place in the night, while unattended, was a question for the jury.

The views taken in regard to the proofs and to the law applicable thereto result in the conclusion that there was no prejudicial error in giving or in refusing instructions to the jury.

Affirmed.

Sedgwick, J., dissenting:

The facts in this case are in some respects identical with those in Wetzel v. Omaha Maternity & General Hospital Asso. 96 Neb. 636, 148 N. W. 582, 7 N. C. C. A. 82. This defendant was also defendant in that case, and it appears that it was organized to own and conduct a hospital for profit, and that the hospital is not an eleemosynary or charitable institution, and is liable for negligence in the performance of duties undertaken by it.

The court submitted the case to the jury with the following instruction: "The plaintiff bases her right to recover in this action upon two specifications of negligence on the part of the defendant: (1) That the defendant was negligent in permitting Adolph F. Broz to remain for a long time unattended and unguarded in his room, and in the hallways of the hospital, and in negligently leaving in an exposed and unguarded place the poison which Adolph F. Broz took. (2) That after the employees and agents of the defendant were apprised that Adolph F. Broz had taken poison, it negligently failed to administer proper remedies and antidotes for the relief of said Adolph F. Broz."

The issues so stated were substantially the issues tried by the parties.

The theory of the defendant is that the deceased left his room and went to the sinkroom and there found the bichlorid of mercury which he took with suicidal intent, and that in such case the defendant would not be liable. The theory of the plaintiff is that he found these tablets on the table near his bed in his room, and that he took them by mistake, supposing they were medicine prescribed for him. By the above-quoted instruction the court submitted both of these theories to the jury. It appears to be conceded that, if the deceased was in his right mind so as to be responsible for his acts, and took this poison with the purpose and intention of destroying his own life, there would be no liability on the part of the defendant. One of the contentions of the defendant is that there was not sufficient evidence to justify submitting to the jury the question whether these bichlorid tablets were found upon the table in the patient's room. The evidence of Miss Thimling, his nurse, was clear and positive that when she left his room a few minutes before he took the poison there were no tablets or medicine of any kind on the table, and that she never saw any of the tablets in his room, and these tablets were never taken to the sick rooms. Her testimony was supported by the positive testimony of many witnesses and must prevail unless there is substantial evidence to the contrary. Some of the defendant's evidence upon this point will be further stated in another connection. The only evidence tending to prove that they were found there by the patient is the evidence of the plaintiff and her brother, Dr. Mares, that the patient made declarations to that effect. This evidence was objected to as incompetent and hearsay.

There was substantial evidence that the deceased had gone to the sinkroom and had taken this bichlorid of mercury for the purpose of taking his own life. The next morning, about nine hours afterwards, Dr. Mares visited the patient in his room, and upon the witness stand he was asked: "Now, Doctor, you may state what Adolph Broz said to you in that room that morning?" This was objected to on the ground that it was incompetent and hearsay. The objection was overruled, and the defendant answered: "When I came in the room, I said, 'Adolph, what did you do, and what did you do it for?' and he said, 'I did not do anything.' He said, 'I took four tablets off the tray on the table.' He pointed at the table, and he said, he thought it was his medicine, and I asked him what kind they were, and he said they were blue in color, and a little smaller than usual. And then he told me that he took them because lately they were changing medicine on him, and so he thought it was his medicine, and I asked him if he used to take so many, and he said, no, he only took two, and sometimes only one, and those were grayish in color and a little bit larger. And then he also told me that he drank a glass full of something that tasted oily. I asked him, did it make you sick, and he said, no, not right away, but in a few minutes he started to get cramps and pains in his stomach and started to vomit."

The defendant then moved to strike out this evidence because it was incompetent and hearsay, and the motion was overruled. This evidence was, of course, incompetent as a dying statement, since evidence of dying statements is allowed only in criminal cases. It is contended that it is competent as a part of the res gestæ. The modern rule as to what is and what is not a part of the res gestæ is aptly and carefully stated in Travellers' Ins. Co. v. Mosley, 8 Wall. 397, 19 L. ed. 437. This case is of the more importance and interest because it considered and determined no other question and because two of the justices dissented, and the question is quite elaborately and thoroughly discussed in the dissenting opinion. The law is stated in the syllabus: "The res gestæ are the statements of the cause made by the injured party almost contemporaneously with the occurrence of the injury, and those relating to the consequences made while the latter subsisted and were in progress."

That is, in an injury of this kind there are two things to be considered: the cause and the consequences of the injury. If it is desired to prove the cause of the injury, statements "made by the person injured almost contemporaneously with the occurrence" are res gestæ, the things done that constitute the cause of the injury. If it is desired to prove the consequences of the injury, then statements made by the injured person while the consequences subsist and are in progress may be evidence of the res gestæ, the things suffered as the consequences of the injury. And so, in this case, if it was desired to prove the condition in which the physician found the patient, it would be competent to prove the questions of the physician and the answers of the patient as to his suffering and such matters as would enable the physician to determine his condition. In the case cited, Mrs. Mosley testified that her husband left the bed "between 12 and 1 o'clock; that, when he came back, he said he had fallen down the back stairs, and almost killed himself; that he had hit the back part of his head in falling downstairs; . . . she noticed that his voice trembled; he complained of his head, and appeared to be faint and in great pain." His son testified "that, about 12 o'clock of the night before-mentioned, he saw his father lying with his head on the counter, and asked him what was the matter; he replied that he had fallen down the back stairs and hurt himself very badly."

From this it appeared that in a very short time after the deceased left his bed he was found injured and made these declarations as to its cause which brings them within the rule announced in the syllabus, as statements of the cause, made by the person injured almost contemporaneously with its occurrence.

It will be observed that the declarations testified to by the witness in the case at bar related wholly to the cause of his injury, the taking of the poison, and not to the consequences of the injury. They were made not almost contemporaneously with the cause to which they related, but some nine hours thereafter. He was asked by his brother-in-law, "What did you do, and what did you do it for?" He had had ample time to consider his action, and had suffered very much from its consequences. He knew that his brother-in-law would disapprove of his taking poison purposely. His answer tended to shield himself from blame, and was in no sense contemporaneous with the act that it is supposed to explain. This same witness was allowed to testify to a conversation that he had with the deceased at about 10 o'clock on the following night, nearly twenty-four hours after the cause of the injury, which declarations related wholly to the cause of his injury, and had nothing to do with the consequences of the injury; that is, the condition in which the physician found him.

The plaintiff first saw her husband after the accident about 4 o'clock the following afternoon. She testified that when she went into the room the nurse was treating Broz, and that she asked the nurse what her husband took, and the nurse said, "He took some poison pills," and that while she was in the room the nurse was there. "He (Broz) was pointing to the table, and he said: 'I took them on that table, on the little tray. I thought they were my medicine.'" That the nurse told her to ask him, and she asked him, and that his statement was an answer to her question, and that after her husband had made that statement the nurse did not say a thing. It seems clear that this evidence was not admissible as part of the res gestæ.

It is said that this evidence was competent as admissions of the nurses which would be binding upon the defendant. The physician testified that he was requested by the head nurse of the hospital to ask these questions of the patient, and that he reported to the nurse what the patient had said, and that the nurse replied, "That is what I thought." If we consider that the doctor's evidence in regard to these declarations was competent as proving admissions on the part of the hospital authorities, the supposed admission of the nurse was so indefinite as to be of little value. Her expression, "That is what I thought," might have related to the fact of his having taken poison, or it might have related to the manner of his taking it, as shown by the alleged declaration. Such evidence is not of sufficient importance to overcome the evidence on this point which is further stated in the discussion of the following contention. The contention that these tablets were found on the table in the patient's room should not have been submitted to the jury.

The defendant contends that there is no evidence of negligence on its part in the treatment of Broz after the discovery of his condition. The evidence shows that if the patient had swallowed a large quantity of bichlorid of mercury a delay of a half hour, and probably a much shorter time, in administering antidotes, would generally, if not always, prove fatal. The interne and nurses were not physicians. This was understood by all parties. The physicians were employed by the parties and their friends. Negligence, therefore, could not be imputed to the defendant because of not keeping a competent physician in continual attendance. It was the duty of the defendant to furnish attendants of ordinary prudence and caution.

Miss MacRea testified that she and Miss Thimling were in the hall, not far from the patient's room, and when she heard the moaning and vomiting in the patient's room she went there immediately and found him upon the floor, etc., and called his nurse, Miss Thimling, who came at once. They together returned the patient to his bed, and Miss MacRea questioned him as to the cause of his condition, and he told her that he had taken tablets from the sinkroom. She ran to the sinkroom and obtained some of the bichlorid tablets and showed them to the patient and asked him if that was what he took, and he answered that it was, that he knew he never would get well, and that he did not want to live any longer, and that was the reason he took the tablets. She then ran immediately to the head nurse and to Dr. Parsons, the interne. She says this was done instantly and did not take her more than a minute, and they told her to give him some milk and the whites of eggs, and she and Miss Thimling gave him the milk and whites of eggs before Dr. Parsons arrived, which was almost immediately, and that then, under Dr. Parsons' directions and with his help, they gave him a large quantity of milk and at least three whites of eggs. The witness called Dr. Coulter and informed him of the condition and what they had done. He gave them some additional directions, which they proceeded to comply with.

Miss Thimling, who was in charge of the patient at the time, testified that she was in the hall and heard groaning and vomiting in the patient's room. Miss MacRea was with her and went at once to the patient's room, and she followed almost immediately. She gave him his medicine at about 9 o'clock that night and was frequently in his room afterwards and before the accident occurred. He came out into the hall several times and she took him back. He complained that his room was hot and that he could not sleep. She testified that Miss MacRea went to his room first and she followed immediately after, and that when she reached the room he was telling Miss MacRea what was the matter with him and said that he had taken blue pills, and she asked him where he got them, and he told her, "Out of the little room, out of a bottle," and she asked him what he took them for, and that was the last she heard. She was called out of the room to attend to another patient and returned immediately. When she went back to the room, Miss MacRea had gone to call the head nurse and the doctor, and when Miss MacRea returned they gave him a glass of milk and the white of an egg. After they had given him that he refused to swallow, and Dr. Parsons, the interne, had come by that time, and they gave him two quarts of milk and the whites of two eggs through the stomach tube; that Dr. Parsons talked with him, and he "told the same thing that he told Miss MacRea." She never heard him say anything else as to where he got the tablets. She testified that the bichlorid tablets were kept in the sinkroom and that she had never seen any in any place in the hospital except in the sinkroom, operating room, and the drug room; that when she had given him his medicine she washed the glass and placed it on the table beside his bed; that there was no medicine on the table; and that she never saw any medicine in his room during the time that she waited on him, except when she administered it to him.

Dr. Parsons also testified that when he was called by Miss MacRea he went at once to the patient's room, and he corroborates her fully in regard to the treatment and in regard to Broz's statements as to the cause of the accident.

If these witnesses are to be believed, Mr. Broz procured these tablets from the sinkroom. It was not discovered that he had taken poison until it had already taken effect and he was suffering severely therefrom. Then the nurses placed him upon the bed and got their instructions from the head nurse and Dr. Parsons and administered the proper antidotes without any delay. The proper treatment must have been administered within a very few minutes, not more than three or four, probably within two, minutes after he was found. This evidence is without contradiction. The allegation of negligence in the care of the patient after the poison was taken is not supported by the evidence and should not have been submitted to the jury. L.R.A.1915D.

The evidence of the plaintiff and the witness Mares as to declarations of the deceased were incompetent, and the allegations of negligence in leaving the poison tablets in the patient's room and in neglecting proper remedies after it was discovered that he had taken poison were not sustained, and those issues should not have been submitted to the jury.

v.
MARYLAND MOTOR CAR INSURANCE COMPANY.

Insurance — temporary breach of condition — effect.

The inclusion in a deed of trust of personal property, of an automobile insured by a policy providing that it shall become void if the property becomes encumbered, will not prevent recovery on the policy if the deed of trust is only temporary, and is satisfied and canceled before the loss, and is not material to the risk, or fraudulent.

(February 17, 1915.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Mecklenburg County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under a policy insuring plaintiff's automobile against loss by fire. Reversed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — For effect of temporary condition which ceased before loss, under general provision against increase of risk, or specific provision against certain conditions, including provisions as to encumbrances, see notes to Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Messrs. Cameron Morrison and J. H. McLain for appellee.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 11, 1913, the defendant insured the automobile of the plaintiff against loss by fire for the term of one year, and the plaintiff paid the premium of $25 therefor. On September 19, 1913, the plaintiff executed a deed of trust on a number of horses, wagons, and other property, including the automobile. Three days thereafter the deed of trust was paid off, and canceled of record on September 22d, only three days after its execution. On September 26th, four days thereafter, the automobile was destroyed by fire. The defendant filed an answer, but when the case was called for trial demurred to the complaint on the ground that the policy contained this provision: "This policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon in writing by an authorized agent of the company, shall be void if the interest of the assured be other than unconditional and sole ownership; or if the property hereby insured be or become encumbered by a chattel mortgage; or if any change, other than by death of the assured, take place in the interest or title of the property hereby insured, whether by legal process or judgment or by voluntary act of the assured, or otherwise."

The court sustained the demurrer, and the plaintiff appealed. The loss occurred as above stated, after the deed of trust was paid off and canceled.

2 Cooley, Ins. 1780, citing many cases, says: "The general rule that a breach of the condition against encumbrance is ground for forfeiture must be modified where the encumbrance is merely temporary, and it is not in existence at the time of loss. It may be regarded as settled by the weight of authority that the effect of the encumbrance is merely to suspend the risk, and on the cancelation or discharge of the encumbrance, the policy is revived."

Elliott, Ins. § 205, collating the authorities also says: "The weight of authority seems to support the view that a violation of a condition that works a forfeiture of the policy merely suspends the insurance during the violation, and if the violation is discontinued during the life of the policy, and does not exist at the time of the loss, the policy revives, and the company is liable, although it had never consented to the violation of the conditions in the policy, and such violation has been such that the company could, had it known of it at the time, have declared a forfeiture therefor."

To same purport Phillips, Ins. § 975, and 1 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 101; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 288, and note.

A case almost exactly in point is Strause v. Palatine Ins. Co. 128 N. C. 64, 38 S. E. 256, where the defendant set up a defense that the mill was operated at night, contrary to the provisions of the policy, and this court said: "The fire occurred more than three months thereafter, and was in no wise traceable, so far as the evidence shows, to the working at night, which had long ceased."

Revisal 4806, provides: "All contracts of insurance on property, lives or interests in this state shall be deemed to be made therein; and all contracts of insurance, the application for which is taken within this state, shall be deemed to have been made within this state and shall be subject to the laws thereof."

Revisal 4808, is as follows: "All statements or descriptions in any application for a policy of insurance, or in the policy itself, shall be deemed and held representations and not warranties; nor shall any representation, unless material or fraudulent, prevent a recovery on the policy."

The purpose of Revisal 4808 was to prevent insurance companies from escaping the payment of honest losses upon technicalities and strict construction of contracts.

In construing these sections in McCarty v. Imperial Ins. Co. 126 N. C. 820, 36 S. E. 284, where, at the time of issuance of policy, there was a deed in trust to secure a debt of which the insurance company did not have notice, and where the policy provided that it should be void if the interests of the insured be not truly stated, this court quoted with approval from Albert v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 122 N. C. 92, 65 Am. St. Rep. 693, 30 S. E. 327, as follows: "This law applies to all policies of insurance, both of fire and of life; and unless such misrepresentations materially contribute to the loss, or fraudulently evade the payment of the increased premium, they do not vitiate the policy. Ordinarily, these are questions of fact for the jury, and not for the court."

In the present case the deed of trust given by the plaintiff embraced horses, wagons, and other property besides the automobile. This mortgage was paid off before the loss, and was not material to the risk, or fraudulent. The title of the plaintiff at the time of the loss was the same as at the time of the delivery of the policy. The deed in trust in nowise contributed to the loss, or in any way affected the risk. Weddington v. Piedmont F. Ins. Co. 141 N. C. 244, 54 S. E. 271, 8 Ann. Cas. 497; Watson v. North Carolina Home Ins. Co. 159 N. C. 638, 75 S. E. 1105, and Roper v. National Fire Ins. Co. 161 N. C. 151, 76 S. E. 869, differ from this case vitally in that in them the breach of the condition existed at the time of the loss. The law laid down in those cases had reference to the facts therein, and has no bearing on this case.

In Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 379, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300, 81 N. W. 676, it is held that giving a mortgage under the circumstances of the present case is a temporary breach of the policy, and when the breach was removed the policy was revived. In that case the mortgage given on the property was paid off, and the fire occurred afterwards, and the court said: "The theory upon which an existing mortgage is held to be a violation of a clause in the policy against an increase of risk is that it does increase the risk. . . . At the time of the loss the personal property in question was in the possession and ownership of the plaintiff, free from the encumbrances of the mortgages, and covered by his valid policy of insurance. Therefore he is entitled to recover for the loss thereof,"—citing Wilkins v. Tobacco Ins. Co. 30 Ohio St. 317, 27 Am. Rep. 455.

On the rehearing of Born v. Home Ins. Co. 120 Iowa, 299, 94 N. W. 849, the court reaffirmed its former ruling. The Born Case is reported 80 Am. St. Rep. 300, with full annotations, and the editor reaches this conclusion: "The general rule to be deduced from the weight of authority is that the violation of a condition in a policy of insurance which works a forfeiture thereof merely suspends the insurance during the violation, and that if such violation is discontinued during the life of the policy, and is nonexistent at the time of loss, the policy revives, the insurance is restored, and the insurer is liable, although he has never consented to a violation of the conditions in the policy, and such violation has been such that the insurer could, had he known of it at the time, have declared a forfeiture therefor."

Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013, holds that a breach of condition suspends the policy during the existence of the breach, and the removal of the breach revives the policy. In that case the policy contains this provision: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void, . . . if a building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied and so remain for ten days." The house did become vacant, but was reoccupied before the loss occurred. It is thus declared by Cooley on Insurance, Elliott on Insurance, and the notes to the 80 Am. St. Rep. at page 305, that the "weight of authority" is as above stated, and an examination of the authorities sustain that view, though Vance on Insurance, 433, says that the weight of authority is otherwise.

Among many cases, besides the above, sustaining the proposition that the removal of the breach revives the policy, when it is removed previous to the loss, and has in no wise contributed to it, are Lounsbury v. Protection Ins. Co. 8 Conn. 459, 21 Am. Dec. 686; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 4 Met. (Ky.) 9, 81 Am. Dec. 521; Joyce v. Maine Ins. Co. 45 Me. 168, 71 Am. Dec. 536; United States F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Kimberly, 34 Md. 234, 6 Am. Rep. 325; Garrison v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 56 N. J. L. 235, 28 Atl. 8; Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Coatesville Shoe Factory, 80 Pa. 407; Hinckley v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 140 Mass. 47, 54 Am. Rep. 445, 1 N. E. 737; McKibban v. Des Moines Ins. Co. 114 Iowa, 41, 86 N. W. 38; Traders' Ins. Co. v. Catlin, 163 Ill. 256, 45 L.R.A. 595, 45 N. E. 255.

The contrary view in Vance on Insurance, supra, is largely based upon Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Co's County, 151 U. S. 452, 38 L. ed. 231, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, but that case has no application here. There the policy contained a provision that it should become void if, without notice and permission, "mechanics are employed in building, altering, or repairing the premises." It was found that such building and repairing increased the risk, and though the work was completed before the fire occurred, and in nowise contributed to the fire, yet the alterations were very material, and were in existence at the time of the fire. In that case there was a forbidden physical alteration made, which continued down to the fire. In the present case there was simply a mortgage, in nowise affecting the physical condition of the property, and which was canceled of record within three days and before the fire.

There are many other cases which support those which we have already cited, that when such temporary encumbrance was removed before the fire, it did not invalidate the risk, as there was no mortgage outstanding at the time of the fire. In Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013, above cited, the court, summing up the authorities, says: "The common people who insure should not be entrapped by a harsh construction of a technical word. The insurance is revived by occupancy, though suspended during the vacancy." So much for the authorities in support of the position announced by this court. We are also very clear that this position is also more in consonance with justice and sound reasoning. . . . It would be a harsh and unjust rule to hold that a condition which in nowise contributed to the loss should work a forfeiture of the insurance. The principle of the old legal maxim, Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex, would seem to be applicable. . . . No maxim of construction of contracts is better established, or has been more generally approved, than that of Lord Coke, 'He who considers merely the letter of an instrument goes but skin deep into the meaning,' and too minute a stress should not be laid on the strict and precise signification of words, to the destruction of the intention of the parties and the spirit of the contract."

To this quotation of the court from Lord Coke the counsel for the plaintiff in this case adds this citation from St. Paul: "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." II. Cor. III. 6.

In Tompkins v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 22 App. Div. 380, 49 N. Y. Supp. 184, where the policy provided that it should be entirely void if the property became mortgaged, and where the property was mortgaged, but the mortgage was paid off before the loss, the New York court says: "The defendant contends that the policy was avoided by the giving of the first mortgage. The court below found, and we have held, that the second mortgage extinguished the first. Even if the policy would have been void and inoperative during the life of the first mortgage, it revived on the death of that mortgage. This principle is well settled in the analogous case of a marine policy, L.R.A.1915D.

which contains a limit of the waters within which the vessel is insured. If the vessel leaves the limited waters, and is lost, the insurer is not liable, but the liability re-attaches on the return of the vessel to the limits. Hennessey v. Manhattan F. Ins. Co. 28 Hun, 98. So here, although the policy was suspended during the existence of the first mortgage, it was revived when that mortgage ceased to exist by the substitution of the second mortgage."

In Hinckley v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 140 Mass. 38, 54 Am. Rep. 445, 1 N. E. 737, where the defense was that the insured property was temporarily put to an illegal use, contrary to the terms of the policy, the court, in construing the word "void," says: "But, irrespectively of this consideration, it is not the necessary meaning of the word 'void,' as used in policies of insurance, that it shall, under all circumstances, imply an absolute and permanent avoidance of a policy which has once begun to run. But the meaning of the word is sufficiently satisfied by reading it as void or inoperative for the time being."

It will be noted that this is the standard form of policy established by statute, and Phillips on Insurance, § 975, says: "After the policy has begun to run so the premium has become due, it assuredly is but equitable that a temporary noncompliance should have effect only during its continuance. To carry it further is to inflict a penalty on the assured and decree a gratuity to the insurer, who is thus permitted to retain the whole premium when he has merited but part of it."

Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Phoenix Assur. Co. 76 S. C. 76, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 736, 121 Am. St. Rep. 941, 56 S. E. 654, 11 Ann. Cas. 780, where the defense was that the hazard was increased contrary to the terms of the policy, which made it void, says: "The contract of insurance must, like other contracts, be enforced according to its terms. In construing such contracts, however, courts should endeavor to ascertain from the language used, in the light of the surrounding circumstances and the nature of the business, the safeguards which the parties intended to place around themselves. It may be reasonable to suppose an insurance company would desire to reserve the valuable right of canceling a policy, even on a temporary increase of hazard if known to it at the time, because such change might result in loss; but it is not reasonable to impute to it a purpose or desire to curtail its own revenue by canceling a policy on account of a temporary increase of hazard which has come to an end without loss, and from which it could not possibly suffer detriment. Hence, there may be ground for holding a temporary increase of hazard forbidden by the policy to avoid the insurance without action or even knowledge on the part of the company, when the loss resulted from that cause, but there is no ground for such a holding when the increase of hazard came to an end without loss. The greater weight of authority supports this conclusion."

The last line in the above quotation reiterates what is said above by Cooley, Phillips, May, and Elliott in their works on Insurance, and is a correct statement.

Silver v. London Assur. Corp. 61 Wash. 593, 112 Pac. 666, also sustains the proposition that the removal of the temporary breach of the condition revives the policy; also Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Pitts, 88 Miss. 587, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 627, 117 Am. St. Rep. 756, 41 So. 5, 9 Ann. Cas. 54.

In Nebraska, where a policy contained a provision making it void if the property should be mortgaged, it was held that the payment of the mortgage revived the policy. State Ins. Co. v. Schreck, 27 Neb. 527, 6 L.R.A. 524, 20 Am. St. Rep. 696, 43 N. W. 340; Omaha F. Ins. Co. v. Dierks, 43 Neb. 473, 61 N. W. 740; Johansen v. Home F. Ins. Co. 54 Neb. 548, 74 N. W. 866.

McClure v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. 242 Pa. 59, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1221, 88 Atl. 921, holds the same general principle as the authorities above cited. In that case the defense was that certain prohibited articles were kept upon the premises. The policy provided that it should be void if they were. The court held that, if they were removed before the fire, and in nowise contributed to the loss, the policy was revived.

Independent of the overwhelming weight of authority, there can be no reason to release the insurance company from liability for a loss which accrued after the forbidden mortgage was canceled, the mortgage having in nowise any connection with the loss. "For the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life."

The terms of a policy of insurance are construed against the insurer and in favor of the insured, and this is true although a standard form of policy has been adopted under legislative enactment. Gazam v. German Union F. Ins. Co. 155 N. C. 330, 71 S. E. 434, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 362.

The stipulation that the policy shall be void if the property "be or become encumbered by chattel mortgage" was inserted for the benefit of the insurer, upon the idea that, if the owner of the property was permitted to insure and then mortgage the property, it would be an inducement to him to destroy the property by fire, and if the L.R.A.1915D.

stipulation is given effect so that this purpose and intent of the parties can be carried out, there is no reason for extending it further. In other words, it was the intent of the parties to prevent an increase of the risk to the insurer, and this can be amply protected by holding that the policy is only void if the mortgage is in force at the time of the loss. Instead of increasing the risk, this interpretation of the contract decreases it, because while the mortgage is in existence there is no liability on the part of the insurance company, and if a loss then ensues there can be no recovery, and when the mortgage is canceled the insurer assumes no responsibility that it was not liable for when the policy was first issued. Nor is this construction against public policy, as offering an inducement to the insured to destroy his property, because, if destroyed while the mortgage is in force, the total loss falls on him.

See also Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Pitts, 88 Miss. 587, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 627, 117 Am. St. Rep. 756, 41 So. 5, 9 Ann. Cas. 54; Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Phoenix Assur. Co. 76 S. C. 76, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 737, 121 Am. St. Rep. 941, 56 S. E. 654, 11 Ann. Cas. 780, and cases cited.

Our cases on the subject, which are collected in Roper v. National F. Ins. Co. 161 N. C. 151, 76 S. E. 869, were decided correctly, because in them the stipulation was violated at the time of loss, and it was properly decided that the policy was void.

Nor is this construction in conflict with the cases of Fishplate v. Fidelity & C. Co. 140 N. C. 589, 53 S. E. 354; Bryant v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 147 N. C. 181, 60 S. E. 983; Alexander v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 150 N. C. 536, 64 S. E. 432; Gardner v. North State Mut. L. Ins. Co. 163 N. C. 367, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 714, 79 S. E. 806; and Schas v. Equitable L. Ins. Co. 166 N. C. 55, 81 S. E. 1014, where a representation actually false and material was held to vitiate the policy, although the misrepresented fact may not have contributed to the loss, for the insurance company is entitled to know the facts about which inquiry is made in order to decide whether it will enter into the contract or not, and those things are material for it to know which would naturally affect its judgment or decision as to making the contract, or which, by its inquiries, it has made material; the company being the judge of what it should know in order to determine whether or not it will issue the policy.

The demurrer should have been overruled. Reversed.

Mortgage — usury — right of purchaser.

1. Where property is sold on the foreclosure of a usurious mortgage, one who purchases at the foreclosure sale and pays his money without notice of the usurious character of the mortgage is protected as a bona fide purchaser of the property; and the same is true where, after the foreclosure

Headnotes by BRUCE, J.

Note. — Usury in mortgage as affecting rights of purchaser or redemptioners under foreclosure.

It has been held that foreclosure under a power of sale given in the mortgage cuts off the right of the mortgagor to raise the question of usury, especially where the sale had the judicial sanction of a court of last resort in the state where the land was situated. Edgell v. Ham, 35 C. C. A. 584, 93 Fed. 759.

A bill by the mortgagor after a foreclosure of the mortgage and sale of the land, and the issuing of a defective deed to the purchaser thereof, which ignores the sale, and treats the mortgage in all respects as if no attempt at foreclosure had been made, and which asks for a redemption and the cancellation of a mortgage, alleging usury and full payment, was dismissed in Welsh v. Coley, 82 Ala. 363, 2 So. 733, where the bill was not filed until the amount due the mortgagee on the mortgage, according to its face, was paid by the purchaser. It is stated that by waiting until after the purchaser had paid the full sum shown in the note and mortgage to be due, the mortgagor lost all right to claim usury.

In Perkins v. Conant, 29 Ill. 184, 81 Am. Dec. 305, the mortgagee had exercised the power of sale by having the land bid off by an agent, conveying it to the agent, and then receiving from the agent a reconveyance of the premises to himself. The action was one to recover the usurious interest from the mortgagee. A recovery was denied on the theory that usurious interest that is paid cannot be recovered. It is stated that when the usurious interest was collected, through the foreclosure, it was by virtue of authority emanating directly from the mortgagor to make the sale for the purpose; and this sale having been made by authority from himself, it must be regarded as made with his assent and as his own voluntary act, as though he had made the sale in person and then paid the money.

This case was approved in Tyler v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 108 Ill. 58, and L.R.A.1915D.

sale and before the expiration of the time of redemption, a person buys the interest or estate of the mortgagee, who bids in the property at the sale.

Same — foreclosure — payment of taxes — redemptioner.

2. The sheriff or other person who conducts the sale on the foreclosure of a mortgage is the agent of the purchaser or holder of the certificate or of a subsequent lienor who has redeemed or obtained an assignment of such certificate from him, to receive the redemption money only, but as such agent has no authority to waive the payment of any part thereof; and, where a prior redemptioner or purchaser has paid taxes since the foreclosure of the mortgage, such redemptioner, in case of an attempted redemption from him, is entitled to the payment, not merely of the principal debt, but a second lien holder held not entitled to urge usury in the debt of a first lien holder who had become a purchaser at a sale held under the trust deed securing his debt.

In Chapin v. Billings, 91 Ill. 539, one of the holders of a note secured by trust deed purchased the land upon a sale by the trustees. In an action by such purchaser in forcible entry and detainer to obtain possession of the land against the maker of the trust deed, there was held to be no right to raise the question of usury. It is stated that in forcible entry and detainer the title cannot be questioned; that the defense of usury sought to be interposed is one which must be interposed in equity if at all.

The majority of cases in which this question is discussed proceed upon the theory that a sale of the mortgaged premises by virtue of a power contained in the mortgage does not necessarily preclude the mortgagor from raising the question of usury.

It has been expressly held that the foreclosure of a usurious mortgage by sale under the power does not prevent the granting of relief. Exley v. Berryhill, 37 Minn. 182, 33 N. W. 567.

The question, in the cases which proceed upon the theory that the mortgagor may show usury after a sale, resolves itself, so far as the present note is concerned, into one of determining the purchasers against whom it may be shown.

Under a statute making the usurious contract and all securities given therefor absolutely void, one not a bona fide purchaser occupies no better position than the mortgagee.

Accordingly it is held that the assignee of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale made under a power contained in a usurious mortgage, who does not show that either he or his assignor was a bona fide purchaser, cannot maintain an action to restrain the mortgagor from committing waste upon the mortgaged premises during the time allowed for redemption. Jordan v. Humphrey, 31 Minn. 495, 18 N. W. 450. It is stated by the court that it was not sufficient that the purchaser or his assignee did not appear of the taxes also; and the issuance of a certificate by the sheriff without such payment and without the knowledge of and ratification by the said prior redemptioner will not be binding upon him.

Same — notice of redemption — recording.

3. Chapter 127 of the Laws of 1907 amends § 142, Rev. Codes 1905, and provides that notices of redemption shall be recorded with the register of deeds, rather than filed; and such act is not unconstitutional, though applied to mortgages which were executed before its enactment. The requirement that such notice shall be recorded rather than filed in no way impairs the obligation of the contract of the mortgagor, or deprives him of property without due process of law.

to have had notice of the circumstances of the loan, or the usurious character of the transaction; it should have appeared also that a valuable consideration was in fact paid upon the purchase or assignment.

A bona fide purchaser of the note and mortgage before maturity, who afterwards received notice of the usury, and subsequently sold the property under the power contained in the mortgage, and became the purchaser, is not a bona fide purchaser as against the mortgagor, and therefore the mortgagor may take advantage of the usury and have the transaction declared void. Scott v. Austin, 36 Minn. 460, 32 N. W. 89, 864.

The original mortgagee, who had purchased through a trustee at the sale held under his mortgage, was held affected by usury in the debt secured by the mortgage, and the mortgagor entitled to recover the land in ejectment. Jackson ex dem. Sternberg v. Dominick, 14 Johns. 435. It is stated that the mortgage here forms a part of the purchaser's title, and he, being fully apprised that the mortgage was void in law, stands in no better situation than if no foreclosure had taken place.

It is the theory of some cases, under a statute making a trust deed given to secure a usurious debt void, at least, at the option of the maker, that a power of sale contained in such trust deed is void also, and the purchasers from the trustees under the trust deed can acquire no legal title which will sustain an ejectment by them against the maker of the trust deed. Pottle v. Lowe, 99 Ga. 576, 59 Am. St. Rep. 246, 27 S. E. 145. It is stated that the purchaser under the trust deed did not evoke any application of the doctrine of estoppel against the maker of the trust deed, nor did he by evidence attempt to show that he purchased in ignorance of the usury, and therefore occupied the position of innocent purchaser, entitled to protection by virtue of such doctrine.

Under this theory, even bona fide purchasers are not protected.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Pierce County in plaintiffs' favor in an action to determine adverse claims to certain real estate which defendants claim under certain mortgages, foreclosures, and mechanics' liens. Reversed.

Statement by Bruce, J.:

This is an action to determine adverse claims to real estate, the complaint being in the statutory form. The appellant and defendant asserts the following claims: (1) A sheriff's deed issued to it as a purchaser and redemptioner from the Berwick State Bank on the foreclosure by such bank of a prior mortgage, and on which foreclosure the bank was the purchaser; (2) two mortgages of $1,400 and $50 and a mechanics' lien on which a foreclosure is asked in case

Radford, — Ga. —, 82 S. E. 442, appears. In this it is stated that the grantee in a security deed tainted with usury cannot, as against the maker thereof, convey a good title even to a person who takes bona fide before maturity, for value, and without notice of the fact of usury. It is further stated that the mere fact of making the deed did not estop the grantor from asserting its invalidity as against one who purchased it at a sale made in accordance with the power contained in the deed, but the conduct of the maker of the deed in connection with the deed itself may be such as to work an estoppel.

Under a statute making void a usurious contract and any securities given therefore, a deed of trust given to a trustee to secure the payment of a mortgage debt is void, and no subsequent act of the trustee, such as a foreclosure and sale under the power given in the trust deed, can render it valid; and therefore a purchaser under such a sale obtains no right to be relieved from the effect of usury. Den ex dem. Shober v. Hauser, 20 N. C. 222 (4 Dev. & B. L. 91). And this is true even as to a purchaser without notice of the usury. Ibid.

But usury has been held not available against a bona fide purchaser.

Thus, a bona fide purchaser from the mortgagee, who purchased at his foreclosure sale, is protected against any claim of usury in the note secured by the foreclosed mortgage after the time for redemption has expired. Holmes v. State Bank, 53 Minn. 350, 55 N. W. 555. It is stated that after the sale and during the time for redemption the purchaser had a conveyable interest in the land, that it was this interest in the land, and not the note and mortgage, which the purchaser from him bought. The statute under which this case was decided is not set out. In Jordan v. Humphrey, supra, the court, after referring to the rule that usury is not available against a bona fide purchaser where the debtor suffers the property to be regularly sold, states that this rule may be supported the sheriff's deed is held invalid. The plaintiffs seek to avoid the sheriff's deed by proof of a certificate of redemption theretofore issued to them. This certificate the defendant in turn seeks to avoid by proof that it is wrongfully issued without the payment of certain taxes and liens which were necessary to the redemption, and by proof of its subsequent receipt of the sheriff's deed. Plaintiffs further contend that the mortgage was usurious on the foreclosure of which the sheriff's deed was issued. The trial court found the issues for the plaintiffs and entered judgment quieting the title to the real estate in them. From this judgment the defendant has appealed and has asked for a trial de novo.

upon the principle of equitable estoppel as well as upon grounds of public policy.

A purchaser of the mortgage who subsequently sells the mortgaged premises by virtue of a power contained in the mortgage, and thereafter purchases from the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, and receives a conveyance therefor, is protected against the claim of usury in the original debt. Jackson ex dem. Bartlett v. Henry, 10 Johns. 185, 6 Am. Dec. 328. The statute providing for the method of selling mortgaged property under a power of sale contained in the mortgage provided for a notice, and this notice is stated by the court to be intended for the mortgagor as well as for the world; that he has an opportunity to apply to chancery if he wishes to arrest the sale on the ground of usury, and if he stands by and suffers the sale to go on and an innocent party to purchase unconscious of the latent defect, and without any means of knowing it, the purchaser has the preferable claim in equity to protection.

The statute under which Jackson ex dem. Bartlett v. Henry was decided declared that a sale had as provided by statute "shall not be defeated to the prejudice of any bona fide purchaser thereof in favor or for the benefit of any person claiming the equity of redemption."

A bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice of the usurious character of the debt secured by the mortgage at the foreclosure of which he purchased is not affected by the usury. McNeill v. Riddle, 66 N. C. 290. The statute under which this decision was rendered is not set out in the opinion, but the court, after referring to the decision in Den ex dem. Shober v. Hauser, supra, states that after the decision in the earlier case a statute changed the law as to purchasers without notice.

Although no regular foreclosure of the mortgage be shown, yet the assignee of a mortgagee, being in possession, being shown to be a bona fide purchaser, cannot be affected by usury in the original transaction. L.R.A.1915D.

Messrs. J. A. Hosp, George A. Bangs, and George R. Robbins, for appellants:

In Elliott v. Wood, 53 Barb. 285, a second mortgagee, who had purchased under his foreclosure sale, and who subsequently, upon the foreclosure of the first mortgage, became the purchaser upon that sale also, without notice of the usurious character of the first loan, was held not to be affected by the usury in such loan.

But if the purchaser at the foreclosure sale has notice of the usury, a bona fide purchaser from him thereafter is not protected against the setting up of usury by the mortgagor, under a statute providing that "every sale, pursuant to a power as aforesaid, and conducted as herein prescribed, made to a purchaser in good faith, shall be equivalent to a foreclosure and sale under the decree of a court of equity so far only as to be an entire bar of all claim or equity of redemption of the mortgagor, his heirs and representatives, and of all persons claiming under him or them, by virtue of any title subsequent to such mortgage." Hyland v. Stafford, 10 Barb. 558. The action here was one of trespass by the original owner of the land, who was still in possession, and under the rule he was entitled to recover unless the purchaser showed a legal title in himself sufficient to support an action of ejectment at his suit. But see Holmes v. State Bank, 53 Minn. 350, 55 N. W. 555, and Chapin v. Billings, 91 Ill. 539, supra.

A purchaser at a foreclosure sale without notice of the usurious character of the loan secured by the mortgage being foreclosed is an innocent purchaser, and acquires rights superior to a vendor of the mortgagor, who claims a vendor's lien upon the mortgaged premises, especially where the vendor at the time of the foreclosure sale not only made no objection to the sale, but stated to the purchaser and others that he had no claim upon the land. Hoots v. Williams, 116 Ala. 372, 22 So. 497.

Mr. Paul Campbell for respondents.

Bruce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is difficult for us to see how the usurious character of the mortgage can be urged by the plaintiffs in this action. The Minneapolis Threshing Machine Company had nothing to do with its making, nor with its foreclosure. The usurious nature of the transaction was a matter which should have been litigated at the time of the foreclosure. If sought to be foreclosed by advertisement, the mortgagors (the plaintiffs herein) could have enjoined such foreclosure and compelled an action in which they could have interposed the defense. If foreclosed by action in the first place, they could also have made use of the defense. This was not done. It was not until after the mortgage was foreclosed and the sheriff's certificate of sale issued to the Berwick State Bank on November 30, 1907, and the redemption had been made by the defendant threshing machine company, the lienor and the holder of the third mortgage, and a certificate of redemption issued to it, that the question was ever raised. There is no proof, even, that at the time of its redemption the defendant had any knowledge of the usurious nature of the transaction, if usurious it was. It is true that counsel for respondents denies this fact and refers us to the record to corroborate his statement. All there is in the record, however, is the statement by Henry Heitsch that at the time of buying the threshing rig he had a talk with Mr. Wiff about the $400 mortgage and the $80 mortgage. Nothing is disclosed as to what that conversation was, and no reference whatever is made to the alleged usurious nature of the mortgage in question. The usurious nature of the transaction, then, is a matter which should have been litigated at the time of the foreclosure of the mortgage, and the matter cannot now be adjudicated. It seems, indeed, to be the established law that "where property is sold on a usurious mortgage, one who purchases at the foreclosure sale, and pays his money, without any notice of the usurious character of the mortgage, is protected as a bona fide purchaser of the property; and the same is true where, after the foreclosure sale, and before the expiration of the time of redemption, a person buys the interest or estate of the mortgagee, who bid in the property at such sale." Holmes v. State Bank, 53 Minn. 350, 55 N. W. 555; McNeill v. Riddle, 66 N. C. 290.

There seems to be no question as to the regularity of these foreclosure proceedings, nor that the plaintiffs were properly served and had notice thereof. The presumption is that they had notice. Bailey v. Hendrickson, 25 N. D. 500, 143 N. W. 134.

Even if not a subsequent lienor and entitled to redeem as such, the defendant was at any rate an assignee for value of the sheriff's certificate. On no theory of agency can the sheriff be said to have been authorized to waive the payment of the taxes or to postpone the payment of the same. We held, in the case of North Dakota Horse & Cattle Co. v. Serumgard, 17 N. D. 466, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 508, 138 Am. St. Rep. 717, 117 N. W. 453, that "the sheriff or other person who conducts the sale on foreclosure by advertisement is the agent of the purchaser or holder of the certificate to receive redemption money, but is not such an agent as can bind his principal to accept a check, instead of money, from one qualified to redeem, or to retain the money received by such agent from one not a lawful redemptioner."

From this analogy it is perfectly clear that the sheriff in this case, if an agent of the Minneapolis Threshing Machine Company at all, was an agent with limited authority merely, and was only authorized to receive the redemption money and to issue the certificate, provided that the redemption was made in compliance with the statute, and that the amount paid covered the taxes as well as the principal debt. It is well established that an agent to collect has no authority to accept less than the principal debt, nor to compromise the claim, or to allow any extensions thereon. See North Dakota Horse & Cattle Co. v. Serumgard, supra. These facts the Heitsches were bound to know, as the right and form of redemption is strictly limited and defined by statute. They must have known that the sheriff was a statutory agent who exercised a limited authority. It is well established that a principal is not bound by the unauthorized acts of an agent which are not ratified by him, and where the lack of authority is known or should be known to the third party. The issuance of the certificate in this case was therefore in no way binding upon the defendant and appellant.

There is clearly no merit in respondents' contention that they were and should be excused from tendering the taxes and interest due because the notice of the payment and lien was not filed with the register of deeds, as required by § 7142, Rev. Codes 1905 (§ 7756, Compiled Laws of 1913), which provides that "written notice of redemption must be given to the sheriff and a duplicate filed with the register of deeds of the county, and if any taxes or assessments are paid by the redemptioner, or if he has or acquires any lien other than that upon which the redemption was made, notice thereof must in like manner be given to the sheriff and filed with the register of deeds; and if such notice is not filed, the property may be redeemed without paying such tax, assessment, or lien."

The evidence shows that the notices were duly and seasonably recorded. This we believe was sufficient. The notices were recorded in February, 1908. In 1907, the legislature specifically enacted that such notices should be recorded rather than filed. See chapter 127, Laws of 1907. The act of 1907 was in force at the time of the attempted redemption in this case and was applicable thereto. It repealed all acts and parts of acts in conflict with its provisions, and in this way amended § 7142, Rev. Codes 1905, and changed the remedy of the redemptioner, the appellant herein. The amended statute in no way impaired the obligation of the contract of the mortgagor, or deprived him of property without due process of law. No person has a vested interest in any particular remedy, the exercise of which does not deprive him of any substantial right. To require a notice by a redemptioner or purchaser of taxes and interest paid to be recorded, and not merely filed, can hardly be said to be the deprivation of a substantial right, or an impairment of the obligation of its contract. Craig v. Herzman, 9 N. D. 140, 144, 81 N. W. 288; Orvik v. Casselman, 15 N. D. 34, 105 N. W. 1105; Scott v. District Ct. 15 N. D. 259, 107 N. W. 61; Jack v. Cold, 114 Iowa, 349, 86 N. W. 374; Strand v. Griffith, 63 Wash. 334, 115 Pac. 512; State ex rel. National Bond & Secur. Co. v. Krahmer, 105 Minn. 422, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 157, 117 N. W. 780; Webb v. Lewis, 45 Minn. 285, 47 N. W. 803; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Neeves, 46 Wis. 147, 49 N. W. 832; Tuolumne Redemption Co. v. Sedgwick, 15 Cal. 515.

Nor can it be claimed that the plaintiffs were misled in the case before us. On November 29, 1908, Mrs. Heitsch signed and delivered to her husband to take to Towner a redemption notice which, among other things, stated that she was redeeming from the redemption of the appellants, and in which she recopied the notice of appellant which contained the following words: "Together with all taxes and assessments . . . as set forth in certain affidavits and notices L.R.A.1915D.

served upon you by the redemptioner of said property, the Minneapolis Threshing Machine Company, and filed in the office of the register of deeds of McHenry county, North Dakota, on the 24th day of February, 1908, which said notice was recorded in Book 198 of Mortgages at page 459 thereof."

It is perfectly clear, also, that her husband, Henry Heitsch, who acted as her agent in the proposed redemption, was fully aware of the taxes and of the lien thereof, and this, if not before the receipt of the certificate, at any rate on the day thereof and before he left Towner. Campbell, his lawyer, testified: "I personally wrote on the back of exhibit 45 (Anna Heitsch's notice of redemption) the words appearing there in pencil: 'Pay no more than due on sale $111.02 and 12 per cent interest and taxes and assessments. Pay no other liens or mortgages'—and called Heitsch's attention to this notation and told him to show it to the sheriff."

Heitsch testifies that he not only showed the notation to the sheriff, but "told him about the taxes. . . . Sometimes he (the sheriff) said it would be all right to pay the taxes afterwards, and sometimes he said maybe it ought to be paid then; he and the lawyers up there didn't seem to know. The sheriff said he didn't have anything to do with them. . . . I had talked about taxes before I went to get that money in the morning. The sheriff said he didn't have nothing to do with the taxes that he knew of; he said all that he had anything to do with was the $125.35 and $1 was his and I went to the bank and drew this money. . . . Mr. Campbell told me to pay the sheriff what he asked on the foreclosure and also wrote it down so I wouldn't forget, and taxes and interest, and no more. . . . I and the sheriff from around shortly after 9 o'clock until 2 o'clock that day were getting copies of the papers and going to see lawyers and seeing about the taxes. . . . Mr. Javnager told me that he thought it was necessary to pay the taxes at that time, and then at times he told me it was all right if I paid them afterwards. I believe he told me that the Minneapolis Threshing Machine Company had paid some taxes. He told me he had nothing to do with it; that the land was safe, and I could pay this afterwards. I went to see Mr. Christianson about the taxes. Mr. Christianson did not tell me that it wouldn't be a redemption unless I paid the taxes, not in those words. He told me it would be all right if I paid them afterwards. . . . I remember phoning to Mr. Campbell, I think it was in the forenoon some time. At the time I talked with Mr. Campbell, I did not have the certificate of redemption. I wouldn't be certain that I said that I had the certificate at the time I phoned to Mr. Campbell. I think Campbell told me that, if the sheriff wanted that money, it was all right, or something to that effect; that the taxes or anything could be sent to them later on."

We cannot, indeed, read the whole testimony without being thoroughly convinced that the version of the sheriff is the correct one, that the Heitsches knew of the taxes and merely failed to pay the same because they were short of funds, and that, after arguing with Heitsch for half a day and giving him a chance to consult lawyers, he grew tired of the controversy and issued the certificate. It is quite noticeable, indeed, that though Mr. Christianson and Mr. Donnelly were both admittedly consulted by Mr. Heitsch while at Towner, neither Mr. Christianson nor Mr. Donnelly were called as witnesses by the plaintiffs, and, though Mr. Donnelly was called by the defendant, the plaintiff objected, on the ground of professional connections, to all evidence of the advice given. Mr. Donnelly, however, did testify that the sheriff told him over the phone that "there was not enough money to pay the amount required and the taxes."

The question then is simply this: Can a sheriff bind a prior redemptioner or purchaser on a foreclosure sale by a certificate of redemption which he issues without authority from the purchaser or prior redemptioner, and without having first received the full sum which is required to be paid, and where both he and the last would-be redemptioner know of the shortage? And when such is done, may the last redemptioner compel the purchaser or prior redemptioner to accept the balance after the time for redemption has expired? We think not.

In view of our conclusion that the respondents failed to redeem from the foreclosure of the mortgage to the Berwick State Bank, and that the title to such land vested in the defendant Minneapolis Threshing Machine Company on the failure to so redeem, and the fact that the said defendant has only asked for a foreclosure of its other liens and for a deficiency judgment in case the first relief prayed for is not granted and the land quieted in it, it is unnecessary to pass upon the validity of the other liens which are herein asserted.

The judgment of the District Court will be reversed, and judgment entered confirming and quieting the title of the said Minneapolis Threshing Machine Company in and to the lands described in the plaintiffs' complaint herein, and awarding to said defendant the costs of the action. Plaintiffs and respondents will also pay the costs and disbursements of this appeal.

JONAS B. LEHMANN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PEOPLE'S FURNITURE COMPANY.

(42 Okla. 761, 142 Pac. 986.)

Sale — cash — waiver of failure.

Where a contract of sale provides for cash on delivery, and the goods are delivered, but the purchaser fails to pay, and the seller does not promptly reclaim the goods, but endeavors for six months to collect the account and fails to show at the trial that such delay in reclaiming the goods was caused by some trick or artifice on the part of the buyer, held, that the title to the property passed to the buyer upon the seller's failure to promptly rescind, and the court erred in not peremptorily instructing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

(August 25, 1914.)

Headnote by RITTENHOUSE, C.

Note. — Delay in attempting to regain property obtained under agreement to pay therefor on delivery as waiver of that condition.

This question is covered in the notes to Frech v. Lewis, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 948, and People's State Bank v. Brown, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 824, and the present note is merely supplementary to these.

Generally as to right of purchasers of, or creditors levying on, goods sold for cash, but delivered without payment, see notes to McIver v. Williamson-Halsell-Frazier Co. 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 696, Johnson v. Iankovetz, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 709; and Kemper Grain Co. v. Harbour, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 173.

As stated in the note in 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 948, the determination of the question under consideration depends largely upon the facts and circumstances of each case. The vendor, in order to prevent a waiver of the condition of cash payment, is required to act within a reasonable time in regaining possession of his property.

In the following cases the facts were held to be such as to show a waiver by the vendor of a condition for payment on delivery:

—where the vendor delayed for forty-five days to reclaim property sold for cash. L. C. Smith & Bros. Typewriter Co. v. Luebke-man, 147 Wis. 317, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 396, 133 N. W. 33;

—where the goods were delivered and no demand for a note which the vendee had agreed to give at the time of delivery was made for about two months, when the vendor took the word of the vendee, who was sick, that he would give a note as soon as he was able to write. Hennequin v. Sands, 25 Wend. 639;

—where the property was delivered without payment and allowed to remain in the vendee's possession for five months, during which time the seller repeatedly attempted ERROR to the County Court for Creek County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover certain furniture sold by plaintiffs to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Rittenhouse, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action in replevin brought by the defendants in error, plaintiffs below, to recover possession of certain furniture sold to Jonas B. Lehmann, wherein it is alleged that plaintiffs were the absolute owners and entitled to the immediate possession thereof. The proof discloses that at the time of the transaction the plaintiffs conducted a furniture store in Sapulpa, Oklahoma, and that the defendant was engaged in the jewelry business in the same city; that defendant called upon the plaintiffs, at their place of business, and was quoted prices on furniture which he purchased, and which was delivered in three instalments as follows: December 27, 1910; January 12, 1911; and January 24, 1911. The contention of plaintiffs is that the sale

C. C. A. 429, 185 Fed. 373, modifying 179 Fed. 151;

—where delivery was made without anything being said as to payment, and some twenty odd days elapsed between the delivery of the goods and the assignment of the vendee for the benefit of creditors, but no demand for payment was made until fifteen days after the assignment. Hirsch Lumber Co. v. Hubbell, 143 App. Div. 317, 128 N. Y. Supp. 85.

And in Maley-Thompson & M. Co. v. Thomas Forman Co. 179 Mich. 548, 146 N. W. 95, it was held that the vendor of lumber, "settlement in ten days by cash less 2 per cent of 60-day acceptance," did not act within a reasonable time to reclaim the lumber, and had no right to recover it as against one to whom it had been sold by the vendee, where he declined to take possession of the property when the vendee claimed that it was not up to the grade agreed upon, and for two or three months sought to induce the purchaser to pay. The court in this case quoted at length and with approval from Frech v. Lewis, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 948, to which the original note was appended.

And the title to a threshing machine was held in Van Duzor v. Allen, 90 Ill. 499, to pass in favor of bona fide creditors of the vendee who levied execution thereon, although there was an agreement to give notes for the purchase price, where the vendee, by virtue of an order of the vendor, took of this furniture was conditioned upon the payment of cash on delivery, and, owing to the failure of defendant to pay on delivery, the sale did not become effective and title did not pass to the defendant. It is admitted by plaintiffs that no cash was paid on delivery; that a statement of their account was sent to the defendant on February 1, 1911, and defendant paid $54.10; that the account was presented for payment on the first of each succeeding month until June 17, 1911, when this action was brought; that on May 1, 1911, they proposed to Lehmann that if he would turn over a diamond ring for the balance due, they would accept that in payment of the account; this Lehmann agreed to do, but Lehmann could not make delivery at once, as the rings were out of the store. There was no material conflict in the evidence. Defendant requested the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in his favor, which was refused, and this holding of the court is assigned as error.

The general doctrine is that where the contract of sale provides for cash on delivery, and the goods are delivered, but the purchaser fails to pay, the title to the property does not pass with the possession, unless it is the intention of the seller that such title pass, or payment is waived.

possession of the machine without giving the notes, and used it for over two months, during which time the vendor took no steps to recover it.

But it has been held that a seller of property for cash is not estopped from claiming it as against one who took a mortgage covering the property with knowledge that it had not been paid for and of the seller's claim, where directly after the delivery the seller's collector called for payment, but was unable to find the person who had made the purchase, and the property was allowed to remain in the purchaser's possession for some time before the seller sought to recover it. Skinner & K. Stationery Co. v. Lanmert Furniture Co. 182 Mo. App. 549, 166 S. W. 1079.

And it has been held that, in view of the nature of the goods and circumstances, there was no waiver of the condition to pay cash for carpets, curtains, and cornices on delivery, where the purchaser, in response to a demand for payment by the seller's employee after the articles had been installed, stated that he would go to the sellers' store that afternoon and pay for the goods, but failed to do so, and the seller waited a fortnight or more after the carpets were laid and the curtains hung before attempting to reclaim the goods, but in the meanwhile attempted to find the purchaser and obtain payment. Goldsmith v. Bryant, 26 Wis. 34.

And it has been held that a condition that a note be given at the date of delivery was not waived because the vendor waited

Frech v. Lewis, 218 Pa. 141, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 948, 120 Am. St. Rep. 864, 67 Atl. 45, 11 Ann. Cas. 545; Tiedeman, Sales, § 217. If the purchaser refuses to pay on delivery, the law gives the seller the right to reclaim his goods, and the only excuse for not promptly reclaiming the goods is that the defendant had practised some trick or artifice upon the seller which caused him to delay in reclaiming the same. The conditions under which the plaintiffs in this action delayed for six months to reclaim possession of the goods were as follows: The goods were delivered in three instalments; no request was made for the cash payment until February 1, 1911, when a statement of the account was sent to the defendant, and he paid $54.10. Nothing more was said until the first of the following month, when a statement of the balance due was sent to the defendant, and on the first of each succeeding month until June, 1911, like statements were presented to the defendant, and he continuously made promise to pay in the future. In May, 1911, the plaintiff submitted a proposition to accept a diamond ring in settlement of the account, which was accepted by the defendant, but a subsequent controversy arose, and a delivery of the ring was never made. During the six months which intervened between a few days after delivery for the note until the return of a particular person who had charge of the matter for the purchaser, where he would not have waited at all if anything had occurred to suggest a disposition to withhold the note absolutely; and a recovery of the property was accordingly allowed from a company which had taken over the purchaser's business. Adams v. Roscoe Lumber Co. 2 App. Div. 47, 37 N. Y. Supp. 265, affirmed in 159 N. Y. 170, 53 N. E. 805.

In Allen Lumber Co. v. Higuera, 86 Vt. 453, 85 Atl. 979, it was held that it could not be said as a matter of law that there was an actual consent to give credit, or that the seller's conduct was such that the intent necessary to a waiver of the condition for cash payment must be attributed to it, where it appeared that lumber was sold to a builder, under an agreement that it was to be paid for on delivery, but the vendee failed to pay at that time, and in a few days the person who made the sale called and requested payment, but the purchaser said that his boy was not there and that he would send the money as soon as he came, but failed to do so, and, when the seller again called, the purchaser objected that part of the order had not been filled, and, after this shortage was made good, the seller stated that he must have the money or the lumber, and a few days later repeated this statement, but the purchaser did not pay and used the lumber.

J. T. W.

the date of sale and June 17, 1911, the day this suit was instituted, no demand was made for the possession of the goods. Under these circumstances, the seller waived the condition of the cash payment, and voluntarily accepted defendant as a debtor, treating him from the day of sale to the time of the institution of this action as a debtor, attempting on the first of each month to collect the debt, and never mentioning their claim of ownership until they had endeavored for six months to make the collection by a cash payment or delivery of the diamond ring, without any showing that they had been delayed by trick or artifice being practised by the defendant to cause the seller to delay in reclaiming the goods.

There was no express reservation of title in the contract, merely a sale for cash. A voluntary delivery without payment, coupled with an inexcusable delay on the part of the seller in reclaiming the goods sold, would constitute in law a waiver of the conditions of such sale. Upton v. Sturbridge Cotton Mills, 111 Mass. 446; Bowen v. Burk, 13 Pa. 146; Freeman v. Nichols, 116 Mass. 309; Freeport Stone Co. v. Carey, 42 W. Va. 276, 26 S. E. 183. The question as to whether the plaintiffs had waived their right to reclaim the goods was submitted to the jury, and the plaintiffs now claim that inasmuch as the jury found they had not waived this right, such finding was conclusive. The facts are not disputed; the evidence offered by the plaintiffs conclusively established that they had waived the conditions of the sale by a failure to promptly rescind, and, in the absence of evidence tending to show that fraud or artifice in some form was used by the defendant to cause them to delay in reclaiming the goods and thereby take the case out of the general rule, the plaintiffs failed to make out a prima facie case, and the court should have given the peremptory instruction requested.

The cause should therefore be reversed.

UNION ACCIDENT COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

MARY WILLIS, By Guardian.

(— Okla. —, 145 Pac. 812.)

Insurance — exception — burden of proof.

1. Where, in an action on a policy of Headnotes by SHARP, C.

accident insurance, it is claimed that death was due to one of the causes excepted from the operation of the policy, it is for the insurer to plead and prove such fact.

Same — intentional injury — unexpected result.

2. A policy of insurance which provides that indemnity shall not be payable for injuries, fatal or otherwise, intentionally inflicted upon the insured by himself or some other person, does not exclude a recovery where the insured dies from a fracture of the skull caused by a fall on a hard pavement, the result of a blow in the face struck by the fist of another, where the blow but not the fatal result was intentionally inflicted.

Same — construction of policy.

3. The death of the insured not having been intended by his assailant, and being an unforeseen and unusual result of the blow struck, the insurer is not relieved of liability on account of the fact that the blow itself was intentionally inflicted. The words, "intentionally inflicted," as used in the policy, should be construed to refer to the fatal injuries resulting from the fall, and not to the blow.

Same — favoring insured.

4. If a policy is so drawn as to require interpretation, and to be fairly susceptible of two different constructions, the one will be adopted that is most favorable to the insured.

ERROR to the Superior Court of Muskogee County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Baker, Pursel, Gavin, & Leith and C. A. Mountjoy for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Arnote & Rogers and Charles A. Cook, for defendant in error:

Death of insured was caused by accidental means within the terms of the policy.

Sharp, C., filed the following opinion:

Between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock on the evening of December 10, 1909, the insured, Riley W. Willis, while walking along the street in the city of Ardmore, was knocked down by a blow in the face struck by one Ernest Keys. Striking the pavement, the insured sustained a fracture of the skull, resulting in his death. The action against the defendant is brought by the guardian of the beneficiary, and is to recover on a certain accident policy issued on the life of said Riley W. Willis.

The defense in this court is predicated upon two certain provisions of the policy, which, it is claimed, exempt it from any liability, namely:

(1) "In the event that the insured, while this policy is in force, shall sustain personal bodily injury, which is effected directly and independently from all other causes through external, violent, and purely accidental means, and which injury causes, at once (within twenty-four hours). . . . For loss of life $400 (the principal sum of this policy)."

(2) "Indemnity shall not be payable for injuries, fatal or otherwise, intentionally inflicted upon the insured by himself or some other person."

We fail to find, however, that the former provision of the policy was availed of by the insurer as a defense in the trial court. It is a rule well supported by authority, and based upon sound principle, that, where death or injury has resulted from one of the excepted causes enumerated in the policy, the onus both of averment and proof in such regard rests upon the insurer. Vernon v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Assn. 158 Iowa, 597, 138 N. W. 696; Anthony v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Assn. 162 Mass. 354, 26 L.R.A. 406, 44 Am. St. Rep. 367, 38 N. E. 973; Railway Officials' & E. Acci. Assn. v. Drummond, 56 Neb. 235, 76 N. W. 562; Stevens v. Continental Casualty Co. 12 N. D. 463, 97 N. W. 862; Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Jones, 94 Ala. 434, 10 So. 530; Cronkhite v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 75 Wis. 116, 17 Am. St. Rep. 184, 43 N. W. 731; Home Ben. Assn. v. Sargent, 142 U. S. 691, 35 L. ed. 1160, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332; Fuller, Acci. & Employer's Liability Ins. pp. 100-102. Further consideration need not, therefore, be given this defense.

In the absence of any provision to the contrary in a policy insuring against death effected through "external, violent, and accidental means," an injury inflicted intentionally by another upon the insured, but without the foreknowledge or connivance of the insured, is within the terms of the policy rendering the company liable. If the injury is not brought about by the agency of the insured, and if it is not anticipated by him, it is none the less accidental as far as he is concerned, although it may be inflicted with malice and premeditation by the other party; the great weight of authority being that an injury intentionally inflicted upon the insured by another is accidental, if it is unintentional on the part of the insured. As a protection against this class of liability, a clause is frequently inserted in policies of accident insurance, specifying that the policy shall not cover injuries, fatal or otherwise, intentionally inflicted upon the insured by himself or some other person. Ordinarily, where a policy expressly so provides, it is not necessary that the insured should take part in the intent of such third person, in order to make the exception operative, and relieve the company from its liability. The policy, in such cases, becomes one of limited indemnity as contradistinguished from that of general indemnity. It is shown that the blow sustained by the insured was intentionally inflicted. The testimony as to the origin of the trouble between Keys and the insured is conflicting. That of plaintiff tends to show that the insured was sober and was not the aggressor in the difficulty; while the defendant's testimony tends to establish that the insured was drunk at the time, ran into Keys, and first struck him. There is nothing in the testimony that tends to distinguish the difficulty from an ordinary fist fight where but two or three blows were passed, except in the fatal consequences that attended it. Keys and two companions met Willis and another Indian on Caddo street near one of the main business corners of the city. The former did not know Willis at the time, and, whatever may have provoked the difficulty, there is no room for belief that the injuries sustained by Willis were intended by Keys. At the time Keys, who was a young man, weighing but 133 pounds, though right handed, was unable to use his right hand on account of a broken bone, and struck the insured, who was a heavier man, with his left fist. The blow knocked the insured backward on the slanting pavement, with the result that his head struck the pavement, fracturing his skull and causing death. Keys did not know until the morning following that Willis had died as a result of the fall. It is not even claimed that Keys intended the result that followed, but it is insisted that, having struck Willis intentionally, a recovery cannot be had on account of the last-mentioned, provision of the policy. We do not think so. As we have seen, the insured's death was accidental. The injury which resulted fatally was not intentionally inflicted by Keys. The case differs materially from the great majority of the reported cases. Had Keys had in his hand a deadly weapon, the use of which was reasonably calculated to produce death, and in fact did so, a different question would be presented. No motive for killing the latter is shown to have existed, and the means used indicates only an intention to strike the insured. The result was unforeseen and unusual, and not such as would ordinarily follow a blow with the fist. It was not the logical result of a deliberate act, and could not reasonably have been anticipated by Keys, and he cannot be charged with a design of producing it. It was the result of fortuitous circumstances.

In Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 89 Cal. 170, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455, 26 Pac. 762, the policy exempted against liability where death was the result of design on the part of the insured or any other person. The court instructed the jury that "if the death of Philip Richards was caused by a blow dealt him by H. J. Dassonville, or some other person, that would not prevent plaintiffs from recovering in this action, if you believe from the evidence that, when Dassonville or some other person inflicted such blow, he did not mean to kill said Philip Richards."

The giving of the instruction was sustained. It was said by the court that there were circumstances in evidence tending to show that, if Dassonville did give the blow which resulted afterwards in the death of the deceased (by a fall from an elevated sidewalk), he did not intend such result, and it would not be a correct construction of the clause of the policy under review to say that it includes every case where a blow, not intended to kill, unfortunately and undesignedly produces death.

In Travelers' Protective Assn. v. Weil, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 629, 91 S. W. 886, the action was to recover for the loss of an eye. It was complained by the appellant that the trial court erred in charging, in effect, that, if the assailant did not intend the particular injury, plaintiff was entitled to recover, and it was insisted that a verdict should have been directed for the defendant. Sustaining the contention, it was said by the court: "We do not undertake to say that consequences might not follow such a blow, of a character so unusual and so apparently unrelated to the act as to exclude the idea that they were included within the general intention to inflict injury."

The court then proceeds to distinguish between the facts there presented and those in Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, and further says: "But under the facts of this case we are of opinion there is no room for controversy. We have a blow of the fist, struck by an adult man actuated by the anger and passion naturally resulting from his supposed provocation,—a blow struck in the eye, according to plaintiff's own statement. The force was sufficient to knock him down, and the injury to the eye was due to the blow, and not to the fall. We think the injury to the eye falls clearly within the general purpose to injure, and that it did not devolve on the defendant to show that Innes had a specific intention to inflict the particular character of injury which might flow from the assault."

In Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 545, 8 Am. St. Rep. 913, 32 N. W. 812, a provision of the policy excepted from recovery for death or personal injury, the result of design, either on the part of the insured or any other person. The insured was shot by an officer; but there was some evidence tending to show that the officer did not know it was the insured at whom he shot, and that he did not intend to kill the insured. It is said in the opinion: "It seems to me that the design intended by the terms of this policy must be the design that intended the actual result accomplished, and not the design of the act itself, which act resulted in the killing of one contrary to the design of the act. If, when Berry fired this shot, he did not know the man he fired at was Utter, and did not intend to kill Utter, it cannot be said that Utter lost his life by the design of Berry."

In Orr v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 120 Ala. 647, 24 So. 997, after quoting from the opinion in Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. the court announced the principle stated to be correct. In Travelers' Protective Assn. v. Fawcett, — Ind. App. —, 104 N. E. 991, the insurer defended under a paragraph in the policy denying a recovery where the insured came to his death as the result of an injury intentionally inflicted by another. In that case the uncontroverted evidence showed that the assailant, a bank robber, discharged several shots from revolvers into a group of four men huddled together in front of a vault in the bank. The company relied upon the presumption that a person intends the usual and ordinary consequences of his act; that, relying upon this presumption, the usual and ordinary consequences of such an act would be to kill or injure some one or more of them; and that, as there was no evidence tending to overcome the presumption, it must prevail and be sufficient to establish the fact that the robber intentionally killed the insured. The judgment, however, of the trial court was affirmed, and in the course of the opinion the following language was used: "The question arises under a contract by which it was stipulated that the association should not be liable on account of injuries intentionally inflicted on the assured by any other person. 'Intentional injuries' inflicted on the assured by some other person, within the meaning of this contract, refers to injuries which the other person actually directed against the insured and intended to inflict upon him. The parties contracted with reference to the actual intention of the person inflicting the injury, rather than such an intention as the law presumes as against a wrongdoer. . . . In such a case, if an act is shown which would naturally and reasonably result in injury to some one of several persons, it may be presumed that the author of the act intended to injure someone; but it cannot be presumed, as against anyone except the author of the act, that he intended the injury for the particular person who received it."

The court then cites Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. and approves the principle announced therein, though expressing a doubt as to the application to the state of facts shown to exist in the Utter Case.

Discussing the question of accidents and risks excepted in accident insurance, it is said in 1 Cyc. 257, that intentional injuries inflicted on the person of insured are usually considered "accidental," and as coming within the proviso that the insurance shall extend to injuries sustained through "external, violent, and accidental means," but that, where the policy provides that it shall not extend to injuries or death resulting from "intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person," such provision is valid and binding, and no recovery can be had for injuries or death so inflicted. It is further said, in discussing the question of intent, that the existence of an intent on the part of the person inflicting the injury is necessary, and this intent must be to inflict the injury actually inflicted. See also Corpus Juris, p. 442; Railway Officials' & E. Acci. Asso. v. Drummond, 56 Neb. 235, 76 N. W. 562; Gaynor v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 12 Ga. App. 601, 77 S. E. 1072.

The death of the insured not having been intended by Keys, and being an unforeseen and unusual result of the blow struck, the insurer is not relieved of liability on account of the fact that the blow itself was intentionally inflicted. The words, "intentionally inflicted," in this L.R.A.1915D.

case, should be construed to refer to the fatal injuries resulting from the fall, and not to the blow.

Where the meaning of a policy of insurance is ambiguous, or so drawn as to be fairly susceptible of different constructions, it will be construed strictly against the insurer, and that construction adopted which is most favorable to the insured. Taylor v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 25 Okla. 92, 138 Am. St. Rep. 906, 105 Pac. 354; Capital F. Ins. Co. v. Carroll, 26 Okla. 286, 109 Pac. 535; *Southern Surety Co. v. Tyler & S. Also, when a stipulation or exception to a policy of insurance emanating from the insurer is capable of two meanings, the one is to be adopted which is the most favorable to the insured. May, Ins. §§ 174, 175; Janneck v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 162 N. Y. 574, 57 N. E. 182; Forest City Ins. Co. v. Hardesty, 182 Ill. 39, 74 Am. St. Rep. 161, 55 N. E. 139; Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 136 U. Life Asso. v. Robinson*, 104 Ga. 256, 42 L.R.A. 261, 30 S. E. 918.

The judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Putnam County, convicting him of murder in the first degree. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. V. E. Bockman and B. G. Adcock, for appellant:

Any judicial act, judgment, or procedure done on Sunday is absolutely void.

Styles v. Harrison, 99 Tenn. 128, 63 Am. St. Rep. 824, 41 S. W. 333; Breyer v. State, 102 Tenn. 110, 50 S. W. 769; Davis v.

the decision in Moss v. STATE, that a jury may not be charged on Sunday, but the question has not often been directly decided. Charging the jury is a judicial, as distinguished from a ministerial, act, and on principle ought not to be possible on a nonjudicial day.

In Arthur v. Mosby, 2 Bibb, 589, a new trial was ordered where the cause coming on for trial on the last day of the term, some of the evidence was heard, the verdict of the jury made up and returned into court, and the judgment of the court rendered after 12 o'clock on Saturday night, as the proceedings were not authorized by law, either as being beyond the term, or on a day not judicial.

In State v. Green, 37 Mo. 466, the court reversed a conviction of murder because the reading of the instructions to the jury by the court had not been concluded, nor the cause finally submitted to the jury, until the clock in the court room showed ten minutes after 12, midnight, on Saturday, when the court took a recess, without adjournment, until 2 o'clock on Sunday morning, and then received the verdict and discharged the jury. The statute provided that "no court shall be open or transact business on Sunday, unless it be for the purpose of receiving a verdict or discharging a jury, and every adjournment of a court on Saturday shall always be to some other day than Sunday, except such adjournment as shall be made after a cause has been committed to the jury." The court said: "There can be no doubt that, under this statute, the sitting of the court, the giving of instructions, and the submitting of the cause to the jury, were prohibited, whether they were strictly judicial or merely ministerial acts. . . . We have felt some hesitation about reversing a conviction otherwise legal, on so small a matter as ten minutes' time. The maxim De minimis non curat lex cannot be applied to such a case. The rule must be defined; the line must be drawn somewhere. The day must be held to begin either at midnight or at sunrise; and both principle and authority concur in fixing it at midnight. If the hour can be exceeded by ten minutes, it may by an hour or twelve hours. Such irregularities and void proceedings have been held to make the final judgment erroneous, and in many similar cases new trials have been granted."

A conviction was reversed for submitting the cause to the jury on Sunday where a trial for petit larceny was commenced on Saturday and submitted to the jury at 2 A. M. Sunday morning, who rendered a verdict of guilty in about one hour, and on Monday morning judgment was pronounced on the verdict. The statute provided that "no court shall be open, or transact business, on Sunday, unless it be for the purpose of receiving a verdict or discharging a jury; and every adjournment of a court on Saturday shall always be to some other day than Sunday, except such adjournment as may be made after a cause has been committed to a jury. But this section shall not prevent the exercise of the jurisdiction of any magistrate, when it shall be necessary in criminal cases, to preserve the peace, or to arrest the offender." The particular question discussed in the case was the overruling of a contention by the public prosecutor that the statute had regard only to the solar or artificial day as distinguished from a day of 24 hours. Pulling v. People, 8 Barb. 384 (referred to in the opinion of Leonard, C., in Allen v. Godfrey, 44 N. Y. 433, as holding the verdict and judgment bad "for the reason that the cause was submitted on Sunday").

But it has been held that if a prisoner appeals from a judgment in a case where the jury was charged and he was convicted and sentenced on Sunday, he cannot claim that the court has lost jurisdiction and that he has obtained immunity, but a new trial will be ordered. It may well be doubted whether the Georgia court would now approve the passage in the opinion in Gholston v. Gholston, 31 Ga. 625, quoted in Moss v. STATE, and in the Gholston Case a conviction was reversed on other grounds.

In North Carolina, however, it seems that it may not necessarily be erroneous to charge the jury on Sunday. In State v. McGimsey, 80 N. C. 377, 30 Am. Rep. 90, where the jury on a murder trial retired to consider their verdict between 12 and 1 o'clock on Sunday morning, and later received further instructions and were discharged sometime later on Sunday, not having agreed, the appellate court discharged the prisoner from custody as immune from further trial, it not appearing that the discharge of the jury was necessary; that is to say, it not appearing that the court was sufficiently satisfied that they could not agree. The court, however, stated: "We think there is nothing in the objection raised that the court was held on Sunday for the purposes of this trial, under the circumstances. State v. Ricketts, 74 N. C. 187." In the Ricketts Case the court, in holding it proper to consent to have the verdict in a perjury case taken by the clerk on Sunday said: "In this state in general every act may lawfully be done on Sunday which may lawfully be done on any other day, unless there be some act of the legislature forbidding it to be done on that day. . . . We do not say how it would be (if we may suppose such an improbable case) if a court should undertake to sit on Sunday for the trial of actions, civil or criminal, or for giving judgments, when no extreme necessity for it existed. As long practice makes the law of a court, probably its proceedings in such cases would be deemed irregular."

the criminal court of Putnam county, at the September term, 1910, for the murder of H. S. Gill. He was tried and found guilty of murder in the first degree, with mitigating circumstances, at the May term, 1914, and judgment was rendered that he be confined in the state penitentiary during his natural life. He made a motion for a new trial in the lower court, which was overruled, and he has appealed to this court and assigned errors.

We deem it unnecessary to notice any of the errors assigned, except one based upon the following facts: The minutes of the court for Saturday, May 23d, recite that the hearing of testimony was concluded on that day, and the arguments of counsel continued until 11:30 P. M., and that no formal ad-

There are other cases where the jury retired before Sunday to consider their verdict, and where they later and on Sunday received further instructions.

Such a course was approved in People v. Odell, 1 Dak. 197, 46 N. W. 601, referred to in Moss v. STATE, also in the obiter remarks in Jones v. Johnson, 61 Ind. 257, quoted in Moss v. STATE. See also Stone v. United States, infra. But the court was of a contrary opinion in Davis v. Fish, 1 G. Greene, 406, 48 Am. Dec. 387, where the jury retired to deliberate late on Saturday night, and early on Sunday morning came into court and asked for and obtained further instructions in the absence of the plaintiff and his counsel, and the verdict was received and judgment entered on Sunday. The court said, inter alia: "In this case the final charge to the jury, their verdict, and the judgment, were given and rendered upon the Sabbath day; and being, in legal contemplation, judicial acts, we can but consider them utterly void." (But it was also considered that, as the term ended at midnight on Saturday, all subsequent proceedings were oorum non iudicio and void.)

In Roberts v. Bower, 5 Hun, 558, where the jury, having retired on Saturday, came into court on Sunday, asking further instructions, which were given without objection, it appears from the brief report "that the charge to the jury was like any other unauthorized communication, and that the parties, by consenting to it, waived any objections thereto."

The question was not presented in a simple form, if at all, in the civil case of Stone v. United States, 12 C. C. A. 451, 29 U. S. App. 32, 64 Fed. 667. There the jury, having retired to deliberate on Saturday, were sent for on Sunday, on the court's own motion, who submitted to them certain questions in the presence of counsel, informing the jury that the answers to these questions should be given in accordance with previous instructions about the measure of damages, and that the questions were submitted "in journalment of court was taken, but the sheriff was directed to bring the jury into court on the next morning. Following this an entry appears, as of date May 24th, reciting that the court met pursuant to adjournment; present and presiding the Honorable J. M. Gardenhire, Judge, etc. The entry then proceeds as follows: "No formal proclamation of the opening of court was made by the sheriff, the court not formally having adjourned, but having taken a recess until this time for the purpose of the court's delivering his charge to the jury in the case of State of Tennessee v. McConnell Moss, charged with murder."

It is then recited, under the proper style of the case, that the attorney general was present for the state, and also the defendant in his own proper person and by counsel, and that the jury also came, giving the names of the members of the jury, etc., "and said jury having heard all of the evidence on both sides of the case, and having heard the arguments of counsel, the court proceeded to read his charge to the jury, which the same way that the whole case was submitted to you, to be answered if you can," stating that he desired an answer to the special questions "for the use of the government in other litigation." In affirming the judgment entered upon a verdict for the United States, the circuit court of appeals said: "It appears that no exceptions were taken on Sunday to any of the transactions that occurred on that day. It is questionable if the proceedings which took place could be fairly classed as instructions to the jury, but if they could be so considered, and the court had any power to give instructions on Sunday, it was the duty of the defendant to have then and there excepted, if he had any objections thereto. It is evident that the defendant was not prejudiced by anything that transpired in court on that day. All that was said had reference to the finding of a special verdict, which could not have affected the result as to the general verdict. The remark of the court that the answers were required for use in other cases might very properly have been omitted, but we are unable to see how it could have had any tendency to influence the jury against the defendant. The whole case was fairly and impartially submitted by the court in its general charge given to the jury on the day before, and the court, on Sunday, declined to give any further instructions, and informed the jury that the answers to the special questions should be given in accordance with the previous instructions. It was left optional with the jury to answer these questions, although the court requested them to do so if they could." The affirmation of this case in the Supreme Court (167 U. S. 178, 42 L. ed. 127, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 778) does not seem to deal with the question L.R.A.1915D.

was delivered to them in writing, and said jury, having received the charge of the court in writing, retired, in charge of their sworn officers aforesaid, to consider of their verdict, carrying with them said written charge of the court and indictment in the case. This charge was delivered at 11 o'clock A. M., Sunday, May 24, 1914."

The minutes on Monday, the following day, recite in regular form that the jury having heard all the evidence and the arguments of counsel, and having received the charge of the court, returned their verdict into open court.

The question presented is whether the trial judge could lawfully hold court and charge the jury on Sunday.

In a long experience on the bench the writer of this opinion can recall no instance in which a similar attempt was ever before made in this state by any of our trial judges, nor can any other member of the court recall such instance. Some authorities have been submitted to us from other jurisdictions in which such a practice has further than to hold that the general verdict was not a nullity by reason of its being received or recorded on Sunday.

Writs of inquiry and inquests.

The execution of a writ of inquiry on a Sunday is void. Hoyle v. Cornwallis, 1 Strange, 387.

The execution of a writ of inquiry commenced before the sheriff and jury on Saturday evening, wherein the jury retired to consider their verdict about 1 A. M. Sunday morning, and returned their verdict about three hours later, is an execution of the writ on Sunday within the meaning of the statute forbidding the service or execution on Sunday of any writ, and the inquisition must be set aside. Butler v. Kelsey, 15 Johns. 177, where there were other grounds also requiring the setting aside of the inquisition.

There is not an entire agreement whether a coroner's inquest may be held on Sunday.

In Re Cooper, 5 Ont. Pr. Rep. 256, it was held that a coroner's inquest held on Sunday was void, and prisoners held on the coroner's warrant of commitment, made the same day, were discharged on habeas corpus, as there was nothing to support the warrant.

A coroner's "inquisition, being judicial, must not be conducted on a Sunday." 1 Burn's J. P. 28th ed. p. 928; quoted in Reg. v. Cavalier, 11 Manitoba L. Rep. 333.

But in Blaney v. State, 74 Md. 153, 21 Atl. 547, it was held that "an inquest held by a coroner's jury, and the commitment by a coroner or magistrate of an accused to jail, are rather ministerial than judicial acts. They are certainly not of that judicial character which precludes their being performed on Sunday." But this was not necessary to the decision. B. B. B.

been measurably sanctioned under special circumstances or by statute, but only two cases have been brought to our attention where such an attempt has been made in the absence of a statute. One of these cases is Gholston v. Gholston, 31 Ga. 625, 638. A brief excerpt from the opinion in this case will show all that appears on the subject. Said the court: "The court was actually delivering the charge to the jury on Saturday night, when the hour of 12 o'clock arrived, and the Sabbath day, according to our computation of time, had commenced before he concluded. This may have been inadvertence, but, under all the circumstances, was certainly no very grave error. . . . Whatever judicial action was had . . . on the Sabbath day was either inadvertent or inevitable. . . . We think what transpired on the Sabbath was not sufficient to vitiate the verdict, holding, at the same time, that all courts should abstain from the transaction of ordinary business on that holy day."

The next instance is Jones v. Johnson, 61 Ind. 257, 264. The point in decision was that the trial judge committed error in entering the jury room on Sunday and instructing the jury in the absence of the parties and of their counsel. After quoting a passage from McCorkle v. State, 14 Ind. 39, to the effect that the law permitted a verdict to be returned on Sunday, and as an incident authorized the court to sit on that date to receive any motion or order touching it, and to discharge the jury after rendering it, continued: "We may add, as a further incident to this authority to return a verdict on Sunday, that in our opinion, if it should appear to be necessary to the speedy formation and return of a verdict, and the jury should desire to be informed on that day as to any part of the testimony, or as to any point of law arising in the case, the court may sit on Sunday for the purpose of giving the jury the information required, 'in the presence of, or after notice to, the parties or their attorneys.'"

It is perceived that what was said in this case upon the subject of instructing the jury was dictum, since the ground of reversal, and the only point under examination, was the action of the trial judge in going into the jury room and giving additional instructions, in the absence of and without notice to the parties or their counsel.

In the Georgia case the matter was treated as merely an inadvertence, and, if not so, as a necessity.

We are referred to the case of People v. Odell, 1 Dak. 197, 203, 46 N. W. 601, 603. A short excerpt from that case will suffice. L.R.A.1915D.

ciently show its substance: "It appears from the record that the jury was charged and retired to consider their verdict about 9 o'clock on Saturday night, and that at 3 o'clock on Sabbath afternoon, the jury not having agreed, the judge, on his own motion, had them brought in and delivered to them further instructions, by way of correcting a supposed error in his former charge, and this is assigned as error. It is claimed that, this being a judicial act, cannot be done on the Sabbath. The Sabbath being dies non juridicus, it is doubtless the well-settled general rule that no judicial acts can be done on that day. But the jury being out, they are not permitted to separate until they have agreed upon their verdict, or are discharged by the court from further consideration of the case. The Code of Criminal Procedure provides (§ 388) that 'while the jury are absent the court may adjourn from time to time as to other business, but it is nevertheless deemed open for every purpose connected with the cause submitted to them until a verdict is rendered or the jury discharged.'"

So it was held that under the statute the court was to be considered open for such case.

In the absence of a statute authorizing it, there can be no doubt that it is unlawful for a court to do any judicial act on Sunday. The leading case is Swann v. Broome, 3 Burr. 1595—year 1764. In this case Lord Mansfield reviewed the whole subject. He said that anciently the court sat on Sundays; that the ancient Christians practised this for two reasons: One was in opposition to the heathen, who were superstitious about the observation of days and times, conceiving some to be ominous and unlucky and others lucky; that therefore the Christians laid aside all observance of days; that a second reason they had was that by keeping their own courts always open they prevented Christian suitors from resorting to heathen courts. But he further observed that in the year 517 a canon was made forbidding the adjudication of causes on Sunday; that this canon was ratified in the time of Theodosius, who fortified it with an imperial constitution. He referred to other subsequent canons adding other holy days. These canons, it seems, were received and adopted by the Saxon kings of England, and were all confirmed by William the Conqueror and Henry II. and so became part of the common law of England. In the course of time, other days were disregarded as nonjudicial, but Sunday retained. It was held that, while merely ministerial acts might be done on Sunday, no judicial act could be performed. For example, the rendering of a judgment or the awarding of a process, since these acts could not be supposed to be done but whilst the court was actually sitting. Said his lordship: "As to the observation 'that the courts of justice have never been restrained by act of Parliament from sitting on Sundays, and that the Stat. 29 Car. II., chap. 7, does not extend to giving judgments, it was needless to restrain them from it by act of Parliament. They could not do it, by the canons anciently received and made a part of the law of the land. And therefore the restraining them from it by act of Parliament would have been merely nugatory. . . . In Mackalley's Case, in 9 Coke, 65 b, it was objected that Sunday 'is not dies juridicus, and that therefore no arrest can be made in it, and every one ought to abstain from secular affairs upon that day.' But it was answered and resolved 'that no judicial act ought to be done in that day, but ministerial acts may be lawfully executed in the Sunday.'"

To the same effect is 4 Bacon's Abridgment, page 640: "By the common law dies dominicus non est juridicus. No plea therefore shall be holden quindena Pascha, because it is always the Lord's day; but it shall be crastino quindena Pascha. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 17, f. So, upon a fine levied with proclamations according to the statute of 4 Hen. VII., chap. 24, if any of the proclamations are made on the Lord's day, all the proclamations are void, for the justices may not sit upon that day, being a day exempt from business by the common law for the solemnity of it, to the intent that all people may apply themselves that day to prayer and serving God. Finch's Law, 7."

In Wharton's Legal Maxims, the maxim Dies dominicus non est juridicus is correctly rendered: "The Lord's day (Sunday) is not juridical, or a day for legal proceedings." He adds: "None of the courts of law or equity can sit on this day."

So it has been held that no indictment can be found on Sunday, and that every indictment should have a caption showing the day on which it was found, so that it might appear that it was not found on Sunday. 8 Bacon, Abr. 701; Dakin's Case, 2 Wms' Saund. 290, 1 Vent. 107, 2 Keble, 731. Nor can a writ of inquiry be executed on Sunday. 4 Bacon, Abr. 640; Cornwallis v. Hoyle, Fortescue, 373, 1 Strange, 387.

The chancery court was never adjourned, standing open at all times, but only for the issuing of writs, in its function of officina brevium. Choyce Cas. Ch. 85; 2 Bacon Abr. 681; 4 Edw. IV. 2; 4 Co. Inst. 80.

So stood the common law at and before the separation of the colonies from the mother country. That law, in general terms, is the law of Tennessee. We say, in L.R.A.1915D.

general terms, because we derive it through our mother state, North Carolina: "Our ancestors brought, upon their emigration, the common law with them as their rule of action, and still retained it where applicable; so it was declared upon the first settlement of North Carolina, in the Act of 1716, chap. 31, § 6. So, also, after the Revolution in 1778 it is again declared 'that all such parts of the common law, as were heretofore in force and use within this territory, as are not destructive of, repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the freedom or independence of this state, and the form of government therein established, and which have not been otherwise provided for, in the whole or in part, not abrogated, repealed, or expired, are hereby declared to be in full force in the state.' Act of April, 1778, chap. 5, § 2." Fields v. State, 1 Yerg. 158, 159; Porter v. State, Mart. & Y. 226, 227, and cases cited on latter page; Tisdale v. Munroe, 3 Yerg. 320, 323, 324; State v. Miller, 11 Lea, 620, 624-629; Smith v. North Memphis Sav. Bank, 115 Tenn. 12, 17-19, 89 S. W. 392, 393.

As said in the latter case:

"The cession act, enacted by the general assembly of North Carolina in 1789 (Act 1789, chap. 3), and accepted by the Congress of the United States April 2, 1790, provided that the laws in force and in use in North Carolina at the time of passing that act should be and continue in full force in the territory ceded until the same should be repealed or altered by the legislative authority of the territory. Nunnely v. Doherty, 1 Yerg. 27.

"And by our Constitutions adopted in 1796 and 1834 it was provided that all laws then in force in the territory previous to 1796, and those in Tennessee previous to 1834, not inconsistent with those instruments, respectively, should continue in force until they should expire, be altered, or repealed by the general assembly. Egnew v. Cochrane, 2 Head, 320.

"This was the status of the common law and the statutes of North Carolina previous to the cession act, in Tennessee, save as modified by subsequent legislation, until the adoption of our Code of 1858, which superseded all other statutory law in this state, except as therein specially provided. Code 1858, § 41 (Shannon's Code, § 58); State v. Miller, 11 Lea, 626."

In Tisdale v. Munroe, 3 Yerg. 320, 323, 324, the court said that as to British statutes not previously in use in North Carolina, and such as had been altered after the formation of our Constitution, "of these the court must judge."

In Glasgow v. Smith, 1 Overt. 144, 154, 155, it is said: "With respect to what part of the statutes of England, to use the language of this act [act of 1778], 'were heretofore in force and use,' no satisfactory opinion can be given; but the alternative of this sentence is susceptible of specification. The expressions are, 'or so much of the said statutes, etc., as are not destructive of, repugnant to, or inconsistent with the freedom and independence of this state and the form of government.' In other words, all the statutes of England contemplated in this act are in force which are not inconsistent with the principles and the form of the government. The statutes contemplated by the act were those . . . passed previously to the 4th year of Jac. I., when the charter to the colony of Virginia was granted, which included what was afterwards called North Carolina."
